Address by the President on Opening of the Fifth War Loan Drive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER F. GEORGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the President last night in connection with the opening of the Fifth War Loan drive.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

All our fighting men overseas today have their appointed stations on the far-flung battle fronts of the world. We at home have ours, too. We need, and are proud of, our fighting men—most decidedly. But during the anxious times ahead let us not forget that they need us, too.

It goes almost without saying that we must continue to forge the weapons of victory—the hundreds of thousands of items, large and small, essential to the waging of the war. This has been the major task from the very start. It is still a major task. This is the very worst time for any war worker to think of leaving his machine or to look for a peacetime job.

And it goes almost without saying, too, that we must continue to provide our Government with the funds necessary for waging war not only by the payment of taxes—which, after all, is an obligation of citizenship—but also by the purchase of War bonds—an act of free choice which every citizen has to make for himself under the guidance of his own conscience.

Whatever else any of us may be doing, the purchase of War bonds and stamps is something all of us can do and should do to help win the war.

I am happy to report tonight that it is something which nearly everyone seems to be doing. Although there are now approximately 67,000,000 persons who have or earn some form of income (including the armed forces), 81,000,000 persons have already bought War bonds. They have bought more than 600,000,000 individual bonds. Their purchases have totaled more than $32,000,000,000. These are the purchases of individual men, women, and children. Anyone who would have said this was possible a few years ago would have been put down as a starry-eyed visionary. Of such visions, however, is the stuff of America fashioned.

Of course, there are always pessimists with us. I am reminded of the fact that after the fall of France in 1940 I asked for the production by the United States of 50,000 airplanes per year. I was called crazy—it was said that the figure was fantastic; that it could not be done. Today we are building airplanes at the rate of 100,000 a year.

There is a direct connection between the bonds you have bought and the stream of men and equipment now rushing over the English Channel for the liberation of Europe. There is a direct connection between your War bonds and every part of this global war today.

Tonight, therefore, on the opening of this Fifth War Loan drive, it is appropriate for us to take a broad look at this panorama of world war, for the success or failure of the drive is going to have so much to do with the speed with which we can accomplish victory and peace.

While I know that the chief interest tonight is centered on the English Channel and on the beaches and farms and cities of Normandy, we should not lose sight of the fact that our armed forces are engaged on other battle fronts all over the world, and that no one front can be considered alone without its proper relation to all.

It is worth while to make over-all comparisons with the past. Compare today with just 2 years ago—June 1942. At that time Germany was in control of practically all of Europe, and was steadily driving the Russians back toward the Ural Mountains. Germany was practically in control of north Africa and the Mediterranean, and was beating at the gates of the Suez Canal and the route to India. Italy was still an important military and supply factor—as subsequent, long campaigns proved.

Japan was in control of the western Aleutian Islands; and in the South Pacific was knocking at the gates of Australia and New Zealand—and also threatening India. She had seized control of nearly one-half of the Central Pacific.

American armed forces on land and sea and in the air were still very definitely on the defensive, and in the building-up stage. Our allies were bearing the heat and the brunt of the attack.

In 1942 Washington heaved a sigh of relief that the first War bond issue had been cheerfully oversubscribed by the American people. In those days America was still hearing from many amateur strategists and political critics, some of whom were doing more good for Hitler than for the United States.

Today we are on the offensive all over the world—bringing the attack to our enemies.

In the Pacific, by relentless submarine and naval attacks, amphibious thrusts, and ever-mounting air attacks, we have deprived the Japs of the power to check the momentum of our ever-growing and ever-advancing military forces. We have reduced their shipping by more than 3,000,000 tons. We have overcome their original advantage in the air. We have cut off from a return to the homeland tens of thousands of beleaguered Japanese troops who now face starvation or surrender. We have cut down their naval strength, so that for many months they have avoided all risk of encounter with our naval forces.

True, we still have a long way to Tokyo. But, carrying out our original strategy of eliminating our European enemy first and then turning all our strength to the Pacific, we can force the Japanese to unconditional surrender or to national suicide much more rapidly than has been thought possible.

Turning now to our enemy who is first on the list for destruction—Germany has her back against the wall, in fact three walls at once.

On the south, we have broken the German hold on central Italy. On June 4 the city of Rome fell to the Allied armies. Allowing the enemy no respite, the Allies are now pressing hard on the heels of the Germans as they retreat northward in ever-growing confusion.

On the east, our gallant Soviet Allies have driven the enemy back from the lands which were invaded 3 years ago. Great Soviet armies are now initiating crushing blows.

Overhead, vast Allied air fleets of bombers and fighters have been waging a bitter air war over Germany and western Europe. They have had two major objectives: To destroy German war industries which maintain the German armies and air forces; and to shoot the German Luftwaffe out of the air. As a result German production has been whittled down continuously, and the German fighter force now has only a fraction of its former power.

This great air campaign, strategic and tactical, will continue, with increasing power.

On the west, the hammer blow which struck the coast of France last Tuesday morning was the culmination of many months of careful planning and strenuous preparation.

Millions of tons of weapons and supplies and hundreds of thousands of men assembled in England are now being poured into the great battle in Europe.

From the standpoint of our enemy we have achieved the impossible. We have broken through their supposedly impregnable wall in northern France. The assault has been costly in men and materials. Some of our landings were desperate adventures; but from the advices received so far, the losses were lower than our commanders had estimated would occur. We have established a firm foothold and are now prepared to meet the inevitable counterattacks of the Germans with power and confidence. We all pray that we will have far more than a firm foothold.

Americans have all worked together to make this day possible.

The liberation forces now streaming across the channel and up the beaches and down the highways of France are using thousands and thousands of planes and ships and tanks and heavy guns. They are carrying with them many thousands of items needed for their dangerous, stupendous undertaking. There is a shortage of nothing—nothing. This must continue.

What has been done in the United States since those days of 1940, when France fell, in raising and equipping and transporting our fighting forces and in producing weapons and supplies for war has been nothing short of a miracle. It was largely due to American teamwork, teamwork among capital and labor and agriculture, between the armed forces and the civilian economy, indeed among all of them.

And everyone who bought a War bond helped—and helped mightily!

There are still many people in the United States who have not bought War bonds or who have not bought as many as they can afford. Everyone knows for himself whether he falls into that category or not. In some cases his neighbors know also. To the consciences of those people, this appeal by the President of the United States is very much in order.

All of the things which we use in this war, everything we send to our fighting allies, costs money—a lot of money. One sure way every man, woman, and child can keep faith with those who have given, and are giving, their lives is to provide the money which is needed to win the final victory.

I urge all Americans to buy War bonds without stint. Swell the mighty chorus to bring us nearer to victory!

Bureaucratic Government Leads to Dictatorship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED J. DOUGLAS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from a soldier in the service:

Have you seen the Reader's Digest for February 1944? There is an article in there entitled "You Can't Pay Workers That Much." It tells how Government bureaus are dictating to an efficient American manufacturing concern and thereby would reduce its efficiency. Read it and see if your blood doesn't boil.

Now, what I would like to know is, if we are fighting a war against dictatorship, why do we permit it inside our country? Isn't an enemy within more dangerous than one without? If we are going to tolerate dictatorship anyway, wouldn't it be a lot cheaper if we did not wage a war against it? It seems ridiculous to me.

I think a situation like this demands a strong protest from every thinking citizen to our Senators and Representatives in Washington. Congress is delegated power by the Constitution to manage our affairs and no appointed Government agency should be granted such authority as the Price Adjustment Board and probably countless others.

I wish that you would copy this letter and send it to our Representative and both our Senators. It is not very inspiring to us over here to think of coming home only to find the very thing in our own Government that we have been seeking to destroy during these years that we have been away.

The article from the Reader's Digest follows:

"YOU CAN'T PAY WORKERS THAT MUCH"

(By Roger William Riis)

"What's wrong with working with your hands?" demanded Charlie Wilson, welder. He makes $7,000 a year. "Just because I work with my hands this Treasury fellow says I shouldn't be paid more than $5,000 a year. Did you ever see copper welded?"

He flipped down his helmet and deftly ran a weld around a machine part. Molten copper is fluid as mercury; the operation calls for a surgeon's touch. "A good artist makes more than $5,000 a year, and he works with his hands," Charlie resumed. "Welding copper looks like a kind of art to me."

The Lincoln Electric Co. at Cleveland manufactures welding equipment without which planes and ships could not be built on this war's scale. It is 100-percent piecework. The average Lincoln worker makes $5,400 a year. His weekly pay is rather less than the wage in some adjacent plants, but he gets a year-end bonus which roughly equals his wages. The workers accumulate the bonus, totaling $3,000,000, through efficiency in production. All Lincoln stock is owned by Lincoln executives and workers and their families; they really work for their own company. The 1943 year-end bonus was no wartime innovation; it has been going on for 10 years.

But now both the Treasury and the Price Adjutment Board attack the Lincoln method. The Treasury demands $1,600,000 of the bonus as taxes, on the ground that such rates of pay to workers are not an allowable expense. The P. A. B. (even though Lincoln is not a direct contractor with Government) demands $3,250,000 through renegotiation of prices. But this is no instance of removing surplus funds from a small group of absentee stockholders, who will groan and pay; here the Government attacks the wages of 1,300 workers.

In the course of the argument, the Treasury agent in charge of the case asserted, "A man who works with his hands shouldn't be paid as much as $5,000 a year." Lincoln workers naturally are shocked and indignant over the Treasury's dictum that Government should set an arbitrary distinction between what can be paid to a mechanic and to a white-collar man.

"They tell us production is what will win this war," Charlie Wilson went on. "Well, we produce. None better!"

Lincoln Electric does indeed produce! The company, 47 years old, makes half of all the electric welding equipment used in America. Dollar production per worker has risen in the last 10 years from $5,000 to $28,000; it is now four times that of competitive plants. And they pass the benefits of their efficiency on to the customer. Over these 10 years they have cut the price of a welding machine from $600 to less than $200. Lincoln figures this has saved the Government $60,000,000 since Pearl Harbor.

This is individual initiative functioning at full speed.

It is a basic belief at Lincoln that a man is worth all he can earn. "What we make, we split," says Charlie Wilson.

"Our system is incentive pay at its best," Vice President A. F. Davis comments. "And the War Labor Board specifically exempts from freezing any wages of increased productivity under incentive plans. Yet the Treasury now works up this new theory on us."

"Because we work the way we do," said the export manager, "we can manufacture, ship, pay freight and duty, and lay down our stuff in any country at lower prices than that country can make it. Looks like good business for Americans. Why pick on us?"

"The Government doesn't seem to like our system," diagnosed a toolmaker. "This Treasury man says we have no right to make real money. The renegotiation boys say we have to fork over to them more than all we have saved for the year-end bonus. I don't know which is worse."

Reese Dill, another worker, breathes anger. "If an industry is inefficient and can produce only at a loss, Government gives it what they call a subsidy. I call it a crutch. If a company is very efficient, Government fines us. Do they want to put all industry on crutches?"

To the Treasury, J. F. Lincoln, the company's president, said, "If, instead of 1,300 workers, we had 3,500 and paid them the same amount we pay the 1,300, would you then question our pay rates?"

"No," replied the official.

"Then," said Lincoln, "the real crime for which we are being fined is that through our high productive efficiency we make 2,200 men available for other war effort."

"You can't put words into my mouth," retorted the official.

But there are words—defiant words—in the workers' mouths. It is not a matter of objecting to taxes; the company now files 288 Federal and State corporation tax returns, and the men of course pay their personal taxes. What they object to is being told by Government that they must not receive the results of their own intense labors, because they aren't worth it.

"What do they mean, telling us what we can earn?" demanded Joe Galati, expert coil winder of 20 years' experience. "If any Government orders people around at their jobs that way, ain't that dictatorship? Ain't that what we're fighting against? I thought this was a democracy."

"I hope our company fights this thing till hell freezes over," emphasized Gerald Gilletly. "We make our money by producing. I used to be in another company. We work a lot harder here, but this place is so good that men almost never quit. We work for our money, but the great thing is, we get it. Or we will, if these new ideas don't stop us."

These men are on the company's advisory board, a group of 24 employee-elected employees which functions in internal matters much like a board of directors. It was the advisory board which telegraphed to Washington protesting the fine. They all term it a fine because Lincoln's competitors make no comparable profit and are not therefore in difficulties with Government.

"How much must we reduce our efficiency in order to get down to the level where we won't be fined?" ran the workers' telegram to the Price Adjustment Board, which has not yet found any answer beyond: "You either agree with us or we shall make a unilateral determination."

Ten members of the House of Representatives Committee on Ways and Means recently criticized such P. A. B. actions as "arrogant, highhanded, and tyrannical."

"Naturally, I'm prejudiced on our side," said welder Jim Macey. "I've benefited plenty. When I came to work here I didn't have a nickel. Now I own a home, and it's paid for."

"I'd like to see the man here who doesn't like our system," agreed George Stevens at the next bench. "Here you don't sit around on your fanny and draw a regular wage. You get just what you work for. If you don't work for it you don't get it. If the other guy loafs it hurts my bonus. But now look at what the Government does!"

"How do I feel about it?" Angus Campbell MacDonald was concise: "At 27 I have two kids, own my home, and have stock in the company."

"What do they think they're doing, these Government bureaus, trying to put a premium on loafing?" demanded another.

"Our way just gives a man a full chance to work," Charlie Wilson sums it up. Lincoln himself says it has brought "employee benefits unparalleled in industry."

"We serve one function only," he says, "and that is production. We are now being penalized for producing at the highest rate in the industry. I wish I didn't have to spend so much time fighting off the Government."

Even as we talked, a carpenter was measuring the office walls for more bookcases to house more Government orders and findings. Bound volumes already on the shelves totaled 48,000 pages of O. P. A., priority, and such matters. Reports on law in 5,400 labor cases ran to 64,613 pages. These pages were clean, unthumbed, for Lincoln has no so-called "labor relations"; the company is comprised entirely of fellow workers.

"We're independent here. The new idea seems to be that no one can do anything without Government O. K.," says Charlie Wilson thoughtfully. "But people don't do so well if they always lean on something. I wouldn't stake up every plant in my garden; pretty soon they couldn't stand alone, and I'd run out of stakes. You ought to see my garden."

It is the Treasury man, with his deprecating theory of a worker's value, who ought to see Charlie's garden.

Charlie's house stands on an attractive suburban street lined with sycamores. You walk from the two-car garage through the vegetable patch and 85-bush rose garden. In the bright living room a log fire burns. On a wall hang three awards which the Wilson's garden won in 1943. In the cellar a storage room is full of garden truck which Mrs. Wilson canned.

It is a beautiful house; it has literally everything—except a mortgage. "Most everybody around here has a mortgage," Wilson says, "but we fellows at the Lincoln shop are lucky—90 percent of us own our homes."

With his company stock, pension, and insurance Charlie can retire in 5 years with a monthly income of $200. Federal Social Security in 10 years—not 5—would give him a maximum of $85.

Through his own study and experiment Charlie has constantly lifted his production. By eliminating one standard but useless motion he raised his output from 40 to 41 rotors an hour. By changing the support for his electrode he knocked off several more minutes per job. Having increased his production, he makes a lot more money than he used to earn. His company says he is worth it.

But Government says 1,300 workers can't be paid $5,400 a year. They work with their hands.

Republican Platform Articles by Wendell Willkie

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two articles written by Wendell Willkie dealing with suggested planks for the Republican platform, published in the Washington Post of June 12 and June 13, 1944, be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of June 12, 1944]

WILLKIE OFFERS REPUBLICANS HIS IDEA OF PLATFORM NEEDS

(By Wendell Willkie)

The Republican Party in its beginning arose from the people's urge to build a strong National Government to offset the disruptive, weakening influence of the States' rights doctrine of the Democratic Party. Paradoxically, now, in 1944, that same Republican Party is urged to dedicate itself to the doctrine of States' rights.

In the days of the party's founding, a strong Central Government was necessary to prevent disruption of our political union. Today, a strong Central Government is necessary to prevent disruption of our economic and social structure by a variety of conflicting authorities and interests. In that early day, Federal power was necessary to make us in fact a nation. Today, Federal power is necessary to enable the United States to live and lead in the family of nations.

The debate concerning the concentration of power in Washington is a recurring one. It arises to some extent in every Presidential campaign and becomes particularly violent during war periods. But the sincerity and vigor of the present protest have been occasioned by causes beyond the normal maneuvers of politics or the dislocations created by the Federal assumption of necessary war powers. It arises from more far-reaching causes.

CITES MANY ABUSES

The spectacle of the present administration's arbitrary use of vast authority; the caprices of a government of men grown bold and reckless with the use of power, favoring first one economic group and then another, while subjecting individuals and their rights to the judgment of whims and theories; the manifold evidences of every citizen, even in his own community, of the inefficiencies and reckless extravagances of Federal agents—all these abuses have aroused dissatisfactions among the people which have naturally formed an issue for the opposition party. But we must not be confused as to what the issue is or where the solution lies.

It is not the worn-out issue of States' rights versus strong Federal Government. That is not an issue; that is a relic.

The States have their proper functions and Republicans can be proud that in the administrations of the 25 Republican Governors we have an outstanding example today of competent State government.

But ever since the adoption of the Constitution, with the expansion of the country and the growth of its concerns, there has been a trend toward stronger central government. It was firmly established in the Civil War and became increasingly marked after World War No. 1. President Hoover's committee on recent social trends published a report in 1933 that noted the growth of Federal functions during the three preceding Republican administrations and concluded:

"The shifts from State to Federal authority thus reflect the incapacity of the several States to deal with problems of transportation, communication, merchandising, labor-capital relations, and other vital aspects of social and economic life."

It could hardly be put better.

MUST EXERCISE VAST POWERS

Any national administration in a modern complex industrial society must exercise vast powers. The United States cannot be divided into 48 separate economic units. We cannot, for instance, have 48 different minimum wage laws, nor can we have a variety of State policies if we hope to protect the farmer against the precipitated downward spiral of post-war agricultural prices. Businesses national in scope, social and economic problems that affect all our people alike can only be dealt with on a national basis. The number and character of such problems increase steadily with every step in our industrial growth and expansion. And the more we move, as we must move, into the affairs of the world the more this will be true. For we will be living and functioning and trading in a world where other peoples have granted to their governments the power and the authority to act for them.

TODAY'S ISSUE DIFFERENT

No; the issue today is not the issue of States' rights versus Federal power. The issue is government administered under law. For if economic and social regulations in our modern industrial age must be national in scope to be effective, so their administration must be by law and rule if the citizen is to remain free.

The solution lies in a weakened central Government. It lies in assuring the proper use of the power we have deemed it wise and necessary to grant to the Federal Government. That means a sense of responsibility in administration. It means—and this is important—local administration of numerous Federal functions in their application. And it means primarily the substitution of government by law for government by caprice and unlimited discretions. Under such exercise of Federal power, every citizen, rich or poor, labor leader or factory manager, issuer of securities or wage earner, farmer or businessman may know his rights and may know that in case of dispute they will be adjudicated fairly and equitably under law and rules which at least his lawyer can understand.

CONCERN HUMAN FREEDOM

The issues involved in Federal power and its proper use concern human freedom itself. They are issues which Republicans should state clearly and fight for—not behind an outmoded mask of States' rights or in conjunction with those who use that mask to prevent social and political advance, or those others who, by a pretense of concern for the rights of the States, really seek to weaken the Federal Government to such an extent that the United States will be unable to play its appropriate role in the world of today.

They are issues we should fight for vigorously, frankly, and openly. If we prevail we will have a Government representing us abroad with dignity and power, an instrument of the united will of our people which can lead the world to tangible economic and political cooperation. And at home we shall have a Government with power to vitalize our economy, eliminate its abuses, and, at the same time, preserve and extend the freedom of its citizens.

To build such a Government—strong centrally and just in its administration—is in the finest tradition of the Republican Party.

[From the Washington Post of June 13, 1944]

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM

NEGRO'S EQUAL RIGHTS

Under the leadership of Lincoln, in the fires of civil war, the Republican Party's struggle to save the Union was transposed into the great moral issue of human freedom. By the Emancipation Proclamation and by amendments to the Federal Constitution, under Republican leadership, the Negro was legally and constitutionally guaranteed exactly the same rights as every other citizen of the United States.

It is therefore strange that Republicans, year after year, yield to the old States' rights argument and a narrow interpretation of Federal power, to prevent the passage of Federal statutes which constitute the only practical method by which the Negro's rights can be assured him.

One of these basic rights is the right to vote. Another is the right to live free of the haunting fear and the too-frequent actuality of mob violence. The first can be guaranteed, under the circumstances existing today, only by a Federal statute eliminating State poll taxes and other arbitrary prohibitions against the free exercise of the voting franchise, the other only by a Federal statute making the crime of lynching tryable in Federal courts and punishable by Federal law.

The Republican Party in its platform and in the declarations of its candidates should commit itself unequivocally and specifically to Federal antipoll tax and antilynching statutes.

The Negro people of the United States understandably refuse to accept the technical arguments against cloture in the debates on antipoll tax and antilynching bills, or even the sincere claims of constitutionalism which prevent such just measures from becoming law. And the very fact that the Republican Party was the instrumentality through which the Negroes were given freedom makes them the more resentful that it should join in acts which prevent them from obtaining the substance of freedom.

Nor will they be satisfied by the counsels of patience and the assurances of kindly men that progress has been made, that eventually, through fair treatment and cooperative effort, Negroes will in some distant day obtain the rights which the Constitution itself guarantees to them.

No one who has not stopped seeing and thinking could have missed the events of the past few years that have drawn together 13,000,000 Americans—one-tenth of the Nation—into a determined, purposeful unit.

In that time Negroes have known the bitter humiliation of seeing their men and women, eager to serve in the Nation's armed forces, excluded from some branches of the service or often relegated to menial jobs in the branches to which they have been admitted. They have witnessed the ugly and tragic results of race hatred and riots. They have known the brief security of good jobs at decent wages while their help was needed in order to make the tools of war, only to be filled with deep anxiety for fear that in the readjustments of peace they will be shuffled off into unemployment and poverty.

At the same time, from the battlefields of Italy to the gold-star homes here in America they have learned that there is nothing more democratic than a bullet or a splinter of steel. They want now to see some political democracy as well.

Millions of them distrust the Democratic Party which for years has deprived the Negro of his rights to vote in Atlanta while seeking his vote as the friend of race in Harlem. But in view of the economic advances and social gains which have come to Negroes during the past 12 years, they will not leave that party for vague assurance of future action expressed in pious platitudes, or for a 1944 version of the States' rights doctrine, or even for procedures which, however legally correct, in practical effect indefinitely postpone correction of sore and desperate abuses.

Negro leaders are alert and educated and sophisticated. They know that their problem is a part of the world-wide struggle for human freedom. For their people they ask only their rights—rights to which they are entitled. The Constitution does not provide for first- and second-class citizens.

They are entitled to the same opportunity to acquire an education—an education of the same quality—as that given to other citizens. They should receive the same per capita expenditure of public moneys for schools, housing, health, and hospitalization as is allotted to other citizens.

Their right to work must equal that of any citizen and their reward should be the same as the reward of any other citizen for the same job.

Their economic opportunity should not be limited by their color.

And last, they should have the right of every citizen to fight for his country in any branch of her armed services without discrimination and with equality of opportunity.

These are merely rights that the Negro of our communities is entitled to share with other citizens. Republicans should see to it that he gets them. For all of these reasonable demands are consistent with the very principles upon which the Republican Party was founded. All of them are a part of the freedom for which men of every color and race are dying. Our adoption or rejection of them will be the test of our sincerity and of our moral leadership in the eyes of hundreds of millions all over the world.

Work of Congregation at Glennonville, Mo.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 9 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch recounting the very remarkable pioneering development conducted by Father Peters and his congregation at Glennonville, Mo.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FATHER PETERS, A PIONEERING PRIEST—HE OVERCAME ALL OBSTACLES TO ESTABLISH THE FIRST CATHOLIC CHURCH IN DUNKLIN COUNTY

(By F. A. Behymer)

GLENNONVILLE, Mo., February 21.—On a mild winter day Father Peters, coming from the holy hour for servicemen at the church, paused and swept the familiar scene with his eye—the tiny town and the fat lands that encompassed it and the weariness that had been upon him fell away. It was for this that he had toiled through 38 years. He had planted and God had given the increase. All was well in the colony.

Into the woods and swamps the father went 38 years ago to clear them and colonize them for the good of men's souls and the greater glory of the church. Into them he had put his life, losing it but finding it in the losing.

On an autumn day in 1905 Father Frederick Peters, serving a church at Jefferson City and destined, people said, for a high place in the priesthood, was called to St. Louis by Archbishop Glennon. The prelate told the priest of his plans for Catholic colonies. Down in the St. Francois Valley, in Dunklin County, he had bought 16,000 acres for one such colony. "I would like for you to go down there," he said. "I think you are the man for the place."

Father Peters might without impropriety have demurred, but he didn't. Asked now if it was gladness or obedience that had its way with him, he answers simply, "I was obedient." He told his superior he would go where he was sent and do his best.

So to the town of Malden on November 3, 1905, came Father Frederick Peters to begin the new life that had been planned for him. Through timber and waste of waters he rode horseback until, 11 miles from town, he came to higher ground. There, he decided, he would take his stand and raise the cross and call men made of the stuff of pioneers to come and follow him. That was the launching of the colony and of the first Catholic parish in Dunklin County.

One thing that Father Peters had made up his mind about was that he would pick his people. They must be men and women with the hearts of pioneers who would be able, no matter what came, to take it. He knew two men in St. Louis who filled the bill and called them to follow him. They were Jim Hogan, an Irishman, and Ed Bihr, a German. That made it two to one, with Jim on the short end, because Father Peters was of German birth.

The three men, strangely assorted, but pioneers all, made their way through the waters to the higher land which was to be the colony's heart. There was nothing in the way of a habitation there except the deserted cabin of a chopper who had worked for the tie company that had taken out the best of the timber. They took it over and made it their home, the first house in the tiny town of Glennonville that was to be. For a parish church Father Peters acquired a shabby shed that had been the tie company's commissary, and placed at its roof-peak the cross that was to be the colony's symbol. It was a church that would do until a better could be built.

The cut-over timber the tie company had left was the only subsistence the land offered until it could be cleared and drained and the water-soured soil cured and brought under cultivation. For the timbermen who would come and the families that would follow there would have to be shelter. Lumber was the primary need.

The lumber was there, in the trees, but a mill was necessary to saw it up. A sawmill was set up. The need for lumber was so urgent that for more than a year the priest, lacking another to do the work, handled the lever. During the first and second years he sawed more than a million feet of lumber. With the assurance of shelter, families picked and invited by Father Peters began to come in, the first ones from Howard County, Mo. Later several families came from Jasper County, Ind., also by invitation, and on their recommendation others came.

The sawmill was not the only industry in the earlier days. To hasten the clearing of the land and to give employment while this was under way, the priest set up barrel heading, stave, and ax handle plants, which operated under his direction, employing 30 to 40 men. Over a period of 8 years thousands of handles, millions of barrel heads, and millions of staves were turned out and sold in the cities.

Most of the families that came to make new homes in a new land were large or became large in due course. There had to be a school for the children. The first one was built of logs, to be followed by frame structures for grade and high schools, in which, although they are part of the public-school system, the teaching is done by the Ursuline Sisters of Mount St. Joseph, Ky. All the children are Catholic except those of seven families that were there before the colonists came and stayed on.

Through the years the floods that came down the St. Francois and spread over the valley were the colonists' greatest trials. Many seasons their crops were destroyed, too late for replanting. As early as 1908 an attempt was made to solve this critical problem. Under a 20-year plan a great drainage district was formed. It helped but it was not until the Wappapello Dam was built that the long fight was won. "Now the floods are over," says Father Peters, "thanks be to God."

Now that the colonizing project has won through to success and a rating as the best in the United States, the colonists say "thanks be to God and Father Peters." Thanks be to Father Peters because without his advice and guidance they would not have come through. He was not only their spiritual pilot but he was the best farmer of them all. Father Peters would not say that, but it is true that from the beginning he took it upon himself to find out all that was to be known about the farming problems that were peculiar to the colony land. He was equally diligent in telling them what was good or bad for their souls and what was good or bad for their soils.

He is also the doctor of their bodies, for with more than a little medical knowledge he renders first aid in all emergencies, even to the setting of bones, with the approval of the doctors of the region, who know his skill.

In the field of public relations Father Peters was and is the voice of the parish, pressing always for needed improvements and consulted constantly by State and Federal agencies because of the confidence felt in him. It was through his efforts that 30 miles of roads were built with county aid after he had surveyed them. He was active and influential in the promotion of the Wappapello Dam. He is a member of the Harbors and Rivers Commission at Washington, was a member of the W. P. A. local board and vice president of the Ozark Border Electric Cooperative, the largest in Missouri, with 750 miles of energized wire and with over 700 miles waiting to be attached after the war. He is active in the promotion of public-health measures, and his advice is sought by the Farm Security Administration.

In the depression, when so many banks failed, the colony farmers lost over $50,000. Now there has been established a Credit Union bank which is considered the best in southeast Missouri.

Now that the days of difficulty and struggle are ended and success has been won, Father Peters' greatest satisfaction is that all the families who came pioneering at his bidding, stuck through thick and thin, enduring the hardships and keeping the faith. When the people were disheartened and about to give up Father Peters said to them: "Stay with us, people, we're going to get through somehow." They stayed.

That morning when he came from the holy hour for servicemen at the church it was not so much the weariness of his years pressing upon him as the burden he bore for the grief and anxiety of his people, the 300 who had prayed in the church for the soldiers' return. Spring will soon come, and sowing in its season, with no fear of floods, and after that the harvest. Except that there is yet no promise of peace, all is well with the colonists of Glennonville Parish, and Father Peters is thankful and content.

Amending Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 194

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Amending Price Control," published in the New Orleans Times-Picayune of June 10, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDING PRICE CONTROL

By passing several of the proposed amendments to the price-control law, Congress would contribute to price inflation, black markets, and enforcement difficulties. To impede the stabilization program now is clearly no way to fight the war.

One amendment proposed by Senator BANKHEAD would definitely tend to raise clothing prices, which already are gravely troubling the O. P. A. Clothing has gone up 7 to 8 percent in 2 years through authorized price raises and has slumped enormously in quality. Stabilization Director Vinson told the Senate committee that the change would cause an increase in the price of textiles and give the mills a special bonus without adding a red cent to what the grower gets for his cotton.

Another proposed amendment would tend to raise the level of rents by tying the hands of the O. P. A. enforcement division with red tape. The war might be over before some violators could be brought to account and then, in all probability, they would escape penalties for their disservice to stabilization. Still another modification of the present law, already approved by the Senate, would open the way to ceiling violations and more black markets by freeing violators of liability if they presented evidence that the breach was unintentional.

No frontal attack on price control and stabilization has been made because the country is well aware that only stern control can prevent runaway prices and general chaos. But as O. P. A. Administrator Bowles says, attempts are being made to kill price control with kind words. Proponents of modification pose as strong supporters of stabilization, yet singly and in the aggregate their amendments would weaken restraints where restraints are most necessary and obstruct enforcement, which already is the weakest feature of the program.

On the whole the O. P. A., the War Food Administration, and the War Production Board has not done badly. The necessary weapons and food have been produced and within the limitations imposed by Congress, public sentiment, and the need for popular cooperation, a sincere and commendable effort has been made to apply and enforce appropriate price ceilings. Congress should not permit itself to be misled by narrow interests or partisan considerations into tampering with the laws under which the control agencies have been able to operate effectually. Insofar as we have observed public sentiment favors reenactment of the price-control law as it now stands.

Do We Want Profit Control?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, sitting as a Committee of the Whole House Monday, Congress refused to adopt my amendment to the Price Control Act which, in effect, would have instructed the Office of Price Administration to keep its hands off of profit control.

The "steam roller" was well greased and working smoothly when this amendment was, too briefly, discussed. Under a motion that had been previously adopted, no supporting arguments were permitted, and the membership saw fit to follow the gentleman from California [Mr. OUTLAND] and voted it down. This is to be regretted, because the issue was far too important to be so lightly dismissed.

We will hear much more about profit control in the future. In order that the membership may be better informed when the matter is again brought before us, I ask permission to extend my remarks and include an excellent statement prepared by Dr. Ivan Wright, professor of economics at Brooklyn College and executive secretary of the Economists Committee on Reconversion Problems:

COMMON SENSE ABOUT PROFIT CONTROL

The American people want the cost of living held stable during wartime, when shortages of most goods are unavoidable. They know that, while the fighting goes on, the Nation cannot produce all the goods required to satisfy every demand of both the armed forces and civilians. Willingly, they accept such inconveniences and sacrifices as are incident to price control and to rationing by the Office of Price Administration.

Price control. Yes.

But in setting ceiling prices for certain goods, the O. P. A. has gone much further. It has undertaken to regulate profits as well as prices.

Profit control is a horse of a different color. Profit control tampers with the very mainspring of our economy. If the profit motive is to be ruled out of our economy, production will dry up. Jobs will disappear. The whole structure of American business will topple.

The purpose of this statement is to spell out in simple terms the issues involved in profit control. What is at stake is nothing less than the survival of the system of free enterprise which made this country great, and which can make us greater still in the era of peace that we all hope will follow victory in the bloody conflict now raging around the globe.

If the O. P. A. should clamp down a rigid limit on profits during the post-war era, it would be a major disaster not only to industry, but to labor which wants jobs in industry, and to the farmers who look to labor and to industry for markets for their products.

Let us see just what is involved in this question of profit control.

FROM WAR TO PEACE

Some day, we hope soon, this war will be over. Some day the drums of war will roll out only to give cadence to the steps of our boys as they swing up Main Street through cheering throngs in final victorious review before doffing uniforms for "civies," and returning to their homes, families, and the jobs they left behind.

Before that day comes this country must be ready. The millions who left jobs to go to war, or to do work in aircraft plants and shipyards, expect to find those jobs, or adequate substitutes, when they return. The Nation's economy must be made ready to provide those jobs. It must be made ready also to give work to millions of others who went to war as boys without a place in the economic scheme of things, but who will return as men who have earned the right to have jobs. And there will be a third large group for whom jobs will be needed—the dependents of those who won't be coming back or will come back permanently disabled. These will have to become breadwinners.

JOBS—THE BIG POST-WAR PROBLEM

Basically, no discussion of the reconversion period or the post-war period to follow can be separated from the really fundamental problem that must be solved—the problem of post-war employment.

In plain language, if we hope to have a peaceful peace at home when the war ends, we must plan our reconversion to a peacetime economy so that it will be lush with employment opportunities for the ten-million-odd veterans who will be seeking them, along with the other millions who will be released from war plants.

This problem cannot be chalked up on a blackboard for solution. It is a problem in human lives, etched in broken hearts, blasted careers, mangled limbs, orphaned children, widowed young matrons, bereft parents of missing sons, blood, sweat, and tears.

PROFITS MAKE JOBS

You cannot separate profit from the free-enterprise system. They are inseparable. As Prof. John V. Van Sickle, of Vanderbilt University aptly put it:

"The capitalistic engine is built to operate with the fuel of profits and the lubrication of confidence." [1]

Take away profits and you take away the incentive to produce. Take away profits and you take away jobs. Take away profits and you take away the urge to keep costs down and to offer better quality at lower prices. Take away profits and you take away the private enterprise system. Regulations unduly limiting profits thus go to the heart of our economic system.

The profit motive has been widely recognized in both peace and war. When we wanted an expanded output of agricultural products, what did we do? We permited farm prices to rise and fixed high support prices so that it would be more profitable to produce the required items. When we desired to expand the output of war goods, workers were induced to migrate to war-production centers by offers of higher wages. Contract-renegotiation officials of the armed forces have allowed profits up to 20 percent, and more to war contractors. No matter where we turn in our economy, we find evidences of the catalytic role played by profits in stimulating production.

PRICE CONTROL, PROFIT CONTROL, AND CONGRESS

The main objective of wartime price control is to prevent inflationary increases in the cost of living. Inevitably, such control over prices has some incidental effect upon profits.

But profit control has been made, in certain directives of the Office of Economic Stabilization and orders of the Office of Price Administration, an end in itself rather than an incident. When the O. P. A. undertakes to control profits rather than prices, it hits at the heart of the free-enterprise system, to which we look for the millions of post-war jobs that will be needed after victory has been won.

These attempts to control profits do not stem from the law itself. Congress has shown a full understanding of the key role of the profit motive in expanding output and lowering costs.

Again and again the Congress and its committees have acted to conserve and safeguard the profit motive. The Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 says that ceilings shall be adjusted for "general increases or decreases in profits." Congressional committees have criticized cost-plus contracts severely on the ground that they take away the incentive to cut costs.

At the same time Congress has permitted no profiteering in this war. It passed an excess-profits tax to take away 95 percent of profits above a level specified as normal. On sales to the Government prices are subject to renegotiation where they produce excessive profits. As previously noted, however, profit margins up to 20 percent have been allowed in individual renegotiation cases because of extraordinary efficiency, inventive contributions, or the assumption of unusual risks.

UNCERTAINTY FOR BUSINESSMEN

The desire to control profit for its own sake manifested by O. E. S. and O. P. A. has created an unhealthy tension in business circles everywhere, particularly among manufacturers of consumer goods.

Businessmen have become convinced that Government directives and orders which seeks to control profit for its own sake are inspired or written by employees of Government bureaus who want to change our economic system in essential respects. These bright young men, who have been glibly critical of the private enterprise system in the past, want to substitute bureaucratic regimentation for our free economy. Profit control would be one effective way to do this.

Now, we are not going to solve the thorny problems that lie ahead if our manufacturers become jittery, fearful from day to day of new efforts to squeeze profit margin by Government decree. Yet that is exactly what is happening. Businessmen, large and small, who must provide the know-how and the venture capital for enterprise must be able to see and plan ahead, so that they can take steps to recover their costs and earn a reasonable return if they are efficient. Profit control by Government makes this impossible.

Some people say: "Suppose businessmen are jittery. What of it? Who cares?"

The answer is that when businessmen are unable to make a profit, no matter how well they run their enterprises, they will curtail or abandon operations. This means fewer jobs and less goods. Unemployment and a falling standard of living will result.

TWO PERCENT OR NOTHING—VINSON

The much discussed Vinson directive, the most inclusive profit-control measure yet issued by a Government agency, had its origin in the disappearance of many low-priced textile lines from the market because manufacturers could not keep pace with rising costs except by turning out higher-priced lines. The result was hardship for low-income consumers, who had to buy higher-priced goods or do without certain products. Under these conditions, there developed pressure to expand output of the disappearing low-priced lines.

A program was finally evolved under which the W. P B. would make available the materials required to produce low-priced items, and the O. P. A. would permit adjustments in price ceilings so that manufacturers would not lose money on such production.

Since a rise in ceiling prices was involved in this plan, approval of the Office of Economic Stabilization was required. Director Vinson issued a directive to W. P. B. and O. P. A. on November 16, 1943, laying down the principles to govern such price ceiling adjustments. This directive limited profits to 2 percent, before taxes, in all such ceiling adjustments. It was not made public at that time, although excerpts were finally released to the public on December 13. The published excerpts revealed the amazing fact that, instead of being confined to low-priced lines, the directive applied to all "essential civilian goods." Clearly, advocates of profit control for its own sake had scored a great victory within the Office of Price Stabilization.

The directive caused such consternation in business circles that Director Vinson issued a "clarification" on January 26, 1944. In this second statement, he explained that the first order "was intended to apply primarily if not exclusively to the field of basic textiles and apparel. At the suggestion of the W. P. B. officials * * * it was broadened to include other essential consumer goods. This has served, however, to create so much misunderstanding that I am constrained to revert to the original purpose and intentment of the directives. Therefore, it will in the future apply only to textiles and apparel."

But, after thus seemingly narrowing the troublesome term "essential consumer goods," Director Vinson then went on to say:

"Problems arising in connection with shortages of other consumer goods where price adjustments are involved shall be presented to this office (O. E. S.) on an individual basis, for treatment which is consistent in principle with that provided for textiles and apparel."

With one hand, Director Vinson sought to reassure manufacturers of civilian goods other than textiles. With the other, he gave profit control right back to them—in spades.

The Vinson directive made 2 percent, before taxes, the maximum profit in such price-ceiling adjustments. But where a manufacturer reports profits, once again, before taxes, more than double those earned in the 1936–39 base period, no profit whatever over costs would be allowed. Here was profit control with a vengeance.

Manufacturers, naturally, were profoundly disturbed, particularly the thousands of smaller concerns for whom civilian-goods manufacture had become an urgent, immediate problem. As large prime contractors increased their efficiency, and as they received notice of cut-backs on their war orders, they tended more and more to pull in their subcontracts. This hit smaller manufacturers who were working on these subcontracts. Considering the substantial investment required for reconversion and the risks involved, these smaller manufacturers could not see how they could undertake to return to their peacetime operations under a 2-percent or no-profit-maximum rule.

JUST NOTHING—BOWLES

The Vinson directive tried to limit profits to a maximum of 2 percent. In April, the O. P. A. decided to go the O. E. S. one step better by providing that price ceilings for many products could allow no profit at all.

A very important price order applicable to many consumers durable goods is MPR 188, which covers such products as household furniture, office equipment and machines, dental supplies, commercial kitchen utensils, and similar items. The amendment to this order issued in April provides that, when setting ceiling prices of these products to permit resumption of their manufacture, the Office of Price Administration will make them high enough to cover only manufacturing, packing, and shipping costs. Where a manufacturer's entire operation is actually being conducted at a loss, the ceiling price could be high enough to cover selling and administrative costs as well.

Here, profit control for its own sake reaches its logical end—the elimination of profits. What would this mean to our post-war economic system? How can industry be expected to provide millions of new jobs if it can only recover costs, and no more, regardless of how good the products sold or how economically they are manufactured and distributed?

LET'S BE SENSIBLE ABOUT THIS

We don't want to have post-war inflation. We don't want to have a post-war depression. We don't want to have post-war unemployment.

Rigid profit control creates conditions that may bring on all of these evils. By discouraging reconversion and curtailing production, profit control curtails the supply of goods, thus paving the way for a runaway price rise. Reduced production, also, spells depression and unemployment.

[1] Has Private Enterprise a Future?—Trusts and Estates, May 1944.

It is axiomatic that if we are to avoid inflation, we must have adequate production. We are not going to get production if capital and management are scared away through fears instilled in businessmen by efforts to control profit for its own sake.

Let's not monkey with this thing. It is too important. The Nation must not permit personal differences, political differences, ideological differences, and other clashes of viewpoint to take our eyes off the ball. Our country's problem is to see that there is full opportunity for employment for all who want to work when the war is over. Anything that even threatens to impair the solution of that problem must be discarded in the common cause.

Our country's war production triumphs which followed conversion from a peacetime economy have been the industrial miracle of the ages. It has been praised as such even by Marshal Stalin. This triumph was not accomplished by rigid profit control. It was made possible by the dual incentives of reasonable profits and the patriotic appeal which caused both labor and capital to turn out the best that was in them. Let's take a leaf out of the book of conversion in solving our reconversion problems, particularly since the patriotic motive necessarily becomes less potent once hostilities cease.

Let's be sensible about this thing.

We Are at the Crossroads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD J. McMURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. McMURRAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial by Charles E. Broughton, fighting Democratic editor of the Sheboygan Press:

WE ARE AT THE CROSSROADS

In a two-party government such as we have members of both parties owe it to the Government to enter full tickets, not only in the primary but in the general election.

Unless you have a State ticket and candidates for the assembly and senate in every district you are promoting absentee voting. The same is true of a county ticket. When the two conventions, the Democratic and Republican, are held in Chicago nominees will be offered to the people and platforms adopted. Unless we have complete State legislature and county tickets we are playing into the hands of those who would like nothing better than to upset much of the legislation that has been enacted in the last 11 years.

When President Roosevelt went into office in 1933 we had the most pathetic situation in all history. We had soup kitchens in operation and people starving while others had plenty. The purchasing power of the Nation had broken down and factories were closed; banks had already closed in many instances and we were in mortal terror as to what was to happen. Revolution was in the making, and that same situation will recur again if we are not guardians of our own destiny.

You can't expect to win a Presidential election without a united front here at home. You can't have partial tickets and expect to combat a well-organized and well-greased machine. There isn't a member of the Democratic or Republican Party who doesn't owe it to his Government to get out and see that the tickets are filled and then follow through with an organization aimed to win an election. We have 48 States, and unless every State is linked up to the national election with a complete ticket we may sacrifice the electoral vote in that particular State.

You will recall back in the time of the Wilson-Hughes election the results finally rested upon one State, and we doubt very much today whether Mr. Wilson would have been elected if Charles Evans Hughes had not passed Senator HIRAM JOHNSON up when he visited California, normally Republican. They resented the slight and voted for Wilson.

We point to California as an example of what can occur in any election if we fail to organize, or if, as in the case of California, we overlook a bet. We are much concerned about Wisconsin, with only 6 days to the final filing of nomination papers. True, if a candidate withdraws, the party's State central committee can fill the vacancy, but that is never as successful as an aroused sentiment in support of a conference-endorsed candidate or one whose nomination papers have been filed and who is a candidate in the primary.

Supposing Mr. Roosevelt were to run for reelection or be drafted at the coming convention; that would not insure Wisconsin's electoral vote for him. It takes a mighty organization knitted together in every one of the 71 ccunties to insure that result.

It is with this in mind that we appeal to the people in this county and every county in the State to have a full county ticket; and if you have no candidate for Congress, draft someone and draft him now.

Democratic National Committeeman Thomas King has done a good job as far as his duties are concerned, but it takes more than one man to bring about victory. He has consented to run for State treasurer, in order to fill the ticket. It takes a mighty big man to accept this responsibility, but he was equal to the test.

The Republicans have numerous candidates and ample funds and they are prepared to give the Democratic Party a real test as to strength. It would be a source of keen regret if the American public were to face defeat because the people were willing to accept all the benefits of the last three administrations and did nothing in return—in other words, shirked their responsibility.

Up to this time no Republican candidate who is an avowed enemy of isolation has been able to muster strength in the party opposing the Democrats. The old war horses want to name their candidate, and they want an isolationist and a Roosevelt hater. They want to go back to the days of Harding so that they can dictate a candidate. We had a Harding and a Coolidge and a Hoover, and the fruits of their labors resulted in financial disaster. The voters would be short in memory if they encouraged a return to those days. Social Security, aid for the unfortunates, and a return to isolation would undo all the benefits that have accrued during the last 11 years. The foreclosures on homes and farms are not so far back that we can forget.

Yes, we can gamble in this election and lose the fruits of our labors. We can invite another disaster. Following a war, there is bound to be prosperity, but what of 10 years hence? Will we be in the saddle for a depression or a war, or will we make this war a final one? That question will be decided in the coming election, for the winners will make the peace.

Naturally Mr. Roosevelt has made enemies by his fearless stand, his intense desire to win the war irrespective of party success. The Old Guard is at the signpost hoping to profit by those who think they have been subjected to certain restrictions or hardships. Measure these by the hardships of the men and women in the service, and they are mere trifles. America must awake if it would prevent another war, and make the United States a breathing and living democracy, and play its part in a just and lasting world peace.

Address of William H. Webb, Executive Vice President, National Rivers and Harbors Congress

OF

HON. PAT CANNON

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of William H. Webb, executive vice president, National Rivers and Harbors Congress, before the Propeller Club of the United States, port of Miami, Fla., Monday, May 22, 1944:

Mr. President, members of the Propeller Club, and distinguished guests: It is a great privilege and pleasure for me to join with you in the twelfth annual celebration of National Maritime Day. I have been for several years a member of the Propeller Club of Washington, D. C., and New York City, and am familiar with the splendid work of your organization on behalf of the American Merchant Marine. The National Rivers and Harbors Congress through the years has cooperated closely with your national headquarters on many matters of mutual interest.

Strange as it may seem, this is the first time we can say truthfully that the American Merchant Marine is sitting on top of the world. We now have the greatest tonnage any nation has ever possessed in the history of shipping.

Statistics are dry, but in round numbers we have about 50,000,000 tons. The shipbuilding and ship-repairing and conversion industry has done one of the greatest production jobs of all times. It was done under the pressure of war, but every real American—especially you men gathered here—wants to see the result of this war production redound to our benefit and advantage after the war.

The national president of the Propeller Club of the United States during his recent visit to Miami explained how important our merchant fleet is going to be in the peace negotiations. The colorful phrase that Commander Tode used was that our shipping will be "the blue chips at the peace table," and he sounded a very serious warning that this country should not let itself be hornswoggled out of the advantage it now has. I cannot add much to that message but when the time comes I hope this community through its citizens, through you men, your Congressmen and Senators, will stand up and demand that we do not lose any advantages we have gained.

It has been our past experience that after wars we always slide back because public interest is not sufficiently maintained. We must not let that happen again. The press of your city is alert to the problem, and I want to quote briefly from an editorial that commented on Mr. Tode's visit. The Miami Herald said:

"We can take our rightful place as a great maritime nation after the guns are stilled if we let common sense dictate that we must not fritter or give away with peace what we have amassed through the travail of war, but capitalize on our merchant-fleet potential to strengthen national defense and benefit our economic security."

No speech that I could make on this fundamental problem could compete with the evidence of men like Admiral Land and Admiral Vickery which will appear in tomorrow's newspapers. Consequently I am going to give you a somewhat different talk.

As all of you may not be familiar with the work of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, permit me first to tell you something of our organization, its scope, and purposes. The National Rivers and Harbors Congress is a nonpartisan, nonprofit association, dedicated to the improvement and development of the inland waterways and harbors of the United States.

Originally organized in the year 1901, it was a pioneer in the struggle for the protection of our national resources and has taken a leading and active part in this fight for more than four decades.

All Members of the Senate and House of Representatives are honorary members of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, and many of them take an active part in its work. The officers of the Corps of Army Engineers engaged in river and harbor work are likewise ex officio members of the Congress.

The active membership of the congress is composed of States, cities, chambers of commerce, waterway and similar associations, firms, and individuals, numbering upward of 25,000 located in every State in the Union. Among its members are many nationally known public officials, as well as outstanding leaders in the business and professional world.

The organization has for its purpose the promotion of continued improvement of the Nation's rivers, harbors, lakes, and waterways, and the investigation and approval of justifiable waterway projects throughout the country. It provides a forum for discussion of all problems relating to water development and use, serves as a clearinghouse for coordinating the activities of local and sectional organizations, and affords a means for securing united action by all the interests concerned with the various phases of water development.

It is generally the policy of the congress to follow the recommendations of the United States Army Engineers in advocating projects, and it is in no sense an organization which approves any project of the pork-barrel type. Virtually every bill passed by the Federal Congress for improvement of harbors and waterways has been composed almost in toto of projects previously investigated and recommended by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress.

The projects endorsed by the congress upon the recommendation of its projects committee, composed of an outstanding waterway leader in each of the engineering divisions of the United States, are vigorously and continuously advocated for inclusion in the Government's public works program and appropriations or allocations of funds sought therefor.

May I emphasize that the National Rivers and Harbors Congress is not sectional or regional but national in its scope. It looks at the whole Nation and the general welfare of all. It rejoices to see railroads, airways, and highways develop and prosper. Our organization is interested not only in the improvement of maritime and inland navigation, in river and harbor development, but it is also concerned with flood control, the generation of hydroelectric power, irrigation, reclamation, conservation of our soil and forests, and the utilization of our land and water resources. We deal with the very things that are so vital and necessary to our war effort and support these projects which are essential to the safety and defense of the Nation.

I want to say also that there is a Government agency to which the obligation of the people runs, an agency which for generations has enjoyed the esteem, the confidence, and the respect of the American people. I speak of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army. I know that a grateful country and a grateful posterity will remember the high standards of conduct and the fine quality of vision which that corps has contributed and will continue to contribute to the welfare of America.

Your Virginia Key project was so capably presented before our projects committee by Professor Hart, Captain Sharlow, and others, that they induced the committee and the Congress to give it a No. 1 rating. We were glad to work with your able representatives, and now the bill which will authorize and adopt the project is in the final stages of legislative enactment.

We have been delighted to learn that you have created a port authority. I need hardly tell you that having a single responsible unit charged with port matters should expedite your progress. Most of you know that community dissension and confusion have hampered your progress in the past.

Through our mill in Washington come hundreds of projects. Many of them are of extreme local importance but we are compelled to take the national point of view. So are the various departments of the Government that are charged with executing the projects. When the National Rivers and Harbors Congress endorsed Virginia Key, we felt its development would be a national asset, not merely a local benefit, and now it is up to your properly constituted authorities to see to it that Virginia Key becomes an accomplished fact.

We may assume that this will be done, so let us look at south Florida for a moment from that national point of view I mentioned a few moments ago. It is commonplace that you are a great winter resort and that you consequently have a great deal to contribute to the health and recreation of the Nation but those of you who have seen the Virginia Key briefs filed with the Army Engineers know that this alone is not a sufficient economic justification for a great harbor. In your briefs you set up a case of economic justification on previous population growth, cargo gains, and trade potentialities that won the approval of the Army Engineers. But you cannot let it rest at that. You must implement potentialities that have been used in your argument of economic justification.

Let me take my cue here from an address made before this club on this same occasion in the year 1940 when you celebrated Maritime Day. Your speaker at that time was Col. R. A. Wheeler, then resident member of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. This same Colonel Wheeler is now Gen. R. A. Wheeler who was recently the subject of an article in the Saturday Evening Post because of his great war accomplishments. Men of General Wheeler's capacity do not make statements lightly. In the course of that speech in 1940 he made several references to the fact that this area should develop its back country. Not only did he have in mind the immediate usufructs such as edible vegetables but he pointed out you should take advantage of numerous agricultural products that can be processed for industrial purposes.

In the course of looking over information that is forwarded to us from this area I find that the Propeller Club of Miami has been a proponent of extending Miami River via the Miami Canal to Lake Okeechobee.

Considering the numerous political subdivisions and rival interests that are involved, you have a big job on your hands, but in nearly 20 years in waterway work I have seen a great many extremely complicated and involved set-ups successfully solved in other sections of the country.

The National Rivers and Harbors Congress, as I have said, is interested in water control and soil conservation as well as in navigable waterways. The Propeller Club project for extension of Miami River to Lake Harbor would serve all three of these purposes. It would open up some 1,200 square miles of the most productive land in this area, and through locks and other water-control methods you could check the dangerous oxidation of muck soil, prevent the fires that have filled this area with smoke, and provide a perpetual water supply for the city of Miami.

The omnibus rivers and harbors bill, H. R. 3961, authorizes surveys of a number of projects through the central part of the State to which this Miami-Lake Okeechobee waterway would provide a final link and open up a vast area for water transportation. From the national point of view this Lake Okeechobee-Miami link would complete a continental pattern of the utmost significance.

Four years ago General Wheeler told you to pay attention to agricultural development, and it is plain what he was driving at. The Army Engineers do not merely look at facilities on an urban water front, but they take into consideration the entire tributary area. The Okeechobee watershed is unquestionably one of your great tributary areas. In this section you have the greatest winter farm production within easy reach of northern markets. But that is not all. In those vast acres you also have resources of an agricultural nature that can be developed and processed into some 1,500 manufactured products. You already have a big sugar mill. I understand a $20 000,000 starch mill is being built; that there are numerous plastic products contemplated, and that the cattle business is also going forward by leaps and bounds. You have the opportunity for the development of any number of industries based on your distinctive climatic and soil conditions. From a national point of view it is the contribution that you can make by taking advantage of these resources that fits you into the national picture—enables you to make a contribution to the national economy that perhaps no other area within the boundaries of this country can offer. All of these things will increase your port business, your wholesale business, and your retail business.

Your club has made such a signal contribution in the preparation of material that won approval for Virginia Key and the Intracoastal Waterway that I am confident when you put yourselves down to it you can make out as energetic and as well documented a case for your back country as you have for your terminal and deep-water facilities on the sea lanes.

And now just a word about foreign trade. My good friend, Tom Lyons, of the Department of Commerce, was here last January to tell you about a foreign trade zone. He also spoke about aviation's role in the postwar period. I have heard that some people were surprised he did not confine himself to waterborne commerce. Anyone who does not face the progress of aviation in cargo-carrying, frankly is going to be left far behind. Also he is going to miss the boat if he ignores aviation as a passenger carrier. The practical, big steamship lines are not so short-sighted. They have today on the drawing board revisions of ship plans that take into account competition by airplanes. One of the things Mr. Lyons brought out in his speech, which I have read with great interest and which was widely published, is the fact that before you can put in a foreign trade zone you have to make a thorough economic survey to find out what purposes it can serve. Such a survey should be made regardless of whether you apply for a foreign trade zone later because without it your foreign trade progress can only be made by fumbling in the dark and hoping that you will stumble on something good.

Miami is one of the cities credited with being able to hold its war gains in population. There is ample proof that it cannot only hold these gains but should make new ones. Your marine program should not merely keep pace, it should be several jumps ahead.

And now in closing may I express on behalf of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress the great pleasure we had in staging our last convention in your magic city just 3 weeks before Pearl Harbor. The pleasant memories of that event are still fresh in our minds and we look forward to returning after the war to your fair city, glamorous, entrancing, beautiful, inspiring Miami, that glistens and gleams and nestles like a diamond buckle upon the slippered foot of Florida.

Invasion Presents Test of Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it was with great pleasure that I have read an article by Mr. Fulton Lewis, Jr., in Hearst's Baltimore News-Post of June 10, 1944. I derived a great deal of satisfaction from it because it is evidence that the Hearst newspapers, once violently antagonistic toward this administration, are coming to realize that President Roosevelt is making a really effective effort to achieve as early a war victory as possible, regardless of the effect an early victory would have on his own political fortunes. This article by Mr. Lewis clearly shows that the best interests of the country are at all times first and political advantages secondary with President Roosevelt.

The article in question reads as follows:

INVASION PRESENTS TEST OF ROOSEVELT
(By Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

WASHINGTON, June 10.—Many and glorious will be the sagas about the courage and heroism of the G. I. Joes who swarmed the beaches of Normandy last Tuesday.

But in that Allied invasion there was another bit of courage that seems to have gone unnoticed.

It was on the part of Franklin D. Roosevelt, and it consisted of the simple act of giving the nod for the invasion to go on, at that particular time.

It was a political rather than physical courage.

But it took plenty, because it's a clear cinch that the materialization of the invasion completely changes the lights and shadows on the November Presidential election picture.

And the President must have foreseen those implications when he gave the orders.

There's no use cradling this thing in soft language and frills.

The truth is that a considerable number of the more fanatical Roosevelt haters were convinced that the President was going to put off any invasion attempt until such a time that the war would still be going on as of election day.

GRUESOME THOUGHT

A gruesome and diabolical idea, to be sure, but many are the anti-New Dealers who have nursed and even whispered that suspicion.

Some backed into it by saying that he probably was not doing it by deliberate design and intention, but rather that the subconscious wish was fathering his military decisions.

The decision as to when an army is ready to strike is riddled with indeterminables, anyway.

PLAUSIBLE EXPLANATION

It would be easy, they said, to rationalize a continued postponement on the grounds that time costs nothing, and the longer we were prepared the less would be the final cost to us in casualties.

There were others who played the direct shot; they believed—and they really did—that the President was planning it that way as cold-blooded, fourth-term political strategy.

Both ideas went up in smoke, of course, on the Norman sands. The President kept faith, even though he had plenty of opportunity for doing otherwise.

VARYING OPINIONS

There are innumerable competent military men all over the world who would have supported a decision to wait for more preparation.

Churchill is one of them. It's open information that he has never wanted to attempt a Channel crossing, and didn't at this time.

And to keep political consideration out of the invasion decision as completely as Mr. Roosevelt did was to pick the hard way.

The most naive political adolescent can see, by a little analysis, that all of the political advantage lay on the side of postponement.

Congress and Foreign Policy

OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, Speaker, House of Representatives, before the Foreign Policy Association, New York City, on Monday, June 12, 1944:

In the early years of the Nation the American people were alertly conscious of the conduct of foreign affairs. The national existence might be in peril from without. But growth in material strength and a century of freedom from serious external danger tended to reduce the popular interest in international matters. Events of the past 30 years have brought a return to intense and deep interest in our foreign affairs.

Foreign policy concerns more than the activities of a few diplomats; it vitally affects the lives of us all. We now know, and we must never again forget, that we are directly and vitally concerned in world affairs. As the elected Representatives of the people, Members of both Houses of Congress play their part in determining that we have a foreign policy supported by the enlightened judgment of the people, and that this policy will protect our own security and promote a world order in which men can live in peace.

The casualty lists which come in from day to day are a grim reminder of our great responsibility in preventing the recurrence of such a catastrophic war. With a humility born of sorrow, we must dedicate ourselves to the high resolve of preserving forever that peace which our brave soldiers, and the soldiers of our gallant Allies, are giving their lives to obtain.

There are those who may taunt and jeer at the idea of a system of world peace and security by saying that it is a dreamer's dream, that it is impractical, that it has never before been done. War obscures the fact that international agreements have in the past accomplished a good deal toward world security and order. The methods of former years have not been sufficient to check a madman drunk with power. But, happily, mankind is able to learn from reason and experience. The efforts of the past furnish experience on which the reason of today may build.

A clearer approach to the problem can be made, I believe, by considering it from the point of view of the imperative security needs of the United States. We must approach the formation of a system of world peace and security with the realism and the practicality that we apply in our own domestic life. It is not a dreamer's world to say that we must have law and order, for that is the elementary foundation on which the American civilization is based. The demands for law and order, for peace and security, are as vital to our Nation in a world of nations as they are to our citizens in their domestic affairs. We want our Nation to live and to live in peace. We want to join hands with our friends in keeping this peace, for we are highly resolved that the great calamity now besetting us shall not again occur.

The lesson we must learn and remember and never forget is that it is futile to wish for peace without providing the methods for keeping the peace. We must assume our share of the responsibility for securing that which we desire. The old method, the fallacious method, the method which helped bring on this calamity was the feeling that we were secure because wishing would make it so. Those people who say that we can go it alone and who, once the war is over, want to return to the old days of yesteryear are the dreamers. They are worse than dreamers; they are reckless men, irresponsible men, men willing to gamble again with the fate of the Nation rather than admit that they are wrong.

There are those who say that we would lose our sovereignty if we joined with other nations in keeping the peace. Such statements may be made to confuse or to deceive, but the truth is that the power to make international commitments is the essence of sovereignty. We can make commitments or not make commitments as we choose, we can make them for short periods or long periods, or terminable at will, but in any case we would be exercising the prerogatives of a sovereign nation. These commitments are not made once and forever. We do not propose today to solve the problems of all time. Rather, we meet in a flexible system the problems which we now know and which require joint action. It is as serious a fallacy to suppose that cooperation among States lessens their independence as it would be to suppose that cooperation among individuals is the enemy of freedom.

We do not intend to become the Santa Claus of the world. I believe that no one would deny that we must assist in rehabilitating the occupied countries, feed and clothe those impoverished by war, and assist those countries to begin again a normal operation of their economy. We want, in brief, to create those conditions by which the countries now ravaged by war can rehabilitate themselves as rapidly as possible.

The part which our Congress must play in creating the conditions of world stability is great. The fact that Congress has great power in determining foreign policy is too little realized, and this power is in addition to the power possessed by the Senate to advise and consent to treaties. Although the President alone has been given certain constitutional authority in handling foreign affairs, many of the President's actions and the actions of Government agencies in relation to foreign policy are determined by laws enacted by Congress. The constitutional power of the President relating to foreign affairs and the treaty-making power shared by the President and the Senate go but a little way in determining the many-sided aspects of our foreign policy. Congress has been an integral part in formulating our foreign policy in the past, and it must prepare to cooperate with the Executive in solving those important issues which will face our country during and after the war. This cooperation is essential because the welfare of our country demands that the executive branch and the legislative branch work together for a common end. While their functions and their powers are separate, their objectives toward the national welfare are the same.

Appropriations for the support of the Government are made annually, and this includes appropriations for the conduct of our foreign policy as well as for the conduct of our domestic policy. Congress must, in other words, determine how much is to be spent in carrying out our foreign policy. We have to appropriate money for the Department of State and its Foreign Service, and for the wartime agencies which are especially concerned with foreign affairs, such as the Office of War Information and the Federal Economic Administration. Some of the old-line departments of the Government also received money for foreign activities. In addition we appropriate funds for participation by the United States in international organizations such as the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. The congressional power of the purse is a very real control over the type and extent of the foreign policy which our Government follows.

Our commercial relations with other nations are to some extent determined by the tariffs which we and other nations place on imports. The present Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act sets the standards and determines the limits within which the Executive can negotiate trade agreements with other nations. Our commercial relations are also determined by our shipping policies, and Congress must determine whether we should have a large merchant marine and whether such a merchant marine should be supported by subsidies of one type or another. The war has emphasized the importance of air power, and after the war we know that air power will have an increasingly large commercial significance. Congress must assist in formulating a policy which will maximize the benefits from the commercial use of the air. Our immigration policy is determined by laws enacted by Congress. In other words, Congress is responsible for the formulation of many policies directly affecting foreign affairs, policies which are enacted in the form of law and not in the form of treaties. In addition many treaties require legislation to make them effective. Congress also enacts other legislation which directly or indirectly affects the foreign policy of other nations as well as that of the United States. Our monetary policy will affect the currency exchanges throughout the world. Our agricultural policy will affect the growth and the price of agricultural commodities in other nations.

During the dark years from 1939 through 1941, Congress in cooperation with the Executive enacted many laws which have assisted in resisting the designs of the aggressor. In 1939 Congress repealed the arms embargo in order to make it possible for the Allies to continue purchasing the arms which they so much needed. Whereas Germany was armed, the Allies were not fully prepared in the fall of 1939 to meet the might of the German military machine, and our arms embargo cut off the supplies to Great Britain and France in the hour of their death struggle. In actual practice this embargo affected only the Allies and not Germany, and Congress very wisely removed that prohibition from the statute books.

The fall of France made all Americans realize the military power behind Germany's aggression, and it revealed to many that which had long been realized by some: that a Nazi-Germany which controlled the Continent of Europe was a threat to our own security. Thereupon the Congress appropriated huge sums for stepping up our armament program. In the late summer of 1940 Congress enacted the selective-service law, a measure which has been equal to the great task of providing manpower for the superb citizen armies which are now defending America.

In March 1941 Congress passed the Lend-Lease Act which provided that the Government should allocate the distribution of war material to those areas which were deemed essential for the defense of the United States. This act was one of the most important ever enacted by any Congress, and the far-sighted wisdom of this act becomes increasingly apparent with the progress of the war. With the development of the concept of reverse lend-lease, we have worked out a practical mechanism where the resources of the United Nations can be applied where they are needed, when they are needed, and by whom they are needed.

In November 1941, shortly before our entrance into the war, Congress repealed most of the remaining provisions of the Neutrality Act, thereby increasing our ability to defend ourselves against the mounting danger from Axis aggression. The Neutrality Act was based on the premise that the danger of our being involved in war depended upon our acts. Accordingly it was supposed to follow that the less we did the less would be that danger, and that if we renounced rights of action long held the aggressors would not bother us. Experience of other countries as well as of our own has too clearly shown that inaction is not the best road to peace. By the repeal of the Neutrality Acts we reasserted good American doctrine which recognizes that the defense of this country requires positive means.

During the war, many of the basic policies affecting both our domestic and foreign policies are determined by the primary demands of the military. But the demands of the military encompassing though they may be, do not determine all of our contemporary foreign policy and they make more pressing the need for considering now the shape of a more adequate foreign policy which we will demand in the future peace that is to come. Congress is now giving attention to the future problems of maintaining the peace and security for which we fight.

A few months ago the House of Representatives, by an overwhelming bipartisan majority, adopted the Fulbright resolution favoring the participation of this country in international peace machinery. The resolution reads, "Resolved, That the Congress hereby expresses itself as favoring the creation of appropriate international machinery with power adequate to establish and to maintain a just and lasting peace, among the nations of the world, and as favoring participation by the United States therein through its constitutional processes." That brief resolution, while not a blue-print for an international organization, states clearly the objectives toward which we wish to direct our foreign policy and the premises upon which a system of world security should be based. The Senate passed a similar resolution, sponsored by Senator Connally, also by an overwhelming bipartisan majority. These striking declarations of the House of Representatives and the Senate together with the momentous Four-Nation Declaration adopted at the Moscow Conference have played their full part, I am sure, in making clear to the world that this Nation stands united behind a policy of effective international cooperation.

The Senate has a singular part to play in determining foreign policy because of its power to advise and consent to treaties and its power to confirm nominations submitted by the President. During recent weeks, a bipartisan group of eight Senators has held frank discussions with Secretary Hull on the general principles, questions, and plans relating to the establishment of an international peace and security organization in accordance with the principles contained in the Moscow Four-Nation Declaration and the Connally and Fulbright resolutions. The first phase of those talks has been completed, and the Secretary is carrying forward similar discussions with a bipartisan group from the House of Representatives. Meanwhile, the Secretary of State is initiating informal discussions on the establishment of an international peace and security organization with Great Britain, Russia, and China, and then with governments of other United Nations.

I cite these conferences to you as an example of the earnestness with which those in responsibility are approaching the great problem before us. We are determined that petty considerations, that personal rivalry or partisan advantage or jealousy between institutions shall not obstruct our vision or deter our efforts. Although Congress and the Executive have distinct powers, both are responsible to the people and both are united in the common goal of securing a world of peace and freedom. The Congress of the United States will do its share, I am confident, in making the will of the American people effective in the promotion of international peace and well-being.

I want to see this greatest of all democracies do a man's part in the world's great work of peace.

United States Industry's Working Assets Up Seventeen Billions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it is my candid opinion that there is too much unnecessary stress and fear in relation to industrial reconversion to peacetime activities. I am satisfied that most of the industries and plants have been and are now adjusting themselves, rearranging and reconverting at Government expense to enable them without unnecessary delay to resume peacetime production; but despite this the United States Chamber of Commerce and all similar organizations are inordinately stressing, through the press and publicity agencies, the great need for plans for reconversion.

I have talked to many manufacturers and I am satisfied that they are not overlooking any opportunity in that respect. I regret that a great many outstanding officials and otherwise well-meaning men are unduly alarmed because of this publicity. Although the last war ended abruptly in 1918, I do not recollect any let-up in business before the latter part of 1919 and early 1920, when President Wilson aimed to stop the speculations and manipulations and hoarding by many clever and shrewd operators who were aided by the banks, and because of that legitimate businessmen were denied and refused financial aid by these banks. Then an orderly procedure to aid legitimate business was necessary to stop loans for speculative and hoarding purposes, which procedure had for a short time an adverse effect upon some businesses.

And at that time we had not made any provision for servicemen as we are doing now. Today the industries are in far better position than they were in 1920, as is shown in a newspaper article covering a late report of the Securities and Exchange Commission, which under leave to extend, I will insert in the RECORD. This report discloses that, aside from banks and insurance companies, American industry's working capital jumped from $24,600,000,000 in 1939 to $41,600,000,000 in 1943 and that more than half of the 70-percent increase occurred in the last 2½ years. Cash increased from $10,900,000,000 to $22,600,000,000, this after taxes and renegotiations were settled.

Manufacturers and railroads and trade showed the greatest increase in working capital. Railroads increased their working capital by 300 percent.

I urge the reading of the article covering the report issued by the Securities and Exchange Commission, as follows:

UNITED STATES INDUSTRY'S WORKING ASSETS UP SEVENTEEN BILLION

PHILADELPHIA, June 8.—American industry's working capital reached an unprecedented level by the end of 1943, pointing to the possibility of post-war reconversion and expansion without need of financial assistance from outside sources.

A Securities and Exchange Commission analysis of current assets and liabilities of all American corporations (other than banks and insurance companies) from 1939 through 1943 disclosed today that net working capital "in an extremely liquid form" jumped from $24,600,000,000 in 1939 to $41,600,000,000 in 1943. A substantial proportion of the total is in cash.

WARTIME TREND

More than half of the 70-percent rise occurred after the United States entered the war.

Among the changes in assets and liabilities during the 5-year period:

Cash increased from $10,900,000,000 to $22,600,000,000.

Government securities leaped from $2,200,000,000 to $16,000,000,000 and Federal income tax liabilities from $1,200,000,000 to $15,900,000,000.

Increases in working capital during this period are "attributable for the most part to retained profits after taxes and dividend disbursements," the analysis states.

LIQUID ASSETS SOAR

Until late 1941, the rise in working capital took the form of inventories, reflecting a rising level of business. Liquid assets, exclusive of inventories, have risen from $6,500,000,000 to $14,700,000,000, while inventories remained relatively constant, the analysis reveals.

Manufacturing groups, railroads, and trade showed the largest increase in working capital. Railroads increased their working capital 300 percent during the period, with trade, manufacturing, and utilities recording increases of from 50 to 70 percent.

Lend-Lease Aid to the Italian People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, Normandy and Rome are almost a thousand miles apart, and yet they are both sectors of the same gigantic battlefield in which we have trapped the enemy for his final overthrow. The rout of the Nazi armies in Italy weakens the resistance which the enemy can oppose to our boys landing on the coast of France. Our increasing control of the Mediterranean is costing the enemy dear in the shape of men and materials already engaged, or waiting for attacks in other quarters.

But while we have brought the Nazi machine to bay, we still may have a long bitter task of fighting ahead of us. It is a task in which we should utilize to the full all the millions of Europeans who, after 4 years and more of oppression, want to fight against the Germans. If we fail to utilize the fighting men of Europe, we are to that extent needlessly sacrificing the lives of our own boys.

Of some of these brave legions of fighters in Europe we are already well aware. We have heard of the French underground, and we all acknowledge the aid given us by the heroic struggles of Tito's men in Yugoslavia. But I do not think we are all aware of the efforts of the Italian people, efforts now being made, and which can be greatly increased in the near future.

Many facts prove that a new Italy is being born. Eleven months ago, Mussolini was ousted and is now nothing more than a hated, secondary Quisling in Nazi-occupied Italy. When Mussolini fell, the King, who had collaborated with fascism for 21 years, asked Marshal Badoglio to form a new cabinet, which immediately sought for the armistice, and after a few weeks formally declared war on Germany, as a cobelligerent with the Allies. After two reshufflings of the Badoglio government, however, it appeared evident that the Italian people were not willing to support either the King or Badoglio, both compromised during the long life of the Fascist regime. At the fall of Rome, the anti-Fascist parties succeeded in imposing the will of the Italian people without compromises. Now the King is gone, and Badoglio has been replaced by Premier Bonomi, an honored liberal statesman, a man who held no office under fascism, and who was the head of the underground movement in Rome during the bloody months of German occupation.

Premier Bonomi said on the day he was requested to form the new Cabinet that his program was to do away with everything Fascist and to see that the war effort continues. "We hope to be of real assistance to the Allies," he said. He has excluded all old Fascists and Fascist officeholders from his Cabinet. All members of the Bonomi Cabinet have refused to swear allegiance to Prince Umberto or to the Savoy monarchy. They pledged loyalty only to the Italian Nation.

These political developments foreshadow increased Italian aid to the Allies in the future, but they are outstripped by what the Italian people, bewildered, oppressed by Fascists and Nazis, and torn asunder as they were last September, are already doing. The Italian Fleet is now sharing the honor and the risks of the war in the Mediterranean for the ideals of the United Nations. Units of the Italian Army are fighting alongside the Allied troops in Italy, and it can be hoped their numbers will soon increase.

Italian prisoners of war in this country and in the British Empire have been recently allowed to volunteer for special noncombat service units, but the enthusiasm with which they answered leaves no doubts about their willingness to join combat units.

But what is perhaps the most important contribution of the Italians to our military operations is the activities of the heroic partisans, who fight the Germans in northern and central Italy as well as in Yugoslavia.

In the Balkans entire units of the Italian armies joined Marshal Tito's forces at the time of the armistice, forming that Garibaldi division which under Tito is gallantly fighting the Nazis in Montenegro.

In central and northern Italy the number of partisans is daily increasing. Already in January the Free Italian News Agency in Cairo announced that 650,000 guerrillas were operating in Nazi-occupied Italian territory under the coordination of a single supreme command. Italian generals lead partisan groups. Villages, towns, entire valleys are, or have been, under the complete control of the partisans, and suffer the bloody revenge of the Nazis when the latter succeed in overwhelming their heroic resistance. Thousands of partisans have lost their lives in the fight against our common enemy, thousands of hostages have been shot, innumerable houses and entire villages have been destroyed by the Nazis in their fury of reprisal.

The importance of the activities of the partisans is now receiving official recognition. On May 21 General Alexander, supreme commander of the Allied Army in Italy, concurred with the Italian high command in establishing six zones in Nazi-occupied Italy for the purpose of organizing their resistance. At the same time General Alexander's headquarters made public the first comunique issued by the Italian underground, stating that guerrilla activities in the north had forced the Germans to send 6 of their 25 divisions in Italy to counteract them. On June 6, General Alexander transmitted by radio a message to the partisans of northern Italy, urging them to rise against the common enemy, to cut communication lines, to increase the confusion in the areas behind the enemy, to cooperate with the Allies in their fight against the Germans. "The liberation of Italy"—the message says—"is now taking place. Cooperate among yourselves. Cooperate with me. Together we will attain victory."

The Italian contribution to our common victory cannot be increased or continued unless Italy is adequately supplied with the necessary arms, goods, and equipment for the struggle against the common enemy; and also with the means of relieving the starvation, malnutrition, disease, and economic chaos which are a threat and handicap not only to Italian armed resistance but also to our own campaigns there. President Roosevelt, in his broadcast of June 5, stated that our troops have found in Italy starvation, malnutrition, disease, a deteriorating education, a lowered public health. All of these are byproducts of the Fascist misrule and of the unhappy necessities of war.

The instrument which we customarily use to supply the necessary weapons, equipment, and food for war is lend-lease. We have extended lend-lease to nations who are sacrificing less in blood and suffering for our cause than Italy is sacrificing at this moment. The Italians want to increase their efforts, and we should do everything we can to make that possible.

Therefore, for the purpose of shortening the struggle against the enemy, of utilizing all available resources of manpower and fighting spirit, and of furthering the efforts and increasing the effectiveness of the Italian people, I believe that Italy should be made a lend-lease country. To this end I have introduced a resolution stating that the House recommends that the President make Italy a lend-lease country.

The Truth About Cooperatives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, precisely because he has a very great following Mr. Fulton Lewis, Jr., has an unusual responsibility to the people of this Nation for giving an accurate and fair appraisal of the things which he discusses in his radio speeches and in his columns in the newspapers. As the Members of the House well know, it is my profound belief that in the cooperative method of doing business there is available to the people of this Nation, whether they be farmers, consumers, purchasers of electricity, holders of insurance policies, people in need of credit, or whoever they may be, a method of solving their problems by their own efforts and by the application of the principle of mutual loyalty and without any reliance whatsoever on the Government. Cooperatives are nothing more nor less than the common man's opportunity to have some part in the free enterprise which we talk about so much. And yet Mr. Lewis has gone out of his way to paint a picture of the operation of some of the outstanding cooperatives of this country which is not only unfair but seriously inaccurate. I am, therefore, asking consent to include with my remarks the answer of the Cooperative League of the United States to the charges made by Mr. Lewis. This answer appeared in the Cooperative League News Service for May 25:

FULTON LEWIS MAKES UNPROVOKED ATTACK ON CO-OPS—COOPERATIVE LEAGUE ANSWERS CHARGES MADE BY COMMENTATOR

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Fulton Lewis, Jr., radio commentator and columnist, in his column of May 13 and 14, made an unprovoked attack on the cooperative movement—the Cooperative League of the United States of America declared today. Lewis accused cooperative leaders of using unlimited expense accounts, he contended that the co-ops are evading payment of taxes, declared that the cooperatives are subsidized by the Government through low cost of credit and that the cooperatives have become the kind of big business the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice is trying to destroy. All these charges are untrue, the Cooperative League of the United States of America declared.

"Mr. Lewis opened his column by pointing out that he is a member of two cooperatives, one to supply electric light and power and one handling farm supplies, yet he made grievous errors in fact which could easily have been checked through sources open to any co-op member or to any reporter or to the public at large," the league declared. Apparently no attempt was made to check these facts for Mr. Lewis did not consult any of the three offices of the Cooperative League, National Federation of Cooperatives, with offices in Washington, New York, and Chicago, nor did he check obviously incorrect material with the office of the Consumers Cooperative Association or Mr. Cowden, its president, who was personally maligned in the syndicated column.

Mr. Lewis declared in his column that the salary of co-op officials must not be more than $7,500 a year, which is too bad, because Mr. Cowden, for instance, undoubtedly is worth several times that salary. However, there's no limitation on expense accounts. Both of these statements are false, the Cooperative League contends. There are no provisions limiting salaries to a specific figure. Salaries are fixed by boards of directors elected by members of cooperatives and expense accounts are audited by independent auditors and are subject to review by both the directors and the members of the cooperative.

Lewis declared that cooperatives can sell only to stockholder members, which is untrue. Anyone may buy in a co-op and anyone may join.

He continued to say that "There are ways around it" (speaking of this nonexistent provision). He goes on to say that "the (co-ops) are supposed to take your name and address, and when you have bought a certain amount, you get your share of stock." That again is untrue. Consumers must make application for membership and make an initial payment to become members of cooperatives.

Lewis charges that the Government extends subsidized loans to cooperatives. Actually some cooperatives may borrow from the Bank for Cooperatives at the customary rate of 2½ percent which is neither charity or subsidy. In fact, the Government has considerable revenue from these loans. Other types of business have access to loans from the R. F. C. and other sources not available for cooperatives.

Most puzzling of Mr. Lewis' inaccuracies, the Cooperative League points out, is the fact that he has denounced the co-ops because of their differences in operation from ordinary business and then turns around to say "there is no discernible difference between the private company and the cooperative."

Lewis charges that the consumer cooperatives are exempt from taxes. Consumer cooperatives pay the same income taxes, property, and license taxes as ordinary business, they also pay corporation taxes, sales taxes, and excise taxes. The savings which cooperatives return to their members or which the members democratically vote to invest in capital is not income and therefore not subject to income taxes. This is the same right which is available to other business which may return overcharges to their customers if they wish.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it may be pointed out that such tax exemption as has been granted to farm cooperatives by action of Congress has been given them specifically because it was recognized by Congress that agriculture as a whole has throughout the years received very substantially less than its fair share of our national income. The advantage accruing to farm cooperatives from this tax exemption is a very slight one indeed if we are talking about those portions of their receipts which really are income within the meaning of the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution.

But what the enemies of cooperatives are really after is to secure the passage of a confiscatory tax on the savings which cooperatives make for their members and which are refunded to those members at the end of each year on the basis of their patronage. Such savings never are part of the income of cooperatives, nor would they be a part of such income even though the tax-exemption provisions now accorded farm cooperatives by Congress should be repealed. For cooperatives only act as servants of their members in purchasing supplies for them.

Mr. Fulton Lewis is only one of those who is making these attacks. The so-called National Tax Equality Association and powerful forces associated with it must also be taken into account. Should they have their way with regard to the taxation of cooperatives the effective response of the cooperatives would of course be very obvious. For every single such cooperative, whether it deals in petroleum products, feed, fertilizer, or whatever the product may be, has always been in the position to reduce prices if it wanted to. Cooperatives have not cut prices but have sold at the regular market prices, partly because this is one of the fundamental principles of cooperation, partly because they have deliberately refrained from underselling their competitors. If however the present well heeled enemies of cooperation had their way and commenced the taxing of savings returned to members, it would not be the co-ops that would in the long run suffer. For they could quite as well make the savings available to their members in lower prices as by the present method. The consequences of their doing so are I think hardly the results desired by those who now seek their destruction.

A great hue and cry has also been raised about the banks for cooperatives which are part of the cooperative farm-credit structure. It is apparently forgotten how frequently Government lending agencies have given credit at very low interest rates to industry which was not cooperative. If we are seeking real equality there are a great many factors which must be taken into account and these factors upon careful analysis will certainly not show that farm cooperatives or any other kind of cooperatives have on balance received anything like the special favors that have been granted to other groups in the country.

It certainly is not difficult to understand the deep concern of small-scale business under the present situation. But it is not cooperatives that are causing the distress of small business. Rather it is the very monopolies which cooperatives have in so many instances been successful in combating. In the petroleum field for example, it is not the farm cooperatives which produce and deal in petroleum which threaten the independents in this industry, but rather the stranglehold by the major companies.

Post-War Position of Finland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from a constituent, Mr. Gustaf Ek, of East Portchester, on the post-war position of Finland and my reply to him:

JUNE 9, 1944.

DEAR MRS. LUCE: I am very worried about the position of Finland in the post-war world. It seems to me that Finland is not the same kind of a country as Germany or Japan or the other German allies. It seems to me that Finland from the beginning was simply fighting a war of national sovereignty and to protect herself against aggression. Do you think that she will be, or should be, treated the same way as the Germans and the Japs at the peace table?

I am a good American of Finnish ancestry, but I cannot help hoping that our administration will see that Finland gets a just peace.

I would like so much to know what you think about this.

Sincerely,

GUSTAF EK.

JUNE 13, 1944.

Mr. GUSTAF EK,
East Portchester, Conn.

DEAR MR. EK: I am glad to answer, to the best of my knowledge, your inquiry in regard to Finland's position in the post-war world. Naturally, no one can tell you today what Finland's post-war position will be. But many people know what, in terms of international justice, it should be.

Through these last years, when heroism and sacrifice have become commonplace, the epic of Finland's resistance to an unprovoked aggressor in the winter of 1939–40 is unsurpassed, though more and more these days it becomes expedient to forget it.

You remember, of course, that Russia, as Hitler's silent partner in 1939 and 1940, occupied eastern Poland, the Baltic states and Bessarabia. While this was going on in the East and while Europe was performing the first dreary scene of the first act of World War No. 2, Russia presented Finland with territorial demands which Finland found impossible to accept. When the Finnish Government politely declined to accede to these demands, Russia attacked, neglecting the outmoded formality of a declaration of war. Most Finns learned that their country was at war when the Helsinki Airport was bombed by planes of the Russian Air Force.

The course of that brief war is familiar to all of us. The Finns, fighting a nation which outnumbered them 60 to 1 in population, stained the Arctic snows red with their blood and the blood of the invaders.

It was a struggle between an armored giant and a valiant but ill-equipped pigmy.

Through the long months of Finland's ordeal, the outside world expressed its sympathy for the Finns in unlimited outpourings of words.

President Roosevelt said, in an address to delegates of the American Youth Congress on February 11, 1940: "Here is a small Republic in northern Europe. A Republic which, without any question whatever, wishes solely to maintain its own territorial and governmental integrity. Nobody with any pretense of common sense believes that Finland had any ulterior designs on the Soviet Union * * *. American sympathy is 98 percent with the Finns in their effort to stave off invasion of their own soil. That American sympathy by now is axiomatic * * *.

"The Soviet Union, as a matter of practical fact, as everybody knows, who has the courage to face the fact, the practical fact known to you and known to all the world, is run by a dictatorship as absolute as any other dictatorship in the world. It has allied itself with another dictatorship and it has invaded a neighbor so infinitesimally small that it could do no conceivable, possible harm to the Soviet Union, a small nation that seeks only to live at peace as a democracy, and a liberal, forward-looking democracy at that."

Winston Churchill said in a speech in January of the same year: "The service rendered by Finland to mankind is magnificent."

The American press outdid itself in praising Finnish valor, and New York audiences applauded There Shall Be No Night, the Pulitzer prize-winning play by Robert E. Sherwood on Finland's battle against a totalitarian aggressor. Mr. Sherwood is now Director of Overseas Operations of the Office of War Information, charged with making our democratic ideology plain to our enemies.

In Sherwood's preface to the published version of There Shall Be No Night, written on September 13, 1940, he said: "Here was a decent little democracy, which had paid its debts and played no part in any of the vicious European intrigues, ruthlessly assaulted by an overwhelmingly superior force and gallantly fighting for its own freedom. There could be only one reason for America's reluctance to give any help to the Finns, and that was abject fear. And if we were in a state of abject fear, then we had already been conquered by the masters of the slave states and we must surrender our birthright." Mr. Sherwood flatly suggested we should have gone actively to Finland's aid against Russia.

As a result of the attack on Finland, Russia became the only country ever expelled from the League of Nations—the last official effort of that unhappy organization to go on record against international aggression.

But in March 1940 Finland, still alone and with no hope of real help from the "sympathetic" world, its soldiers exhausted from constant fighting without relief or reenforcements, its power of waging war at an end, accepted Russian peace terms. To obtain peace, Finland had to cede to Russia 16,173 square miles, or about 12 percent of her territory, and later the Soviet Union brought forth other demands which had not been included in the original peace treaty.

With nearly 500,000 of her people homeless, her cities in ruins, 15,000 to 25,000 of her young men dead on the field of battle, thousands of war orphans and widows and maimed survivors of the struggle, plucky Finland engaged at once in a vast program of reconstruction.

Even in the midst of the hopeless struggle with Russia, it had paid the installment on its war debt to the United States. Now, in peace again, it continued to live up to its reputation for honor, progress, and respectability among the nations of the world.

On June 22, 1941, Hitler attacked Russia. Three hours later Russian planes bombed Finland. The Finnish Government requested an explanation. It received none, but the bombings continued and on June 25 Russia made a full-scale attack.

Those Finns who had tuned into Moscow on their radio had already learned that the purpose of these attacks was to wipe them off the surface of the earth. What could the Finns do under these circumstances? What would America do? What did America do under very similar conditions after Pearl Harbor?

Thus, the Finns went to war. They found themselves, of course, on the same side as the Germans who were attacking Russia. But they were not in spirit a German ally or satellite. And America, you will remember, after Pearl Harbor, entered the war as an actual ally of the nation which President Roosevelt himself has called less than 2 years earlier "a dictatorship as absolute as any other dictatorship in the world." The ideological line has become badly crossed by the terrible necessities of power politics.

Last winter the Finns attempted to negotiate with the Russians in the hope of obtaining an armistice, but the minimum terms presented by the Soviet Government constituted an actual physical impossibility and could not have been proposed with any desire for acceptance. Nor would the Russians hear of a Finnish counter-proposal or engage in any bilateral discussion of possible terms.

An example of the minimum Russian demands is an indemnity from Finland of $600,000,000 American dollars, payable over a period of 5 years in goods. The total annual national income of Finland is less than $600,000,000 and such an indemnity could be paid—if at all—only if every Finn became an abject slave and a drudge for Russia.

Some of the other Russian demands, to anyone at all familiar with European history, were equally unacceptable to any country which wished to retain its national independence.

It is to be remembered, of course, that in this second chapter of her war with Russia, Finland has occupied only the territory which was stolen from her in 1940, and such additional marginal land as had to be taken as a protection against a Russian counterattack. Finland did not engage in the assault on Leningrad. Its armies have not undertaken an offensive since 1941.

Recently the State Department criticized the Finnish Government for the alleged suppression of a Swedish-language pro-Allied newspaper. But Finland was attacked by one ally, Russia, and another ally, England, has declared war on her. How would Americans feel if a Russian-language newspaper, which favored the Japanese, because Russia is still on cordial terms with Japan, were being published in America? We would suppress such a paper instantly. Isn't there every justification for Finland to suppress a publication which supports the countries which are at war with her and will not give her possible terms for peace?

Now you ask about Finland's post-war position. The only answer I can give is that Finland is as much a victim of aggression as Poland, Belgium, the Netherlands or any of the small countries of Europe which American soldiers are now fighting and dying to liberate. Finland is not on the side of the Axis, but on the side of all free people everywhere who are willing to defend and, if necessary, die for their freedom and national integrity.

We are not, for example, fighting for communism because we are fighting with Russia. We are fighting to protect our country, and appreciate the support of the Russians with all our hearts. Finland is not fighting for nazi-ism because she is fighting with Germany. She is fighting for the independence of Finland.

Under the Atlantic Charter, under all our sacred pledges, under our avowed war aims and the avowed war aims of our allies, under the prayers we have addressed to God in asking His aid in this war, Finland and the Finns should be free to pursue their own national destiny in peace and security.

But this is only an extended preamble. The best and only possible answer to your question about Finland in the post-war world was given by Winston Churchill in January 1940.

Mr. Churchill said in a speech at that time: "We cannot tell what the fate of Finland may be, but no more mournful spectacle could be presented to what is left to civilized mankind than that this splendid northern race should be at last worn down and reduced to servitude worse than death by the dull brutish force of overwhelming numbers. If the light of freedom which still burns so brightly in the frozen north should be finally quenched, it might well herald a return to the Dark Ages, when every vestige of human progress during 2,000 years would be engulfed."

What Mr. Churchill said in 1940 was true then and is true today and will be true in the post-war world and forever, as long as freemen are considered better than slaves and courage a higher virtue than submissiveness.

The only possible justification of Russia's two attacks on Finland is its nationalistic claim to a necessary security sphere. But today or tomorrow Russian security will never lie in the erection of a human wall, a wall composed of Finns and Poles and Latvians and Lithuanians and Estonians, to absorb the punishment of Russia's continental enemies. It will lie in the destruction of German military power for time out of mind. The United Nations have pledged themselves to the effective disarmament of Germany, and on this, and this alone, does the security of western Russia depend. In a post-war world of international cooperation, as expressed in the Moscow Agreements with a demilitarized Germany, Russia would have no need to seize Finnish territory or interfere in the internal affairs of Finland. Stalin's attitude on this one question, and on the other current Baltic problems, is the measure of his faith in the Moscow Agreements, and the measure of his faith in American will to participate in the policing of a conquered Germany. I do not feel he need doubt America's willingness to see that an aggressive Germany shall not arise again, nor America's willingness to cooperate with a friendly, nonaggressive Russia.

The security of Russia is of great importance to the whole world, but so is the security of Finland. For we have seen, in two world wars, that one nation's security cannot be purchased at the cost of extinction of another. But should the final decision be an expedient one, should Finland and Poland and the Baltic states be placed on the auction block in the interests of temporary international political tranquility, then the seeds of World War No. 3 have been planted.

Surely our Government and the governments of our allies can persuade the Russians that we will work with them so closely and so realistically in drawing up the pattern of a secure and peaceful post-war world that there will be no need for Russia to deprive its neighbors of freedom in order to safeguard its own borders. The question of little Finland's future is part of the tremendous question which this war is being fought to answer for all time: the question of whether might or justice will rule the world.

I hope with all my heart that the United Nations will answer that question wisely.

Sincerely,

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE.

P. S.—I believe it to be of the utmost significance that Russia has marked the opening of the second front in Europe by Anglo-American forces, not so much to launch a large-scale attack against Germany through Poland but to knock Finland out completely. This recalls the first week of June 1941. However, military necessity may dictate this move completely. All the world hopes so.

Ten Years of F. H. A. Mortgage Insurance Operations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRENT SPENCE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, 10 years ago Congress passed the National Housing Act which was approved on June 27, 1934. Since that time, in accordance with the declared purpose of the act, more than 6,000,000 American families have been enabled to improve their housing standards and conditions. Private capital to the extent of $7,500,000,000 has been invested by the Nation's financial institutions in home mortgages and loans insured by the Federal Housing Administration.

During the past 10 years industry has benefited directly and indirectly by the revival of the home building which followed the enactment of the National Housing Act. Communities throughout the Nation have profited by the prompt collection of real-estate taxes on properties financed with insured mortgages. Our war program has benefited by the major contribution made by private enterprise in the production of war housing under the F. H. A. insured mortgage plan.

The insurance of mortgages and loans in the home-financing field, authorized by the National Housing Act, has been an unusual Government venture. Here, instead of Government control of private business we have an outstandingly successful example of Government cooperation with private enterprise. Relying upon private capital and initiative for results, the Government has merely extended its support through insurance of private home credit transactions. The venture further is unusual in that the Federal Housing Administration is a Government agency that is paying its own way.

Confident of the fundamental soundness of the National Housing Act, Congress in 1934 authorized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make available to the F. H. A. sufficient funds to inaugurate the program. Within 3 years the F. H. A. was paying part of its administrative expenses out of income obtained from insurance premiums, fees, and interest on its investments. And, within 5 years after the beginning of its mortgage insurance operations the F. H. A. was independent of the Public Treasury. Since June 30, 1940, the F. H. A. has not only paid all of its operating expenses, and its mortgage insurance losses, but also annually has added surplus income to the mortgage insurance reserves which now aggregate $81,000,000.

When the National Housing Act was passed 10 years ago American homes were being allowed to fall into disrepair and were not being kept abreast of modern improvements. Workers in the building trades were unemployed and the building industry was at its lowest production level in many years. Mortgage money was frozen almost solid; channels of credit open to home owners were practically nonexistent. The repercussions of a major down-swing in real estate values had reached proportions of a national calamity.

Within a decade conditions in the home-building field have completely changed. American families have been able to obtain more than four and one-half million F. H. A.-insured short-term personal credit loans for property improvement or maintenance. Approximately 1,350,000 families have been able to build or buy homes that are modern and financed within the borrowers' earning capacity. Until the war demands necessitated curtailment of the use of critical materials, aggressive measures used to bring the F. H. A. insurance programs before the public engendered an additional large volume of property improvements and new construction. As a result building activity was stimulated; workers in the building trades left relief rolls; and the wheels of the building and allied industries started to turn again producing materials and equipment used in the construction of hundreds of thousands of American homes.

The benefits of home-building activity have been far reaching. Our natural resources—the mines and forests—were reopened to produce the materials and equipment used by the building industry. Transportation of all kinds was required to carry raw materials and finished products across the country. New homes and improvements meant new furnishings—an important stimulant to the furniture, textile, and related industries. Builders, building supply dealers, professional workers, real-estate operators, and a host of others found new opportunities as a result of the home-building activity that accompanied the release of private investment funds.

A prime objective of the National Housing Act was to provide home owners with an economical, dependable, sound source of credit. It was designed to bring our home-financing system out of a chaotic condition and restore it on an improved basis, able to meet the legitimate demands of the borrowing public. Through the judgment and integrity with which the act has been administered by the Federal Housing Administration these objectives have been accomplished within a relatively short time.

Under the F. H. A.-insured mortgage plan, home owners today have the security of fully amortized long-term single mortgages obtained at lowest cost in history. Instead of mortgages representing 50 or 60 percent of the property value with second and third mortgages piled on top, often at usurious interest rates, home owners today are able to obtain one loan up to 80 or 90 percent of the F. H. A. property valuation. Instead of mortgages due in 3 to 5 years, with uncertain and high renewal fees, home owners today can obtain mortgages payable in monthly installments over a period up to 20 or 25 years without need of renewal and without paying a premium for that privilege. The F. H. A. has succeeded in reducing the interest rate on the mortgages it insures to the point that the average home owner can pay for his property, pay the interest, taxes, hazard insurance, and mortgage insurance at an average monthly cost of about $37—often less than he would pay for renting a comparable house.

The F. H. A. affords home owners a measure of protection never before available and nowhere else now available. For the first time in history inexperienced home owners have an unbiased agency to which they can turn for aid to avoid the dangers and pitfalls of home ownership. Home owners for the first time have the benefit of impartial appraisal of their properties by trained valuators. Through the insured-mortgage system home owners may obtain better planned, better built, and better financed homes than ever before—homes built in attractive, well-planned neighborhoods.

In financing their home purchases with F. H. A. insured mortgages borrowers have the satisfaction of knowing that they are buying a home upon a basis that is within their earning power. Reducing the number of properties sold at a sacrifice as a result of the borrower having bought beyond his means, it also has proven an effective aid in stabilizing the real-estate market.

In addition to the tangible benefits that have accrued to individual home owners, builders, and industry through the National Housing Act, there have been major benefits to the national economy. Within a 10-year period the F. H. A. has not only made home financing possible at uniformly low cost throughout the entire country, but has made insured home mortgages marketable securities any place in the Nation. This is a remarkable accomplishment, for previously it had always been assumed that mortgage transfers were almost exclusively limited to local transactions.

While the great bulk of insured loans have been originated and held by local financial institutions, a sound, dependable secondary market for insured home mortgages has been developed. The marketable quality of these mortgages has resulted from uniform methods of underwriting, requirements of good building and property standards, and the establishment of these mortgage loans on a sound investment basis. Backed by the United States Government, these loans are safe investments that can be bought and sold with confidence by financial institutions at any time, in any place.

To stabilize home-mortgage financing the National Housing Act recognized that home mortgages must be marketable. To this end the act provided for the chartering of national mortgage associations empowered to deal in insured mortgages. The soundness of that feature of the act has been demonstrated by the formation and activity of the Federal National Mortgage Association which has provided the necessary mechanism to assure the marketability of these mortgages. The creation of a secondary mortgage market has been effective in bringing an ample supply of home mortgage funds on F. H. A. terms to all sections of the country.

Insured mortgages brought within the range of conservative investment have provided financial institutions with a profitable outlet for funds that had previously been difficult to place. These funds—largely the savings of millions of depositors—are safeguarded by mortgage insurance. Home mortgages thus have been given an investment status that provides financial institutions with assets or collateral upon which to obtain emergency loans. In case of foreclosure, the insured-mortgage plan provides lending institutions with negotiable interest-bearing securities in place of temporarily unmarketable properties. Safeguarded by mortgage insurance some 9,000 national banks, State bank and trust companies, insurance companies, savings and loan associations, and other financial agencies have been enabled to invest nearly $6,000,000,000 in over a million and a quarter long-term amortized mortgages on residential properties.

The war has emphasized the emergency value of the National Housing Act. Without mortgage insurance private capital would not have assumed the risks involved in financing housing built in rapidly expanding war-industry areas. Through the application of techniques and insuring policies successfully developed by the F. H. A. under peacetime conditions, private industry has been enabled to build approximately 330,000 dwelling units for occupancy by essential workers in war industries. It has been estimated that loans of over a billion and a half dollars insured by the F. H. A. have financed at least 85 percent of the Nation's privately financed wartime emergency-housing needs, and have relieved the Federal Government of the immediate outlay of this large sum of money.

Losses experienced under the National Housing Act thus far have been low. Out of more than four and one-half million property improvement loans insured in 10 years, defaulted notes have numbered only 4 percent of the total volume. Recoveries on these defaulted notes have reduced total claims paid by F. H. A. to 1½ percent of the total amount insured. In 10 years the F. H. A. has found it necessary to take possession of only 4,000 properties—virtually all of which have been sold—out of 1,055,000 mortgages insured under title II of the act. Losses chargeable to the handling of these properties have been more than offset by the $3,700,000 in prepayment premiums paid by mortgagors who have paid their mortgages in full prior to maturity. Out of 356 large-scale housing projects financed with insured mortgages, the F. H. A. has been forced to take possession of only 18. Out of nearly 250,000 mortgages on war housing insured, the F. H. A. has had to take over less than 1,500 to date.

On the occasion of the F. H. A.'s tenth anniversary Congress should be congratulated on its wisdom and farsightedness in enacting this highly successful piece of legislation. F. H. A.'s 10-year experience will be invaluable in providing the facilities for financing the large volume of housing that must be built after the war ends. F. H. A. also will be in a position to aid the financing of the large amount of repairs and improvements to dwelling properties that have of necessity been deferred during the war period. It has been demonstrated that insured mortgage and loan financing is a powerful stimulant to the vital home-building industry. The National Housing Act provides the means whereby private industry can immediately begin to function—go from a war to peace basis, and put men to work in peacetime occupations—after victory is achieved.

The Honeybee Goes to War—Beeswax Needed for War Uses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, northwestern Minnesota is a territory of bread and milk and honey truly in fact. We raised considerable wheat and we produced a lot of milk and honey last year, and we will again this year along with many other farm crops.

In the 15 counties of the Ninth District, there are almost 400 individual farmers and city people who keep bees for honey production. Bees are doing their part in the war effort, because the products which are made from honey are essential in the production of numerous war articles. Beeswax is needed for war uses.

A statement with reference to this was recently issued by the War Food Administration of the Department of Agriculture, which reported that more than a million pounds of beeswax a year are needed for use in war products—in adhesive tape used for sealing shells—as waterproofing and protective coatings for shells, belts, coils, and machinery, especially when shipped into warm climates where ordinary grease would run off—and as protective coverings for our fighting planes.

Because it is of great interest to bee keepers of the Nation and the public as well, I herewith insert a copy of a radio address delivered sometime ago by Mr. James W. Gwinn, president of the American Honey Producers League, of Madison, Wis. The speech, which was entitled "The Honeybee Goes to War," follows:

Because of the increased production of livestock and livestock products brought about by the war emergency, the Government suggests large increases of all legume seeds. At least 28 percent more alsike seed and 54 percent more red cloverseed should be produced. Wisconsin and Minnesota produce large quantities of these seeds and should contribute its share of this increased program.

Red, alsike, and white dutch clovers are practically self-sterile and depend on cross-pollination to produce seed. Research at many experiment stations—particularly Ohio—shows that when pollination insects are excluded from clover blossoms, not more than one to three seeds develop per head. Under maximum honey-bee pollination, alsike enclosed in cages, yielded 120 to 155 seeds per head. This would represent from 15 to 20 bushels per acre.

Research studies in many seed-growing localities reveal that natural pollinating insects, such as bumblebees, solitary bees, flies, butterflies, etc., are entirely too few to insure profitable seed crops of alsike and red clover. Such fields would have to be cut for hay because of poor seed set. The magnitude of the work of pollinating an acre of alsike clover is apparent when we consider that there may be from 300,000,000 to 500,000,000 blossoming florets per acre. It has been found that when a field of alsike were within a mile of a commercial yard of bees ranging from 40 to 200 colonies, the number of seeds per clover head was from 41 to 90.

Experimental work has also shown an alarming scarcity of natural pollinating insects on red-clover bloom. Bumblebees are our best red-clover pollinators, but because they are so few in number, they cannot be depended on. Of the more than 20 different kinds of insects that pollinate red clover, the honeybees are responsible for from 75 to 85 percent of such work; bumblebees 13 to 17 percent, and all others 2 to 5 percent.

White dutch clover, so desirable in pastures, are largely dependent on honeybees for pollination and the production of seed. During the drought years of 1930, 1934, and 1936, these shallow-rooted clovers were killed. In those areas where honeybees were plentiful volunteer crops appeared as soon as moisture and weather conditions were favorable, due to the fact there were seeds in the soil.

The most immediate method for meeting the clover-seed quota suggested by the Government, is for farmers located within 1½ miles of commercial bee yards, to place every emphasis on clover-seed production.

Throughout the southern and eastern part of Wisconsin, and in parts of Minnesota there are hundreds of commercial bee yards ranging from 40 to 100 colonies of bees in a yard. Each colony of bees which has been well managed, should contain 60,000 or more worker bees. Thus where 40 to 100 colonies are located, there would be concentrated at a focal point from 2,400,000 to 600,000,000 of the best type of pollinating insects available.

At best, red clover is a poor seed producer. During favorable years clover seed yields 2 to 4 bushels per acre for red clover and from 4 to 7 bushels per acre for alsike clover, providing there are enough pollination insects present to insure cross-pollination of the clover.

What has been said about cross-pollinating legumes is just as applicable for fruits and vegetables. Most people have some appreciation that the honey bees are the only source of honey and beeswax. Few realize, however, that although the beekeeping industry in the United States produces in excess of 200,000,000 pounds of honey and 4,000,000 pounds of beeswax annually—these are merely byproducts—and that its principal role is in the pollination of many agricultural crops for the production of seed and fruit. Without the help of insects to effect pollination, many species of plants will not set seed or produce fruit no matter how well they are cultivated, fertilized, and protected from disease and pests.

The following fruits and vegetables are more or less dependent upon the honeybee for cross-pollinating agency; apples, apricots, blackberries, raspberries, blueberries, cranberries, gooseberries (who wants gooseberries?), grapes, cucumbers, peaches, pears, muskmelons, plums, strawberries, watermelons, asparagus, broccoli, brussels sprouts, buckwheat, cabbage, carrots, cauliflower, kale, kohlrabi, onions, peppers, pumpkins, radishes, rutabaga, turnips, etc. To make myself clear, we do not need the honeybee to grow the aforesaid crops, but we do need the honeybee to fertilize the seed that produces these crops.

As has been previously pointed out, the natural pollinating insects, such as bumblebees, solitary bees, flies, butterflies, etc., are too few to insure adequate pollination. The reasons for their scarcity are several; as the elimination of the old rail fences, heavy grazing, forest, brush, and grass fires, increased areas of cultivation, rotation of farm crops, drainage of swamp lands, good roads and fast automobile travel. Do you recall the dead insects on your windshields and clogged radiators? Poisoning from insecticides.

When nature shows a proper balance between plants and pollinating insects, both plants and the insects flourish. Agricultural development, however, has seriously interfered with this balance. It has demanded the growing of certain plants in enormous acreages, and unwittingly, destroyed native pollinating insects, as well as their nesting places. As a result the burden of pollination has been increased to such an extent that wild bees are no longer adequate or dependable, particularly where agriculture is highly developed.

Then owing to conditions brought about by the present war, the beekeeping industry must be safeguarded. Beekeeping can be mastered only through years of experience. It cannot be learned as a trade. The fact that bees have a propensity for stinging, discourages many persons from keeping bees, and only certain persons possess the proper temperament to be beekeepers.

The Government needs honey and they need it badly. The Government needs beeswax, they need it badly, too. Most of all, it is imperative we have the best possible pollinating agency—the honey bee that we may secure better seeds, fruits, and vegetables—so "the honeybee goes to war."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem, by John Henry Curtin, from the Las Vegas Morning Tribune, Las Vegas, Nev., of June 6, 1944:

IN MEMORIAM

Underneath a shattered palm tree on a sandy, wave-lapped shore
Lies a husky lad of 20—maybe less or maybe more.
He is just the sort of youngster you have seen on your home street;
And, if you were halfway friendly, he was mighty nice to meet.
You have seen him on the football team you have in your high school;
Or maybe playing basketball, quite snappy as a rule.
He wasn't any angel, and he wasn't very bad;
Just the normal sort of youngster you would like to call you "Dad."
You may go ahead and praise him, but he won't hear what is said;
For, although it seems he's sleeping, the trouble is—he's dead!
He's "the price we pay for victory" in counting up the cost;
He's the simple, silent reason that we won instead of lost.
They can't hear our lovely speeches, as we decorate the graves;
But these dead upon the beaches kept us all from being slaves.
So, I wonder, in memoriam, recalling sacrifice,
If we can't do more than utter empty words that sound so nice.
For the lad beneath the palm tree, and our brave dead everywhere,
Will sleep in peaceful slumber—when we show we really care!

Bankhead Amendments to the Price-Control Bill

OF

HON. BRENT SPENCE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Fred M. Vinson, Director of the Office of Economic Stabilization, on June 5, 1944:

The Senate Banking and Currency Committee, over the protest of a minority of its members, has reported out a bill to extend our price-control and stabilization laws. Included in the bill thus reported out is the Bankhead amendment.

This amendment is designed to increase the price of all cotton textiles. It will not add a red cent to what the cotton grower is now getting and it will cost consumers hundreds of millions of dollars. The only group that can benefit from this amendment are the textile mills, already making profits nine times as great as they made before the war.

So far as the cotton grower is concerned, present ceiling prices of cotton textile products are already at levels which enable the mills to pay parity prices for cotton. The consumer is already paying for parity cotton. The farmer is not getting parity, however, which means that the mills are keeping part of the return supposed to go to the grower. The mills are able to get cotton cheap because, while supplies are large, the manpower they can get has been falling off and the amount of cotton they can use is decreasing.

The further increase in the prices which the Bankhead amendment would compel consumers to pay will not increase the manpower in the industry, will not increase the amount of cotton which the mills can use, and will therefore add not 1 cent to the cotton farmer's income. It will simply increase the already high profits of the mills.

Even if the farmer could get parity through this amendment—which he can't—it would be a thoroughly bad way of doing the job. For the Bankhead amendment will increase the returns to the mills by $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 a year, while it would cost only $50,000,000 a year to pay parity prices to the farmer. What sense does it make to give the mills $4 in order to enable them to pay one? And there is nothing to indicate that they will pay even the $1 though they receive the four. If they aren't paying parity now, although they are financially able to do so, they won't pay it under the Bankhead amendment.

In 1943 the cotton textile industry earned nine times the dollar profits it averaged in peacetime. The industry earned 33 percent on its net worth, that is, what the owners actually had invested in the business. This compares to their peactime return of 4.3 percent. Under the Bankhead amendment, if the mills pay parity prices, their earnings will still be increased to a level 14 times their peacetime average and to 50 percent on the money invested in the business. But if they don't pay parity—and I don't think this amendment will make them pay parity—then for the first 4 months after passage of the act the mills will be earning at an annual rate 16 times their peacetime average and at an annual return of 60 percent on net worth.

There is a simple and direct way of getting a parity price for the cotton grower. That is by increasing the loan rate on cotton. An amendment to do this has also been reported out by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. If this amendment is enacted the grower's problem is solved, solved the only way that is possible and solved without presenting consumers with a second bill for parity and without further inflating textile profits, which are already ample to pay the full parity price.

I fully share Senator BANKHEAD's concern about the prices cotton farmers are receiving and the prices consumers are paying. Furthermore, I know that Senator BANKHEAD is absolutely sincere and earnest in his purpose, even though I completely disagree with his amendment. But I can't see any point in going all around Robin Hood's barn when there is a direct route, and I don't see how we shall ever get to our goal if we steadily back away from it.

The Bankhead amendment is a devasting blow at our stabilization policy. If the cotton industry obtains from Congress a special bonus at the housewife's expense, other pressure groups will not let themselves be ignored.

The pressure group parade has started. I earnestly hope the Senate will call an early halt.

Jobs—Who Will Provide and Pay for Them?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, recently the press has carried many statements on the subject of jobs after the war is over. With war production out of the picture, there will be many idle factories, many jobless workers, unless private industry or the Government provides new work.

We know that Government jobs can be paid for only by taxation or borrowing and that borrowing cannot continue indefinitely. That leaves to pay for Government-controlled factories, Government-provided jobs, only taxation to be levied upon the people themselves. It is evident to every thinking person that there is an ever-lessening number of primary producers; that is, tillers of the soil, miners, and those having to do with production directly from the earth. That group cannot continue to bear ever-increasing burdens placed upon them by either Government jobs or jobs at excessive wages.

Now think that through and you will see that the demand that the Government provide, after the war is over, jobs for everyone at union wages, is impossible of realization. Especially is this true if the unions insist that those who have money are to create and maintain the factories and pay the wages demanded by union leadership.

Union leadership constantly refuses to provide jobs but it demands that someone else provide the jobs and pay the wages fixed by it. That just will not work out and the sooner we all face the facts and get on a sound working basis, the quicker the true solution to this very serious problem will come to all of us.

An editorial from the Baltimore Sun of June 2 gives one slant at the problem. That editorial is as follows:

Regard with respect those sit-in workers at the Long Island City plant of the Brewster Aeornautical Corporation. They are pioneers of the new economic order. They have developed a new pressure-group technique, which might be called the strike in reverse. They have put across their point, not by refusing to work, but by refusing to stop work.

More than this, their point itself represents a new labor principle. They have successfully asserted a claim (though it doesn't yet have the status of a legal right) not only to have jobs but to have those jobs where they want them to be and at their current rates of pay.

Where they want them, of course, is at the Long Island City plant of the Brewster company. Representatives of other war industries have made them offers—indeed, would love to hire them. The War Manpower Commission has stated that 11,000 jobs are "immediately available" in the nearby New York City area, more than enough to accommodate the full 9,000 on the Brewster plant lists. But those Brewster employees want to keep on working right where they have been working, and the administration has obediently accepted that proposition. Pressed to it by President Roosevelt himself, the military procurement agencies are trying to rejuggle the military production program to meet the wishes of the Brewster workers.

This is, it must be admitted, a novel complication in the planning of military production. If it becomes an accepted part of the procedure, soon or late it is bound to raise the question whether military production is being undertaken primarily to provide our fighting men with the weapons they need or to suit the convenience of the war workers.

Mr. Speaker, there are many other approaches toward the difficulty which will surely confront us when the war is over and it behooves labor leaders to give some sound, constructive consideration to the problem, instead of making impossible demands.

Japanese on the Pacific Coast

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, there have been constant rumors circulated recently to the effect that the War Relocation Authority was planning to release persons of Japanese descent to return to the Pacific Coast where they have been excluded by military order. In an effort to clarify the situation I recently addressed letters to Henry Stimson, Secretary of War, and Dillon Myer, Director of the W. R. A., asking them to inform me of the official attitude of both agencies on this vexing question.

For the information of the Congress and the country I am inserting herewith the replies which I have received:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, WAR RELOCATION AUTHORITY.

Hon. JOHN Z. ANDERSON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ANDERSON: This will acknowledge your letter of May 31 reporting rumors that evacuees are going to be permitted to return to their homes on the Pacific coast despite objections of the War Department.

The exclusion of persons of Japanese descent is by military order and the order can be revoked only by responsible military authorities. The War Relocation Authority at all times observes the military order. There has been no announcement by the military that the coastal zone is to be reopened to persons of Japanese ancestry. There have been, however, a few instances in which permission to return to the restricted military area has been granted by the Western Defense Command to evacuated persons.

Sincerely,

D. S. MYER,
Director.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington.

Hon. JOHN Z. ANDERSON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ANDERSON: I have your letter of May 31 concerning the War Department's official attitude toward the return of Japanese to prohibited areas.

Under Executive Order 9066, the authority to exclude individuals suspected of subversive or disloyal activities from sensitive areas was given to the War Department and is exercised for California by the commanding general, Western Defense Command. As you know, the present exclusion of persons of Japanese ancestry was undertaken solely for military reasons, it being deemed advisable due to the impossibility of determining quickly the individual loyalty or disloyalty of the large Japanese population in west coast areas.

However, the military necessity for their continued exclusion is under constant study and surveillance by both the War Department and the Western Defense Command, and any forthcoming changes in policy which would result in the return of such persons will hinge entirely on changes in the military situation. Consequently, it is impossible to predict at this time when the War Department estimate of the situation will warrant their return to the west coast. Obviously, we are maintaining constant liaison with the War Relocation Authority and other Government agencies and are keeping them currently informed of the War Department's policy on exclusion.

I trust this will serve your purposes and appreciate your bringing your concern over the matter to my personal attention.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

Service Folks Should Be Allowed More Gasoline When Home on Furloughs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, it is my desire and intention to offer an amendment to the Emergency Price Control Act today, but I was advised that my amendment would have been ruled out on a point of order. Therefore, I take this occasion to advise the House relative to my amendment even though it could not be considered.

My amendment was as follows:

Such act of October 2, 1942, as amended, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. —. The Administrator is hereby directed to put into effect a schedule of gasoline rations for members of the armed forces while on furlough, giving due consideration to whether the applicant has been on overseas duty or stationed within the continental limits of the United States, and further scheduling one amount for the first furlough in any 1 year, and lesser amounts for a second or subsequent furlough in any 1 year."

The least the country can do to show its appreciation for the sacrifices of returning servicemen is give them a decent allowance of gasoline. The paltry 5 gallons allowed at the present time is shameful and a disgrace considering the automobiles one sees regularly at race tracks and other places of recreation on the home front. The reason a man is given a furlough by the Army or Navy is that he may have a rest at some lake resort or seaside, a hunting trip or a visit to friends or relatives in the country.

To my way of thinking, extra gasoline used by a furloughed overseas serviceman is "essential driving" and he should be given an adequate amount—even at the sacrifice of home front pleasure seekers.

This amendment would also correct what I feel is a very unfair arrangement under the present system of doling out furlough gasoline.

At the present time a serviceman may be so fortunate as to be stationed at a camp near his home and receive frequent furloughs. He might be able to get 5 gallons of furlough gasoline each time he comes home. Another soldier from the same town may be stationed at a camp in the extreme part of the country and only get one furlough in a year. He only gets 5 gallons.

I feel that the Administrator should set up a schedule of say 15 gallons of furlough gasoline for the first furlough in any one year, 10 for the second furlough, and 5 for the third, or some proportionate schedule. It is most unfair to the man returning from overseas on his first furlough in 2 years to receive only 5 gallons for his rest period in which he may desire to go fishing, hunting, or visiting, or get away at some quiet lake where he can forget what he has been through. I hope my amendment will carry.

The following editorial from the Fergus Falls (Minn.) Journal brings out the absurdity of the present system:

TREATING ALL ALIKE?

A Minneapolis paper tells of a soldier, Sgt. Lynn Channing, who came home on a 30-day furlough after 18 months fighting in the South Pacific. His brother offered him the use of his car and told him he could secure some gasoline from the Minneapolis ration board. He went to the board, and was told he could have 5 gallons of gas. That was the rule for soldiers home on furlough.

While waiting in line to present his application, he had talked with a young soldier from Fort Snelling, who told him he had had three furloughs in 6 weeks and had gotten 5 gallons allotments each time. The soldier home from overseas battles was entitled to only 5 gallons after 18 months.

The matter has been carried to higher authorities and an exception will probably be made in his case, but the story brings out glaringly the absurdity of some governmental rules and regulations.

To the Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article entitled "To the Flag" by Bishop Richard J. Cushing, D. D., administrator of the archdiocese of Boston, which appeared in the Boston Sunday Advertiser, June 11, 1944:

TO THE FLAG

(By Bishop Richard J. Cushing, D. D., administrator of the archdiocese of Boston)

Flag Day. Every day is flag day, yet we have done well to dedicate one day as no other in the year is dedicated.

Many are the interpretations of the red, white, and blue, but the whole has but one meaning—union. Union in itself is beautiful, but we do not live or die for a mere union; union is nothing without its purpose. Men are united in one State for the purpose of working their way back to the Heavenly Father who made them. If there were no purpose beyond the State itself, the tragedy would be dark indeed. Where the divine purpose is clear, the man who fights lives a life of flag days, face to face with the things of the soul. And those that die, die well. For they go to death full of the love of life, knowingly sacrificing their will to the inscrutable goodness of God.

Let us also learn from them. For the sacrifice they are so plainly making in these days of the invasion is the same that underlies our own daily decisions. Every union involves sacrifice. Because our flag expresses the Union of the United States, it expresses some sacrifice of sovereignty by every State—a sacrifice of liberty by every citizen. And the fruit of sacrifice is peace.

This is our consolation as the crosses are planted in foreign fields, and to family after family comes the word that one they loved has made the supreme sacrifice for flag and country. These loved ones have found their way home to their Heavenly Father and the fruit of their sacrifice will be peace.

Without the offering of these young lives, there could be no peace.

"Our hearts to you, our country,
And take the pledge we give,
To love, to bear, to suffer,
To die that you may live;
And though beneath your banner
We fall, our names untold,
Thank God, if we have filled it
With service stars of gold."

Support Price Victory

OF

HON. ALBERT GORE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Tennessee Farm Bureau News of July 3, 1941:

ALBERT GORE SCORES VICTORY ON C. C. C. BILL—FARM BUREAU BACKS GORE'S BILL TO PROVIDE FOR AT LEAST 85 PERCENT PARITY ON C. C. C. PURCHASE FOOD. IS SUCCESSFUL

The farm bloc in Congress won another major victory recently with the passage of an amendment to the appropriations bill for purchase of food for relief and for distribution to other nations under the Lend-Lease Act providing that no purchases be made at less than 85 percent of parity.

This is designed to give protection to producers of nonbasic commodities similar to that provided basic crops under the C. C. C. 85 percent parity loans.

This measure was written and introduced by one of our own State's most able Congressmen, ALBERT GORE of the Fourth District. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, threw the strength of organized agriculture behind the measure when it was up for consideration before the committees of the Senate and House.

High praise for Congressman GORE'S work to protect the income of agriculture was voiced by Mr. O'Neal, and passage of the amendment marked the completion of another great victory for agriculture during this session of Congress.

As first introduced by Mr. GORE, the measure provided for 100 percent parity, but stiff administration opposition to this plan brought about a conference between the opposing groups, with all agreeing upon 85 percent. However, it should be pointed out that with no action, those in charge could have hammered down prices to any figure they desired, which would have been very injurious to producers.

In view of the seemingly changed attitude of the administration toward farm prices, the enactment of this law is particularly significant, for many agricultural leaders have been puzzled by recent administration attempts to keep farm prices low, after striving for 8 years to raise prices.

A Soldier's Wife Writes a Letter on Her Babe's Second Birthday

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Las Vegas Morning Tribune, Las Vegas, Nev., of June 6, 1944:

A SOLDIER'S WIFE WRITES A LETTER ON HER BABE'S SECOND BIRTHDAY

To the EDITOR:

This is a letter which a young Las Vegas mother has just written to her little daughter in the East.

Not only because the writing is a piece of literary art but because it helps to show us civilians the great sacrifice which our servicemen and their families are making on our behalf, I have secured permission of the young mother to send it to you. I hope you will be able to print it.

A. B.

DARLING DAUGHTER CAROL: Tomorrow is your second birthday and your mother and daddy are far away from you—a whole continent between us. Your daddy is out on bivouac this lovely June evening.

Two years ago tonight he was at work at this time and I was preparing to go to the hospital to bring you into this beautiful world of sunshine, singing birds and nodding flowers in the wind.

Would that I might see you tonight and tomorrow and have you here with me. Your daddy has seen so little of you since you were 3 months old that he sometimes feels you are not his but, never fear, he loves you every bit as I do and longs to have you here with us.

Often we cry at night when we are waiting for the sandman to come. You think it unmanly for your daddy to cry? We love you, Carol, but we are too poor to have you here now, but it won't be long before I shall go back East to fetch you out here for we really aren't happy without you.

Some day, perhaps, you will read this letter written this brilliant moonlight night. Perhaps you will have a glimmering of the heartbreak your daddy and your mommy suffer when you aren't with them.

Perhaps you will be able to understand somewhat the meaning of all the tears that are shed. Then someday you may fall in love, marry the man and know just why your mommy left you with your grandparents when she went West to live with your daddy for how long she did not know.

Our Father in Heaven has guided your daddy and your mommy in almost everything they have done.

Without His constant watchfulness and loving care we would have made many more mistakes than we have even thus far. May He be your constant guide also, Carol, and may you always look to Him in your joy, in your sorrow and in your perplexities.

Of the latter you will probably have many, and your deepest joy will be born of your most heartrending grief. In all these things may you never lose faith, my daughter.

Almost 2 months ago I left you asleep in your crib. I kissed you as I had tucked you in for your afternoon nap. I closed the door as I had done many a time before. You did not know that your mommy would be gone when you awakened.

I walked out of the house with a heavy heart for I knew I would not see you for a long time.

You asked for me every day for a long time. You used to go to the window and watch for me to come home. (You had often done that when I was at home with you.)

How could you know a war was being fought, that your daddy was away across the country teaching in an Army camp? How could you understand that he needed mommy for he might not stay in the States too long?

Your baby heart knew its first real lonesomeness those first weeks of our separation.

I pray tonight, dear Carol, that those weeks that have stretched into 2 months may not stretch too much further. I pray for your safe keeping until I can be with you once more to care for you myself as a mother ought to do. I pray that you will not have forgotten me completely by now.

When we were at home together I cried at night, you didn't know, because your daddy was not with us, or we with him.

Now that he and I are together we need you here, too, to make the family complete. We have done the best we know how to do under all circumstances.

May we be forgiven if our choices have been erroneous.

When the day comes that we can all be together again living a more normal life, the one hope and desire in our minds and hearts is to be the very best parents we know how to be so that you in your turn may also be a good parent, a good citizen, a real person.

Good night, my baby daughter. May the good Lord bless you all the days of your life. Happy birthday tomorrow and all the tomorrows that follow.

Your daddy and your mommy love you very much.

YOUR MOTHER.

Henry Bascom Steagall

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. ANDREWS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. HENRY BASCOM STEAGALL, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. ANDREWS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, when the great, loving, and kind heart of the late HENRY B. STEAGALL throbbed for the last time, the Third Congressional District of the State of Alabama, and the State of Alabama—yea, this Nation—sacrificed to eternity and immortality one of our truly great sons.

HENRY STEAGALL, aptly termed the "man who stabilized America's banking system" and "the farmers' best friend," died on the battle front of this House floor. Fully aware of his serious physical condition, he came to the floor to deliver one of the greatest speeches of his career in a cause that he believed was right. He spoke even though his friends and family members urged him to take care. Yes, he spoke, and when he had concluded there was an ovation—a response from both sides of the aisle—the like of which has seldom been heard in these Halls.

In his last speech, as he was being frequently interrupted in the debate of the highly controversial subsidies legislation, Mr. STEAGALL said:

I do not believe there is anybody in the House who knows me who thinks there is any sectionalism or bitterness in my soul. I do not believe there is anyone who knows me who could credit me with selfish partisan purposes in my views. * * * I am speaking for the people of the section of the country with which I am best acquainted.

These were not words in defense of himself but words in defense of his position. HENRY STEAGALL was speaking of the section of the country he knew best. He was thinking of those people who for 30 years had sent him to Congress. Mr. STEAGALL, having served faithfully, had served long. He was a man who typified the American representative system functioning on a high level.

A review of the legislation that bears his name is indicative of the strong place HENRY STEAGALL has had in the history of our Nation for more than a quarter of a century. Elected to the Sixty-fourth Congress, he served continuously until his death. As chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of this great body, he wielded a power that has left an everlasting impression on our great Nation. As a legislative strategist, HENRY STEAGALL has known few equals and no superiors.

HENRY STEAGALL, the profound student of government, took great pride, and rightly, in his representation of the common man—the little fellow. His sponsorship of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act was a dream that came to realization after 20 years of thoughtful activity on the subject. When he came to Congress in 1913, Mr. STEAGALL often said, it was with a determination to formulate some legislation to protect those people who had small deposits in small banks.

If people are going to continue to put their little savings into banks, the greatest service I can render them is to make it possible for them to get those hard-earned savings back.

The belief became with him a life-long ambition and conviction. This conviction became the law of the land in 1933.

Representing a district that is 90-percent agricultural, Mr. STEAGALL earned the name "the farmers' friend" without serving on the Agricultural Committee. His potency as a legislative strategist, his authority as a leader in this House, his courage as a fighter-to-the-finish, was best displayed when the cause of the farmer and agricultural interests were at stake. He knew when to act and what to do and the farmer never suffered for having HENRY STEAGALL as his Representative.

A great statesman, rightly one of Alabama's favorite and most illustrious sons, a man who wrote his name in a life that will stand as a shining symbol to those of us who follow in his wake, was HENRY STEAGALL.

In my humble opinion, one of the finest qualities in the life of HENRY STEAGALL was his ability to make and keep friends. To know him was to love him, and he will live forever in the minds and hearts of his friends.

The heart of a friend never wonders or doubts,
No matter if years intervene;
The old faith is there and naught can compare
With the comfort it gives though unseen.

Yes, the heart of a friend is the one thing I prize
As life lengthens and twilight descends;
It's the last boon I'll ask when I've finished my task,
That I live in the hearts of my friends.

Supreme Court Decisions

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article, by John Griffin, which appeared in the Boston Sunday Post, Boston, Mass., June 11, 1944:

SUPREME COURT ABANDONS EXPERIENCE AND PRECEDENT IN ITS RECENT DECISIONS—MAKING OF MAJOR FINDINGS BY SMALL MINORITY INCREASES GROWING LACK OF FAITH ON PART OF GENERAL PUBLIC

(By John Griffin)

Up until comparatively recently it was possible to tell within reasonable limits how the Supreme Court of the United States would function in making its findings. Most lawyers had some idea of how the court would rule, knowing that it would generally follow precedent and experience.

Lately, however, it is about as easy to predict which way a fly will take off as it is to anticipate the Court's actions, for under the present set-up there seems to be little continuity of action and thinking.

Some of the members of the Court have openly expressed their contempt for the thoughts of other members, and on at least one occasion a member has ridiculed the thinking of other members.

NEW IMPORTANT CASE

The most recent case which has focused attention more than ever on the rulings of the Court is the decision that interstate insurance business comes under the Sherman Antitrust Act.

This decision overrules a decision made by the Court years ago, which in itself is not perhaps too surprising, inasmuch as the present Court does not appear to have a great regard for previous decisions; but in this case it is the first time that an important constitutional question is being settled by a minority of the Court.

Able conscientious lawyers and historians say that in the long history of the Court no question of constitutional significance has previously been settled by a minority decision.

In the insurance case four Justices out of nine held that the insurance business should not be regulated by the States, but by Federal rulings. Three Justices dissented, and two did not take part in the decision at all. Thus we find the great and important question dissolved by the decision of only four Justices out of nine. Certainly this is not a healthy situation.

SOME EXPECTED ACTION

Perhaps it is to be expected that sooner or later the insurance business would find itself subject to Federal regulations and domination, inasmuch as it has been about the only business that has escaped the ambitions and reforming desires of Washington.

It is difficult to figure out, however, why at this stage of the game that reform can't wait for a while and why the insurance business, which is under strict regulations by the State, has to face now a determined drive on the part of the reforming group.

This time they are tackling a problem that vitally concerns most Americans, for if there is one thing that the average person expects will not be tampered with, it is the insurance structure of the country.

Americans have been taught for many years that it is their duty to provide for the future—if not for themselves, then at least for their dependents—and men of character are willing to make sacrifices to their own comfort in order to assure adequate protection for members of their families.

INSURANCE A FOUNDATION

As a result of this desire and the great increase in the insurance business over the years, the whole financial structure of the country rests in great part on the security of insurance foundations. If they are going to be rebuilt or remade or remodeled, there is going to be a great deal of nervousness and worry on the part of people who have contributed their dollars for many years to build a future for themselves and for their families.

The insurance business, because of the facts cited above, is, of course, a business that should be regulated. This theory has been well established and accepted by everybody concerned, including the insurance companies, but the regulation has always been by the States, and the custom has grown for 75 years or more.

Why then, at this particular time, is it necessary for the court to step in and proclaim that the regulation should be in the hands of the Federal Government rather than under the direction of the States?

The very least that can happen under the circumstances is a great deal of confusion and a great deal of worry which might lead to a very serious situation.

Of course, we learned a few years ago from the do-gooders and reformers that thrift, which had always been considered a virtue, was no longer something to be admired and sought. Undoubtedly, they would like to extend their theory further so that some of their trick economic theories could have a wider trial and broader influence.

Nevertheless, it is going to be very difficult to convince people who have set aside some of their earnings to provide for the future that there is nothing in the Government grasping of control except the sincere desire to provide for the public interest.

SAW IT COMING

During the past few years many thoughtful and observant people have wondered when the Federal attempt to gain control of the insurance business would be set in motion. The constant change in the make-up of the courts and their tendency to give considerable consideration to political aspects has increased the anxiety of these people.

Now, apparently, the first gun in the campaign has been fired, although Attorney General Biddle assures everyone that the Justice Department "has no desire or purpose to break down State regulations," but it is the Justice Department which set in motion the case which resulted in the Supreme Court decision, and obviously it will result in a strong Federal control and a lessening of the State control.

It is, therefore, another long step toward complete domination by the Federal Government of all activities which concern the people of the country, and is, therefore, a further lessening of the rights of the States.

Not so long ago one of the members of the Supreme Court complained that the tendency of the court to ignore or upset precedents had become so strong of late "as to shake confidence in the consistency of decisions and leave the courts below on an uncharted sea of doubt and difficulty without any confidence that what was said yesterday will hold true tomorrow."

If the justice is so worried about the difficulty that will confront lower courts, it isn't difficult to realize that the confusion and bewilderment among the public will be infinitely greater.

If the court itself remains inconsistent so that lower courts and all concerned with the law cannot see clearly, there is small chance that the general public will be able to have any confidence at all. The decision in the insurance case will be upsetting to everybody except, possibly, Mr. Biddle.

The Dies Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, let faint-hearted Congressmen beware. Let friends of America be on guard. From the National Republic of June 1944 comes the following:

The history of all investigations of subversive movements and conspiracies against American constitutional government has been the same. Smear attacks destroyed the Palmer investigation. An attempt was made to blow up the home of Attorney General Palmer, endangering his life and the lives of the members of his family. The smear attack continued until his death. The Lusk committee was more successful in its work, following closely as it did on the heels of World War No. 1, and showing conspiracies of Marxist and German agents against our Government. But many efforts were made by the Reds to discredit it. The Fish committee was savagely attacked, and attacks are still made by the Reds on Congressman FISH, chairman, and now the only surviving member of the committee.

In several States committees set up to investigate the Red menace have been circumvented by Red smears or are still being attacked. Attorneys General Biddle and Jackson, and J. Edgar Hoover, head of the F. B. I., have been attacked by the Communists as a result of their criticism of the Red menace; as have some Government departments and congressional committees.

The Dies committee, of course, has been the constant target of the subversivists. It has been accused of "attempting to create disunity" in war in spite of the fact it has on occasion suppressed evidence at the request of the Government on the theory publication of the evidence would interfere with the war effort.

With the defeat of Congressman STARNES and the withdrawal of Congressman DIES from the political arena the future of the Dies committee is uncertain. The committee will carry on its work until January. If the new House elected is controlled by the Republicans or by Republicans and sound Democrats the committee may be continued. If the leftists control Congress, it will, of course, be abandoned, which will make a Roman holiday for the Reds and other subversivists.

With Congressman DIES withdrawing from seeking reelection because of ill health and Congressmen STARNES and COSTELLO defeated in the Alabama and California primaries, America loses three outstanding, staunchly patriotic statesmen.

Radicals of all stripes, including the C. I. O., Political Action Committee, and the Communists are openly rejoicing in the ill health of Mr. DIES and the defeat of STARNES and COSTELLO. They hope to eliminate other outstanding House Members in the election next November so that a start will be made on what may eventually become an actually Marxian Congress.

Albert Rains, who won in the Alabama primary by 485 votes, already shows evidence that he doesn't relish his left-wing support. Rains received fewer votes in the primary than he did when he ran against Mr. STARNES 8 years ago, but Congressman STARNES' vote shrank in greater proportion.

Congressman DIES has been in ill health for months and does not feel that he can stand another grueling campaign. This, of course, rejoices the Reds and their brethren, but the general elections are not over yet.

Disabled Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, of all those deserving of the especial honor, care, and protection of this country, the claims of no class are entitled to greater attention than the disabled veterans. These men made sacrifices second only to those who gave their lives—the victims of battle or disease. We cannot, of course, do anything for the dead beyond paying them honor. They do not need our further care. Thus it is to the living to whom we turn with honors while they live to enjoy them, made the more sincere by looking out for their present and future welfare.

Mr. Speaker, the one organization chartered by Congress exclusively for this purpose is the Disabled American Veterans, formed in 1920 and out of a wealth of experience in the aftermath of World War No. 1, peculiarly fitted to continue for the benefit of veterans of the current war who may return from service disabled to take up against the battle for health and existence. It is not enough to say that the Nation will not be ungrateful to those so deserving. Such undoubtedly is the disposition of all of us. But in the administration of relief and care nothing can take the place of an organization to stimulate administrative effort and to see that the just claims of individuals are brought to the attention of those in control of governmental agencies. Were it not for this organization many cases would escape the attention of those who would otherwise act and many more would be so subjected to delays and red tape as to be denied, in effect, proper relief.

Mr. Speaker, on June 5, over radio station WINX, at Washington, D. C., Mr. Earl G. Hendrick, national dependents claims officer of the Disabled American Veterans, gave a very interesting and informative address on the procedure to be followed in filing and establishing claims of disabled veterans and their dependents. I desire to add the text of this radio talk to my remarks in the hope that the information may be given added publicity so that its beneficial effects may be more widespread. The information is specific, clear, and helpful to disabled veterans and their dependents. Mr. Hendrick's radio address follows:

Every member of the armed forces, today and tomorrow, together with their dependents, is a potential beneficiary of the Veterans' Administration. As a matter of fact, this Bureau is now carrying the insurance on almost every member of the armed forces. As department service officer for the Disabled American Veterans, it is my business and specialty to handle claims of disabled veterans and their dependents, for the District of Columbia and nearby areas; also the death claims coming into the central office either locally or from the various regional offices throughout the country.

The function of our office is to prosecute and expedite action on your claim or claims. I think the local situation is well in hand and this subject is thoroughly understood by the majority of you. This is essentially true inasmuch as I have had the pleasure of discussing personally, the majority of the local cases. Those of you who live in the District of Columbia and nearby, are at an advantage in having not only your departmental officer, but the advice, judgment, and assistance of our national service director and his entire staff. Therefore, the information afforded in this broadcast is intended primarily for those of you who are unable to call at my office and who are unacquainted with the scope of the service given by the Disabled American Veterans.

The disability claim is filed by the veteran for benefits payable to him as the result of injury or disease resulting from military service. The award of compensation is based on the degree of disability which is determined according to the Veterans' Administration schedule provisions. Any disability, except misconduct, is compensable if it is as much as 10 percent disabling. This application is known as form 526. It is simple to execute and seldom does one have any trouble answering the questions. Additional evidence is seldom required. This is particularly true on the adjudication of the initial claim. No subsequent formal claim need be filed. If the veteran is dissatisfied with his present rating he can submit medical evidence to this effect.

However, it should be borne in mind that the doctor's statement must state not only his diagnosis but sufficient findings to warrant it. It is essential that this evidence show, or at least indicate, a higher degree of disability than the present evaluation. Upon receipt of competent medical evidence, the Veterans' Claim Service will authorize an official examination for rating purposes, thereby reopening the case for further consideration.

Entitlement to benefits is provided by law for the widow, child, or children, and the dependent parents of every deceased World War veteran, if his death was in line of duty, or if he had of record symptomatic service-connected disability at the time of death. Dependent parents are entitled to benefits only if death resulted from a disability of service origin.

Form 534 is the regular application to be submitted by the widow for benefits due her and her children. There must accompany or be submitted subsequently, official documentary evidence showing proof of the date of birth of the widow as well as of the children and official evidence of her marriage. There must also be submitted official documentary evidence of any and all previous marriages and divorces of both the deceased veteran and his widow. If the child or children are adopted or are stepchildren, this proof must also be submitted, and in the case of illegitimate children, there is required in writing parental acknowledgment in the writing of the father—only his illegitimate child, but not the widow's, may qualify as his dependent.

Frequently adjudication is delayed pending the receipt of pertinent documentary evidence, thus requiring unnecessary correspondence by the Veterans' Administration, with the claimant or claimants. Your Veterans' Administration central office has been quite prompt in the adjudication of these claims when all of the required evidence is in their possession. They cannot expedite the adjudication of the claim if there is a divorce decree, a marriage certificate, a birth certificate, or other essential evidence, which they must write for and wait for until it is submitted.

I want to stress the fact that the ordinary marriage certificate or copy thereof is not sufficient. There must be a certified official copy bearing the seal of the clerk or official of the court. Necessarily, the divorce decree when obtained will be in proper form. Birth certificates and death certificates also may be obtained upon request, from your local public health service or officials keeping such records.

While it is essential that all of the above-mentioned documents be of record before the claim is adjudicated, the submission of the claim should not be delayed even though difficulty is experienced, or anticipated, in obtaining one or more of these statements. The claim should be filed at an early date and immediate steps should be taken to obtain any evidence pertinent thereto. Officially requested evidence must be submitted within 1 year of the date of filing the claim or else payment may be precluded for that year.

Present rates of payment are: "Widow but no child, $50; with one child $65, with $13 for each additional child; no widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38 (equally divided), with $10 for each additional child (total equally divided). Total amount payable to widow and children, $100."

The term "parents" means the natural parents or anyone who stood in loco parentis to the decedent. That person may be a grandmother, uncle, or any other relative, he or she may be one who bore no blood relationship whatsoever. Their status as to entitlement is no different from that of the natural parent. They are entitled to the same consideration and the same monetary benefits, provided their status as a parent is established and it has been determined that they are dependent.

Claims of parents must show dependency. That is to say, a claim filed by the parent or parents on Veterans' Administration Form 535 must actually show that the parent, or parents, is, or are, dependent. Usually it is advisable to submit a supplemental itemized financial statement showing all income and all necessary expenses. Careful consideration should be given this statement. There are moneys which are considered income and some which are not. For example: Government insurance being paid the parents as the result of the death of other members of the family are not considered as incomes; whereas, allotment from other members of the family in the armed forces to the dependent parents is considered income. Remember the issue in the claim of dependent parents, provided other requirements are met, is strictly one of dependency. The rate of payment is $25 each or $45 monthly, if only one.

For the benefit of those living outside this area, I want to say that we have a representative of the Disabled American Veterans in practically every regional office, and contact representatives or chapter officers in all areas. They will be glad to furnish you information and any assistance in the execution of this application for benefits in the Veterans' Administration field.

I want to further stress the fact that all of the heretofore mentioned applications must be properly notarized, and the Veterans' Administration locally and nationally have employees who will render this service free of charge.

I call your attention to the fact that the law requires that a power of attorney be signed by the veteran or the dependents, designating the organization they desire to prosecute the claim. They need not name an individual employee, merely the name of the organization and then any accredited representative is afforded access to the case file. For example, if you desire a representative of the Disabled American Veterans to appear in your behalf, you execute what is known as Form P-22 and merely place in capital letters "D. A. V." on the line over which is stated in brackets "Name of organization." This form or power of attorney does not require a notary seal, the signature is sufficient. Form P-22 may be obtained from any service officer or from any Veterans' Administration facility, regional office, or substation.

We invite you to call in person at our office, room 156, Veterans' Administration, Fifteenth and I Streets NW., in this city, to discuss any phase of your claim that you are in doubt about.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character and public service of Hon. THOMAS HENRY CULLEN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, my late colleague and friend, THOMAS HENRY CULLEN, has been called from among us to fill his allotted place in the great tomorrow without having been able to complete the last mission which an admiring and loving constituency intrusted to him. His personality will live forever in the hearts of the people of New York.

His hearty laugh, his genial manner, and his earnest and sincere loyalty to the people in his neighborhood, together with his deep interest in humanity and human kind, won him their everlasting gratitude, respect, love, and adoration, which all combined compose the bouquet of the human heart.

Congressman CULLEN's parents belonged to that noble race whose love of liberty has caused them to fight on the side of freedom under every flag when it stood for justice and equality of the individual. The inborn love for his fellow man, which shone out of his radiant face at all times, he inherited from his ancestral lineage.

Mr. CULLEN was born among the poor in the district that he represented, in the country his parents adopted, and never deserted their interests. He, knowing their wants by intimate contact, saw that they were filled; he was the arbitrator of their disputes, the leader in their pleasures, the champion of their cause, and the idol of their heart. He was their best friend.

They, his devoted followers, honored him with the best gift they had—their franchise, which placed him among us as a Member of the House of Representatives, previously having sent him to the Legislature of the State of New York, and thus delegating to him their interests in the framing of the laws under which they have to live.

TOM sailed in his youth. He knew the ports of the world from personal visits and realized the important part shipping played in the development of the United States. He frequently visited with men who came here from every part of the world. As a result of his sailing and business activities he acquired a knowledge of the affairs of men and of places that was most useful to him in his work as a Representative in Congress and particularly as a member of the Ways and Means Committee.

Long before he came here in 1919, back home in our State legislature, beginning in 1896, the Congressman, then a member of the assembly, devoted himself to a legislative program of general welfare proposals for the people of the city of New York. In my opinion, he did more than any man in this House today to advance the interests of the shipping industry and the men who go to sea. He was constantly alert to their problems and brought to their solution an intimate knowledge based on many years of actual business and lawmaking experience. He was a leader in every movement to improve the hours, wages, and working conditions of his people.

A sympathetic man, he could understand and appreciate problems of the other man. He was always tolerant. He was intensely partisan but always put the interest of his country first in deciding all questions before the Congress.

I first met TOM CULLEN in 1913 at the first inauguration of Woodrow Wilson. I had the privilege of serving on a committee with him in connection with inaugural ceremonies. I liked him at once and since that time he has always treated me with the greatest kindness and respect. Through the years I have enjoyed his friendship and I have been inspired by his enthusiasm and sincerity.

So, today, I join with my colleagues, from the entire country, in paying tribute to the life, service, and character of our departed friend, THOMAS CULLEN. He was steadfast in his devotion to his congressional duties and steadfast in all those things that mean so much to God and country. He was one of those fine citizens that always stand four square for honesty and justice.

I mourn the passing of THOMAS CULLEN as a colleague and a friend. We have lost a skilled legislator, a great humanitarian, and a true Catholic gentleman.

"Haec olim meminisse juvabit."

Army Decorations

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am setting out in full a letter dated April 10, 1944, that I received from Gen. George C. Marshall regarding the matter of Army decorations, and I am including my reply to General Marshall, dated April 12, 1944, together with the complete article I released to the press on March 29 entitled "Awards of Decorations to Members of the Army in World War No. 2." I hope this information will be of value to the Members of Congress who are particularly interested in the matter of Army decorations in this war:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF.
Washington, April 10, 1944.

Hon. THOMAS E. MARTIN,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MARTIN: My attention has been called to a statement in the press indicating your concern over the number of Army decorations that have been awarded in this war. I am frankly disturbed about the apparent general lack of understanding of combat decorations and their value in sustaining the morale of the men who are doing the actual fighting. Napoleon is alleged to have said: "Give me enough ribbon to place on the tunics of my soldiers and I can conquer the world." I cannot vouch for the accuracy of that quotation but I certainly share the view which such a statement indicates.

We have awarded, since the outbreak of the war, probably 12,000 combat decorations other than the Distinguished Flying Cross and the Air Medal, about 3,000 decorations for distinguished or exceptionally meritorious service, and about 135,000 air decorations (Distinguished Flying Cross and Air Medal).

When the size of our Army, and the extensiveness and nature of its operations are considered, the number of awards in the first two categories is surprisingly low.

The air decorations should be measured against the remarkable achievements of the Air Forces and the special nature of continuing air combat. For example, at the end of 1943, the Army Air Forces had flown 392,000 combat sorties, exposing 1,375,000 individuals to the danger of enemy fire. They have lost their hands and their feet in flying and fighting at temperatures far below zero. They suffered heavy loss of pilots or crew members, and almost as many sorties have been flown in the past 3 months as in all of 1943.

These are the men who pioneered the daylight bombing over Europe when the usual pessimistic predictions were that such tactics would be suicidal. They are the men who fought the Japanese air force against tremendous odds until they ultimately gained air-superiority. They continued to fly missions when their chance of safe return was apparently less than one in five. They still take heavy casualties day after day, week after week. Yet their morale has continued high and their achievements have soared, and one of the reasons is that they have positive evidence that their work has been given immediate recognition.

No one who considers all of these things, and who understands the morale effect of the prompt bestowal of a bit of ribbon and bronze, would ever feel that our awards of combat and air decorations have been excessive. In fact, I wonder if we have given the men sufficient recognition. It is a tragic fact that the men who have received the most decorations are usually lost to us by their own continued daring and leadership.

It has been my opinion that one of the grave errors of the previous war was our ineffective policy in the award of decorations and our dilatory policy regarding campaign ribbons. We seemed to begrudge prompt recognition of the men who did the fighting, suffered the hardships, and took the losses. After the war the attempt was made to correct this, but as might have been expected, more of the importunate than the modest and deserving received these belated awards, and heavy political pressures were usually involved.

From the beginning of this war I determined that we would not repeat what clearly appeared to me were serious mistakes in the past. I have impressed upon our commanders in the field not only the value of decorations and their proper use, but of the necessity for their prompt bestowal. And, incidentally, there is small chance of the wrong or undeserving man getting the decoration if it is given in the field. From personal observation of the results, I am convinced that my view is the correct one.

I was so impressed with the effect of the Air Medal and the adverse effect of the lack of a suitable award of the same level for the long-suffering infantrymen that I personally asked for and secured the President's approval to a corresponding decoration for the ground forces, to be known as the Bronze Star. I want to obtain the same effect with this among the ground troops, particularly the infantry who suffer such a high percentage of our casualties, and I intend that it shall be awarded with the same freedom as the Air Medal.

In short, it is my sincere belief that we cannot do too much in the way of prompt and appropriate recognition of the men who carry the fight and live under the conditions that exist at the fighting front.

I intend to see that these young soldiers enjoy this small fruit of their military effort while they are amongst their war comrades and confronted with the ordeal of further fighting.

The immediate award of the campaign or theater ribbon had a somewhat different purpose. One of our most serious morale problems related to the men serving in isolated distant posts, often under extremes of temperature and usually in discomfort. They did not have the stimulation or excitement of contact with the enemy to fix their interest or satisfy their normal desire for active service, and they suffered increasingly from loneliness, from the fact that they could do little to merit public recognition. Therefore the theater ribbon. The fact that some officer in Washington may wear one or two is not a proper argument against the present policy. Furthermore, in considering matters of this kind there is little similarity today with our deployment and the short duration of the war in 1917–18.

I am writing you personally and at considerable length because of the importance that I attach to this subject. I think it essential that our friends in the Military Affairs Committee understand the problem, and have a complete appreciation of how we are using our decorations, and why we are proceeding along this line.

Faithfully yours,

G. C. MARSHALL,
Chief of Staff.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 12, 1944.

Gen. GEORGE C. MARSHALL,
Chief of Staff, War Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL MARSHALL: Thank you very much for your good letter of April 10 and for the time you have taken to reply so fully to recent press releases quoting me in the matter of Army decorations.

I am enclosing the complete text of my statement and you will note that my views are very much in line with yours on most points. I was considerably interested in the contrast in the headlining done in the general press of the country and the presentation of the identical material in the last issue of the Army and Navy Journal. The enclosed article is identical with the ones I handed to the newspaper reporters and the one I handed to the reporter for the Army and Navy Journal. The headlining and the presentation of the material reveal widely different reactions and resulting emphasis.

There is one phase of this subject that you have discussed that I wish I had included in my statement, namely, the matter of prompt and appropriate recognition of the men immediately by the commanders in the field. I sincerely hope that this practice will avoid the heavy political pressures you so well describe in the second paragraph of the second page of your letter. I have no objection whatever to the liberal award of the Air Medal and the Bronze Star and to the extent that these awards reduce the number of higher ranking awards they will serve a very real purpose in the maintenance of the rating of the higher awards.

You will be interested to know that I made a special effort to secure the information set out in the second paragraph of your letter, but could not secure any estimate of the number of awards except of the Medal of Honor.

I really believe that publicity setting out the number of awards of the Air Medal and Bronze Star, and of the Purple Heart, together with the estimated total of all other combat decorations, will keep the public properly informed of the relatively small proportion of higher decorations awarded. Perhaps the Distinguished Flying Cross and Air Medal should be lumped together as you have done in your letter. At any rate, the purpose would be served of presenting an accurate picture to the public so that they may be in position to give the proper weight to the higher ranking awards.

I agree with you very strongly that the Infantry must absorb the brunt of battle and the greater proportion of casualties especially as the war progresses but I am finding it difficult to locate many people who believe the Infantry is taking much part in this war. Thus far, publicity has gone all-out for the Air Corps and the unbalanced number of decorations together with the return home of more members of the Air Corps than any other branch of the service has given rise to a very unbalanced picture in the public mind. I deeply appreciate what the Air Corps has accomplished and there is no more important development in this war than the accomplishment of the Air Corps in achieving what has been considered by many to be the impossible, but when it comes to publicity and to decorations we have a real job ahead to make service in the ground forces and especially in the Infantry equally attractive. The present situation is reflected quite vividly in my mail in regard to the recent transfer of the entire A. S. T. P. student body and of 36,000 prospective aviation cadets to the Army ground forces and mostly to the Infantry. These transfers are necessary and I have heard no criticism of the general policy resulting in these transfers, but I have received a surprising volume of mail from parents and relatives and friends voicing objections to such transfer of individual soldiers. I can see no basis for this general complaint except that it is brought about by the publicity, recognition, and glamor that has been built up around the Air Corps in contrast to the other branches.

Sincerely yours,

THOS. E. MARTIN.

AWARDS OF DECORATIONS TO MEMBERS OF THE ARMY IN WORLD WAR NO. 2

The War Department release of February 24 announced the details for the award of the Bronze Star Medal and in my opinion this award will fill a very definite place in the field of awards for heroic or meritorious service against the enemy. The Bronze Star Medal is to be given for such service when the service does not involve aerial flight and it is in that sense a counterpart of the Air Medal. Until the creation of the Bronze Star Medal, the award of the Air Medal together with the Oak Leaf Cluster and Silver Leaf Cluster to denote additional awards of the Air Medal, comprised the great bulk of the decorations bestowed upon our soldiers in this war. Looking ahead it is reasonable to suppose that the awards of the Bronze Star Medal will make up a large portion of the decorations especially as the operations of the ground forces in this war increase. If the Bronze Star Medal is awarded on the same basis that the Air Medal has been awarded it will become something of a yardstick of service in contact with the enemy but it remains to be seen whether the Bronze Star Medal will be awarded on a basis similar to the number of combat missions which is used in the Air Corps for the award of the Air Medal.

There is a tendency always to increase the number of awards as the war progresses. Whenever a precedent is established for the award there is a tendency to make similar awards wherever those conditions are thought to be met. As the war progresses there will always be more clashes with the enemy resulting in more cases of heroic or meritorious achievement or service. But we should bear in mind always that the appraisal of value of a decoration is in inverse proportion to the number of awards of the decoration.

There are now 10 decorations that may be made in recognition of outstanding service of various degrees. The highest ranking award is the Congressional Medal of Honor and War Department records as of this date, reveal that only 34 awards of the Congressional Medal of Honor have been made during this war. Even that number is much larger than in any similar period of time prior to this war. The other awards in the order of their rank are as follows: Distinguished Service Cross, Distinguished Service Medal, Legion of Merit, Silver Star, Distinguished Flying Cross, Soldiers' Medal, the Bronze Star Medal, the Purple Heart, Air Medal.

As stated above, Oak Leaf Clusters and Silver Leaf Clusters are given for successive awards of the same medal. All of these awards are given on the recommendation of theater commanders or some general officer to whom the theater commander has delegated the authority to make such awards, and the award is a recognition extended to the individual soldier for his services and cannot be demanded or requisitioned by him as a matter of right. The only exception to this rule is the award of the Purple Heart which is made on application of the soldier or his representatives and is based upon the proof of the fact of wounds received in action against the enemy. There have been approximately 175,000 awards made in this war to date but it is impossible to give the exact number of awards of the different decorations, except the number of Congressional Medals of Honor. Newspaper accounts indicate that more awards have been made of the Air Medal and Oak Leaf and Silver Leaf Clusters than of any other awards. This situation has resulted from two factors. The increased activity in aerial warfare against the enemy and the fact that Air Medals and Oak Leaf Clusters have been awarded for each five combat missions flown. This has resulted in many members of the air crews receiving several awards of the Air Medal and Oak Leaf Cluster so that the total number of men receiving the 175,000 decorations is somewhat less than that number. When we consider the large size of our Army today and the far-flung and extensive contact our Army has with the enemy, the total number of awards of most of the decorations is not large. As stated above the number will tend to increase rapidly as the war progresses and the value or rating of the awards will rise or fall in public estimation in inverse ratio to the number of such awards made.

The matter of making awards by direct congressional action came before the House of Representatives on March 14, when the bill H. R. 4377 was passed, authorizing the award of the Distinguished Service Medal to Admiral Chester W. Nimitz. This bill is now before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs. There is no doubt whatever as to the worthiness of this award to Admiral Nimitz but the precedent is a very dangerous one because the tendency will be to increase the number of cases beyond all reason and to place upon Congress a function that is very difficult for them to perform fairly and equitably without serious intrusion upon the vast field of legislative duties. Our experience with such legislation following the First World War is ample proof of the dangers involved in such procedure. In my opinion the matter of such awards should be left to the Army and War Department officials who are best qualified to determine the merits of each case because of their experience in such matters and because of their opportunity to observe or investigate the facts as they have developed within their jurisdiction.

G. I. Bill of Rights

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I join with all the friends of the boys and girls in our armed forces in voting for the conference report on Senate bill 1767, which is known as Federal Government Aid for the Readjustment in Civilian Life of Returning World War No. 2 Veterans.

I am delighted to have had the opportunity of working with the representatives of the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars in the preparation of this important legislation. At this time I wish to congratulate the members of the legislative committees of both Houses who worked so hard and faithfully in an effort to obtain adequate and satisfactory benefits for the returning soldiers and the dependents of those who have made the supreme sacrifice.

It is hoped that the terms of this bill are sufficiently broad to meet every possible problem that may be presented for solution. If it does not, I am sure the Congress will be glad to amend the bill to correct any injustice or discrimination that may develop. It is the intention of Congress, by enacting this bill into law, to make available to every veteran the complete facilities of all Government departments.

As a member of the New York State Legislature and since 1930 a Member of the House of Representatives, I am proud of my work on behalf of our soldiers. Today, I am again enjoying the privilege of casting my vote for a bill which contains many of my own ideas on soldiers' benefits and on the manner in which the act should be administered by the Veterans' Bureau. I favor a liberal and sympathetic interpretation of this legislation.

Because the conference report on S. 1767 has already been printed in the RECORD, I shall not attempt a detailed description of the many provisions contained in the bill. Suffice it is to say that the passage of act and its approval by my friend, President Roosevelt, will bring to a favorable and happy conclusion a difficult job but a most worthwhile and constructive piece of humane legislation for our most deserving fellow Americans.

Regulation of Liability of Air Carriers and Foreign Air Carriers

REMARKS

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a bill regulating the liability of air carriers and foreign air carriers for death or personal injury to a passenger, for the loss or damage to goods and delay in their delivery, and for injury or death to persons or damage to property on the ground. This bill is designed to provide a solution to the many problems which have plagued both the airlines and the passengers and shippers who have in some respect suffered damage as a result of an aircraft accident.

In the case of passengers and shippers the common law imposes a very heavy burden of proof. In any action for damages it is necessary for them to prove that the aircraft operator has been negligent. Air-line operation is a highly technical and specialized business and for that reason proof of negligence has been very difficult and very expensive. In addition, the present limitations on recovery for the death of a passenger prescribed in State laws may vary from $5,000 to $20,000 and thus the passenger's recovery may be drastically affected by the sheer coincidence that the accident happened in one State rather than another.

On the other hand the air lines, faced with an endless variety of possible recoveries against them have found it unduly expensive to maintain an appropriate insurance program.

Thus the present situation is unsatisfactory from the standpoint of all parties concerned because it imposes unnecessary hardships upon them all. The bill I have introduced aids the passenger and shipper by transferring to the air line the burden of proof in any action against it. In other words the passenger or shipper under the bill would not have to prove negligence. It would be up to the air line to prove that it was not negligent. In addition, in order to make certain that any recovery granted to a passenger or shipper is promptly paid, the bill grants to the Civil Aeronautics Board authority to make regulations requiring appropriate liability insurance. The bill would also help the air lines to plan their insurance programs with certainty by prescribing limitations upon the extent to which a passenger or shipper could recover. While the limitations as specified in the bill are liberal, I believe that the airlines will nevertheless benefit by reason of the fact that there is some limitation upon the extent to which they may be held liable.

In addition, the limitations upon liability for loss or damage to goods or delay in their delivery or to a passenger's baggage or personal effects are subject to agreements which may be made between the air line and passenger or shipper under which the passenger or shipper declares a higher value and the carrier charges a correspondingly higher rate for carriage.

There is precedent for this proposed legislation in State laws, in the Harter Act, which applies to vessels, and in the so-called Carmack amendment, which applies to carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act. In introducing this bill I am not taking the position that all of its provisions are entirely satisfactory either to the author or the interests affected. I think the problems with which it deals should be solved for the benefit of all concerned and I hope that all those interested will consider this proposed legislation carefully and give me their comments in writing. I will not press for hearings on the bill immediately but will wait until it appears that ample time has been given to study the legislation.

The problems involved are as complex as they are important and this bill is introduced with the hope that it will encourage and invite suggestions and amendments which will not only improve the bill but will result in the best possible legislation.

Polish Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL R. LEWIS
OF OHIO

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, Polish people all over the world celebrate May 3 as the anniversary of the adoption of a constitution which granted freedom and democracy to all their people. Poland was the first country in Europe to write a constitution granting individual rights to her citizens. This was adopted on May 3, 1791, so this year marks the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary. And not only people of Polish descent but all lovers of freedom should rejoice on this memorable occasion.

After the First World War Poland survived and rose again to become one of the most democratic and progressive countries in Europe and reached a height only a sturdy, industrious, free nation can attain when allowed to live and work in peace.

We all remember with bitterness how Hitler, in September 1939, launched an unprovoked attack upon this country, dealing out suffering and death to many of her people, destroying her homes and churches, maiming and killing one-tenth of the entire population, including women and children. The sufferings of her people have exceeded those of any other country trampled by the heel of German might, but the spirit of Poland could not be destroyed.

Other nations fell for the subtle Nazi propaganda and allied themselves with Hitler's plan of conquest—but not Poland. She was the first to resist Nazi oppressors. Despite every inducement which Hitler could offer, no traitorous Quisling could be found among the Polish people and she proved that deceit could not break the indomitable will of a freedom-loving people. And, thus, she has won the admiration of liberty-loving people throughout the world because she chose to maintain her honor by resistance rather than live in subjugation by a policy of appeasement.

The willingness to suffer for the cause of freedom has produced unexcelled bravery in Polish soldiers, sailors, and aviators fighting on every front on land, on the seas, and in the skies. Millions of Americans of Polish descent are indispensable in the war effort, either in active participation or otherwise assisting in war industries, scientific research, and on the farms.

Poland, through the years, has made priceless contributions to the world in literature, science, music, and statesmanship. She has produced Joseph Conrad and Sienkiewicz, great masters of literature; Copernicus and Mme. Curie in science; Chopin and Paderewski in music; Count Pulaski and Kosciusko and Niemcewicz in statesmanship. Poland has demonstrated her ability to make the greatest contributions to the world that have brought happiness and blessings to millions and she has also shown that unconquerable spirit which will endure untold suffering for a worthy cause—that of freedom and liberty.

With such a background as this, who can predict the heights to which Poland will reach when she rises from the present yoke of bondage and again takes her place among the free people of the earth?

God grant that His greatest blessings may fall on this worthy nation and that the day may soon come when she may again enjoy the priceless blessings of liberty.

Flag Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. WILLIAM P. ELMER
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. ELMER. Mr. Speaker, this is Flag Day 1944. Where are you? What flag do you love? What country is yours? Are you standing by the Government founded by Washington and Jefferson; defended by Lincoln and Cleveland? Or: Are you lost? In doubt? Love some flag other than the Stars and Stripes? Some country, other than your own? Some scheme of world supremacy, you know not what? By some people, you know not whom? A supergovernment over the United States of America? A dictatorship over the world? A foreign policeman over you?

Herein is copied a post card I received asking me, as a Congressman, to support this universal flag. This is a world flag. It is not the United Nations flag which is yet unofficial, and is—a white field with four red vertical bars—and will be official if the internationalists win the 1944 election. Following is my National American answer.

The brotherhood flag consists of five horizontal stripes of equal width. The length of the flag is twice the width of the five stripes combined. Each stripe represents one of the five different groups of the human race, namely: red, white, brown, yellow and black. Respectful display of this flag will help promote unity, equality, freedom, peace, brotherhood, and a genuine respect for international law, among all peoples of the earth.

WORLD PEACE ASSOCIATION,
JENKINS, MINN.

I have your post card of the brotherhood flag. I have a flag, too. It consists of 13 red and white horizontal stripes representing 13 weak struggling colonies in 1776, and 48 stars on a blue field, representing 48 sovereign States of the American Union, in 1943. It is in all sizes from tiny to big. As a whole, it represents a powerful Nation that protects all races, colors, creeds, in equality, freedom, peace, and brotherhood, who shelter beneath its folds. Respectful display of this flag brings a peace that passeth all understanding, to those who love it. It shone at its rise, and shines at its zenith, as the majestic light of liberty of the New World. I cannot trade it for any other flag for fear the light will be blown out and the whole world left in total darkness.

WILLIAM P. ELMER,
Member of Congress.

Read and re-read. Cut out and post in your home. Have your children read. Tell them which is right; which is American, which is God's. You cannot dodge this issue in 1944. It is here. You must decide it—you voters. It is the most vital question of your lifetime. If you make a mistake, our country is gone for good. You will determine if our sons shall have died in vain if "the government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth." You know where I stand. Americanism is bred in my bones and sinews. I cannot fail it. And I know where you, as true, loyal Americans, stand. You will serve the God of your fathers, and not the Baal of internationalism.

What's a Hog Worth?

OF
HON. A. L. MILLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Omaha Daily Journal Stockman entitled "What's a Hog Worth?"

This editorial indicates the confusion which is caused by the Government trying to regulate the business of producing pork. The farmer was urged to produce more hogs. He did so. The result has been that the choice hogs which he has for market cannot be sold until those either over or below the choice weight are sold, and at a loss of from $1 to $2 per hundredweight. In the meantime, the choice hog loses weight and he in turn is then sold at a loss.

The condition that now exists in the hog market may well prevail in the cattle market beginning late this summer. The feed lots are empty. There may be less than 50 percent placed on feed. At the same time there are some 12,000,000 more cattle on the ranges than ever before. There will be shortage of feed, a shortage of labor. The half-fed, grass-fed animals will flood the slaughter pens. The packers and butchers will take advantage of the situation, and then the farmers and stock raisers will take the same loss on their cattle as they have been experiencing in the past few months on their hogs.

Most of these difficulties can be traced directly to this administration, which has refused to recognize the importance of the production of meat. The handling of all food should long ago have been placed under one administrator. If this is not done we may well see millions of pounds of meat permitted to spoil and turned into fertilizer just as some 1,400 carloads of eggs standing on the railroad sidings of this country are now spoiling and being turned into tankage. Truly, the handling of the food problem is a smelly mess in any language.

The editorial follows:

Anyone who tries to analyze what a hog is worth under the existing confusing price control in both pork and hogs will end up tearing out his hair and giving up the job. Our reporters can tell accurately what is paid from day to day for the various classes and weights of hogs, topsy-turvy though the market is these days, but it would be an impossible task for any of them to try to figure out what a hog is worth.

To say that hogs are selling too high or too low in relation to what the packer gets for pork under these conditions would at best be a ridiculous statement that could not be proved either way. Under ordinary conditions it is possible to ascertain within a reasonable degree what a hog is worth to the packer. However, these are not ordinary times. The entire industry is in the midst of a price-control experimentation conducted by men inexperienced in the operations of either livestock markets or the pork-packing industry.

Neither farmer nor packer knows where he stands. An example of what farmers and packer buyers contend with in determining the value of hogs under existing conditions is best illustrated by a few hypothetical sales of the various weights. Take 3 carloads of hogs, each weighing a total of 20,000 pounds. In 2 of these loads are 75 hogs each, making them average 266 pounds and eligible to the floor price. The other load carries 70 hogs, making them average 285 pounds and they sell $1.75 a hundred pounds below the floor price. The same packer obtains all 3 loads, and together they make up a drove of 220 hogs averaging 272 pounds at a cost of 59 cents a hundred pounds below the floor.

However, another packer the same day obtains 2 loads of 70 hogs, each weighing 20,000 pounds, or an average of 285 pounds, at $1.75 below the floor and gives the floor price for only 1 load of 75 hogs averaging 266 pounds. The result is that he goes in with a drove of 215 hogs, averaging 279 pounds, at a cost that is 58 cents a hundred pounds below the first packer and $1.17 under the floor.

Any bright young student of price control (Washington is full of them) who comes forward with the suggestion that 7 pounds difference in the average weight of a drove justifies the difference of 58 cents a hundred pounds in the cost had better take a back seat. No man can guess the weight of a drove of hogs that accurately with any consistency.

Yet, this is not the worst of the tale. Another packer comes along who completely ignores the Government weights and gives $1.75 below the floor for all 3 loads, going into the pork trade against his 2 competitors with a drove of 210 hogs, averaging 285 pounds, at a cost that is 58 cents below 1 packer and $1.17 below the other, with practically the same class of pork. Certainly the price of the pork from the 3 droves would not vary.

The real return to the producer of hogs is gaged by the level of the prices paid for off-weights and the quantity of such kinds available to packers as well as the level of the floor price. In order to get the same average drove cost as the buyer who did not take any Government weights the packer who gave the floor price for two-thirds of his drove would have to buy the other third $5.25 a hundred pounds below the floor instead of $1.75 below.

Well, you figure, and let's all go crazy together.

Editorials From the Capital Times of Madison, Wis.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. McMURRAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a series of editorials from the Capital Times, at Madison, Wis. This newspaper, edited by the able and fearless William T. Evjue, has been for 25 years the outstanding organ of liberal political thought in the State of Wisconsin.

The titles and dates of the editorials are as follows: May 5, 1944, "Gutter Language in the State G. O. P. and Can Washington Do Anything to Suit Them"; May 7, 1944, "The Modern Platform of a Political Party and They Still Hate Roosevelt More Than They Do Hitler"; May 9, 1944, "The Strange Attitude of the La Follettes Toward Roosevelt"; and May 10, 1944, "The Cumbersome Foreign Policy Plank in the Progressive Platform."

GUTTER LANGUAGE IN THE STATE G. O. P.

The degree to which Republicans are willing to go in sounding their inflammatory abuse of President Roosevelt was illustrated at the Republican State convention in Milwaukee when Attorney Charles F. Smith, called the "silver tongued orator of the Wisconsin G. O. P." by the Milwaukee Sentinel, let loose an incendiary blast that can only come from one of the present day professional Roosevelt haters.

It is significant that Smith's venomous utterances were cheered by his audience of Republican leaders.

Here is what Smith said concerning President Roosevelt:

"Mr. President, we are not satisfied with you as either President or Commander in Chief. We are not satisfied with your conduct of the war. You lost the Philippines and caused our boys to be murdered there and at Pearl Harbor through your bungling as Commander in Chief."

That is pretty strong language. It is intemperate language. Our guess is that the people of Wisconsin, including many who are opposed to the President, will not sanction barrel-house language of this kind.

If the Republicans of Wisconsin are determined to conduct this campaign on the gutter level, they will do so at their own peril. There is a place, even in politics, for such things as decency and good taste.

CAN WASHINGTON DO ANYTHING TO SUIT THEM?

The Republicans evidently have only one plan for riding into power—daily and everlasting criticism of the Roosevelt administration.

For months the Republican whisperers have been peddling the story that there has been a tremendous surplus of meat stored up and that there was no need for a program of rationing.

On Wednesday the O. P. A. announced that rationing restrictions on all meats, with the exception of beef steaks and beef roasts, would be eliminated.

Immediately the critics of the administration began whispering a new line. Now they are saying that the action of the O. P. A. on Wednesday was dictated by politics—that President Roosevelt will run again next November.

It is quite obvious that Washington can do nothing that will satisfy its carping critics.

[From the Madison (Wis.) Capital Times of May 7, 1944]

THE MODERN PLATFORM OF A POLITICAL PARTY

The modern-day political party platform is usually a slick array of words and phrases which say everything and mean nothing. The leaders of a political party today turn over the writing of a platform to literary craftsmen who are masters in the art of double talk, planned ambiguity, and glib rhetoric that can mean all things to all men.

The platform just adopted by the Republican State convention at Milwaukee is no exception to the rule. It is a vehicle on which candidates seeking votes can ride with comfort.

There is, however, one surprising declaration in the G. O. P. State platform. That is the plank on foreign policy which says that following the war "there should be set up some kind of an international organization that shall provide a just method of settling international disputes and shall have the power to preserve the peace of the world."

Many people were expecting the Republicans of Wisconsin to move in the other direction on foreign policy, considering the results of the convention delegate contest in the recent primary in which Mr. Willkie, with his One World foreign policy, was handed such a severe defeat. It wouldn't have been unexpected if the State G. O. P. had come up with a foreign policy plank smacking of isolationism.

But this 1944 plank, reiterating statements of 2 years ago, indicates that Republicans in Wisconsin are beginning to realize that they cannot win by advocating a narrow policy of isolation. Unlike the Chicago Tribune, Gerald L. K. Smith, and other isolationist spokesmen, they apparently don't consider the Wisconsin primary results a victory for blind nationalism or isolationism.

In this they are following the trend sensed by Governor Dewey and Governor Bricker, both of whom recently came out with surprisingly straightforward declarations in favor of post-war world cooperation and international agreements to enforce peace.

The pronouncements of Bricker and Dewey were bitter medicine for Colonel McCormack and his isolationist crowd, as was the unconditional statement by General MacArthur that he was not a candidate for President. So, too, must have been the foreign policy platform plank adopted by the Republicans of Wisconsin at their Milwaukee meeting last week.

Much of the G. O. P. State platform, however, is so much double talk. Point after point it reiterates the old vote-catching platitudes, the glittering generalities, and the declarations in favor of things in which everybody concurs.

Then, there are the usual inconsistencies which occur in a document that tries to be all things to all men.

For instance, the platform endorses the record of the 1943 legislature and at the same time claims to favor a generous rehabilitation program for returning servicemen. The 1943 legislature voted to deprive returning servicemen of funds to finance a $7,000,000 appropriation by voting to repeal the surtax on 1942 incomes.

Then again the platform, after taking the bold stand on foreign policy noted above, gives its blanket endorsement to the attitude of Republican Members of Congress from this State, despite the fact that the attitude of these Congressmen has generally been on the isolationist side and the platform calls for international cooperation.

The platform is hypocritical, too, in the way it lets down Governor Goodland. The Governor is not mentioned by name, and his splendid record in the public interest is dismissed by a one-sentence reference to the State administration.

The platform says the Republican Party favors the maintenance of the "new rights of labor." What that means is anybody's guess. The Republican Party in this State is the party which wrecked the State's advanced labor laws and substituted a labor act conceived by antilabor employers so bad that it has been boycotted since its inception by bona fide labor organizations.

With the exception of the plank on foreign policy, the platform approved by the G. O. P. at Milwaukee is what its authors intended it to be, a masterpiece of double talk and ambiguity.

THEY STILL HATE ROOSEVELT MORE THAN THEY DO HITLER

Some Members of Congress seem to be more interested in protecting the enemies of the Government than they are in standing by the friends of the Government.

The speed with which Congressmen came to the defense of Sewell Avery, the arrogant head of Montgomery Ward & Co. who defied the Government in a labor dispute, was significant.

Now comes the case of a woman factory owner, Miss Vivien Kellems, in Connecticut who has been writing letters to a Nazi in South America. She is the same lady who recently defied the Government by refusing to pay wartime tax levies and urged other employers to follow her example.

Excerpts from Miss Kellems' letters to this German Nazi in South America were recently printed in Drew Pearson's Washington Merry-Go-Round column.

And what is the reaction of these Members of Congress to the disclosure of this woman's correspondence with an enemy of the United States? Pearson is denounced for publishing same and the Office of Censorship is denounced for permitting the information to leak out.

On Thursday the Senate Post Office Committee voted approval of a resolution to investigate Pearson and named Pearson's bitter foe, Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR, Tory Democrat from Tennessee, as chairman of the proposed investigation.

The degree of Senator MCKELLAR's judicial approach to Mr. Pearson's activities is evident from his recent reference on the libel proof Senate floor to Pearson as "an infamous, dirty, low-down, mean, lying scoundrel and skunk."

One can imagine the kind of a hearing which will be conducted under MCKELLAR's chairmanship if this investigation wins Senate approval.

Congress, it appears, is more burned up over the fact that these letters have been made public than it is over the implications of an American citizen who is communicating with an enemy of this Nation.

We reiterate what we have frequently said: There is a crowd in Congress that hates President Roosevelt more than it hates Hitler and Hirohito.

[From the Madison (Wis.) Capital Times of May 9, 1944]

THE STRANGE ATTITUDE OF THE LA FOLLETTES TOWARD ROOSEVELT

The speech of Senator LA FOLLETTE at Milwaukee which pegged the future course of the Progressive party to a program of hostility to President Roosevelt and the New Deal will bring a keen sense of disappointment to thousands of Progressives and liberals in Wisconsin and throughout the Nation.

These people believe that the President is entitled to the support and loyalty of the forward-looking voters of the United States.

They will never be able to understand why the La Follettes have not been willing to stand shoulder to shoulder with President Roosevelt in the fight to promote the common good.

How can Progressives in Wisconsin join in an attitude of hostility toward President Roosevelt without publicly convicting themselves of rank ingratitude?

For a generation the name La Follette was synonymous with the great battle which was fought to emancipate this State from corporate domination and to make government an instrumentality to promote the general welfare.

To promote this end, the movement fought gallantly to translate Progressive principles into the laws of this State. As a result, Wisconsin became known as a model commonwealth and it served as an inspiration for the promotion of the Progressive ideology throughout the Nation.

Franklin D. Roosevelt became President during one of the most dangerous crises this country ever faced. He at once demonstrated his courage by using the vast powers of government to rescue millions of people from the devastating effects of the worst depression this country had ever seen—a depression that brought business paralysis, unemployment, mortgage foreclosures, and a general economic demoralization.

Under the courageous guidance of the President, recovery soon began to set in and the President succeeded in placing on the statute books an impressive array of progressive legislation.

In his first two terms in the White House Mr. Roosevelt succeeded in placing in the law of the land the things for which Progressives had been fighting for decades. Look over this record:

The Social Security Act of 1935 providing for the establishment of a system of old-age benefits and better care for the crippled, the aged, and the blind.

The act of 1934 providing for the insurance of bank deposits which is now effectively protecting the savings of the American people.

The Securities and Exchange Act of 1934, an act designed to protect the American investor from unscrupulous practices on the part of those who have unloaded billions of dollars of questionable stocks on the public in the past.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933 and later legislation which rescued hundreds of thousands of American farmers from bankruptcy.

The Rural Electrification Act of 1936 which brought the blessings of electricity to hundreds of thousands of farms that had previously been denied this service.

The Soil Conservation Act of 1935 designed to protect this country's greatest asset, its topsoil.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation which enabled millions of American home owners to save their homes.

The National Housing Act of 1934 which made it possible for thousands of American citizens to acquire their own homes.

The National Labor Relations Act of 1935 which paved the way for better relations between employer and employee.

This is only a partial summary of the forward-looking legislation which was adopted under the Roosevelt New Deal. The New Deal represented the greatest advance in progressive and liberal legislation that this country has ever seen.

As a result of this fight to make Government serve the interests of the people, President Roosevelt incurred the bitter enmity of the moneyed and privileged interests of the country—the same crowd that in earlier years had sought to destroy old Bob La Follette because of his fight for progressive ideals.

Yet today we find the sons of old Bob La Follette now seeking to direct the Progressive movement of this State into an attitude of hostility toward the man who has placed more progressive legislation into the law of the land than any living person.

Many people in seeking to rationalize this anomaly are under the impression that the La Follettes broke with the President on foreign policy. This is not true, as was evidenced by Senator BOB LA FOLLETTE's speech in Milwaukee in which he referred to the New Deal's "tarnished record of failure."

The first sign of the La Follette desertion of President Roosevelt was seen as far back as 1937 when, during the recession of that year, Phil La Follette thought that the New Deal was at the end of its rope. Phil La Follette then proceeded to organize his own abortive political alinement on a program of criticism of the New Deal.

What prompted the La Follettes to repudiate the man who has done more than any occupant of the White House since Lincoln to advance legislation to aid the common man?

We leave our readers to make their own deductions on that matter. We simply wish to ask here how the Progressive movement can win the confidence of the people and how there can be any Progressive solidarity when its leaders turn on those who have done the most to advance Progressive principles.

The Progressives who took part in the Milwaukee convention and lent their endorsement while the New Deal was called a failure will stand convicted in the minds of thousands of Progressives in the United States as guilty of rank ingratitude.

[From the Madison (Wis.) Capital Times of May 10, 1944]

THE CUMBERSOME FOREIGN POLICY PLANK IN THE PROGRESSIVE PLATFORM

There was a time when Progressives in their party platforms said what they meant and meant what they said. The involved and cumbersome jumble of words which constitutes the foreign policy declaration in the platform adopted by the Progressive Party at Milwaukee last Sunday is quite in contrast with the simple and straightforward statements made in Progressive platforms of earlier years.

In commenting on the foreign policy plank of the Progressive Party, the Milwaukee Journal in an editorial, printed in the adjoining columns, very aptly said:

"It is a peculiar property of truth that when you mean a thing you don't need a thousand words to say what you mean."

With the exception of the foreign policy declaration the platform is a fine statement of principles on domestic issues. It stakes out fine objectives on such issues as social security, money and credit, civil service, co-ops, nutrition programs in the schools, public utilities, labor legislation, veterans' legislation, and housing. And yet, strange to say, these declarations on domestic issues were framed in an environment of hostility toward the Roosevelt administration—the regime that has done more to advance these principles for which Progressives are fighting than any administration in a generation.

But the kind of a world we are going to live in after this war is still the paramount question facing the people of this country. And here the Progressive Party comes up with a lengthy array of double talk that serves as a thin disguise for a policy of isolationism on which the Progressive Party evidently aims to base its appeal to the people of this State in the coming election.

Mr. Rubin and other spokesmen for the Progressive Party undoubtedly will still maintain that the Progressives are for some form of international cooperation. Mr. Rubin and his associates dislike the implications of the word "isolationism." But it so happened that there was a little incident on the floor of the convention that completely revealed what the vague ambiguities of the platform declaration did not reveal. Assemblyman Earl Mullen of Dane County was not satisfied with the platform declaration and offered this clear and concise amendment of a few words from the floor:

"We favor an international organization dedicated to carry out these principles of peace."

The Mullen amendment was quickly ruled out of order.

The following is the heart of the foreign policy declaration of the Progressive platform:

"Progressives will cooperate in supporting sincere efforts made by the United States' representatives at the peace table to secure a just and lasting peace. We affirm our unalterable opposition to territorial aggrandizement for the purposes of imperialism, discrimination against races or peoples, monopoly or cartel control of trade, insupportable indemnities, the oppression of peoples or the selfish exploitation of their natural resources, and the prolonged military government of conquered or occupied nations."

Everybody will agree that these are desirable objectives to be carried into a treaty of peace. Everybody is for a program that will get at the causes of war. But what will declarations of this kind amount to in a peace treaty if there is no machinery to guarantee their enforcement? We agree completely with the Progressives in this statement:

"We affirm our unalterable opposition to territorial aggrandizement for the purpose of imperialism."

Assume that such a declaration finds its way into the coming treaty of peace. How do the Progressives plan to give validity to that declaration? Suppose that after the treaty is signed some aggressor again arises and embarks upon a program of territorial aggrandizement in order to exploit a weaker people. How will such an aggressor be dealt with? The Progressives do not say. If a group of nations can unite during the war to stop an aggressor why can't a similar organization of nations act cooperatively during a period of peace to stop any future aggressor who may arise?

But in the concluding paragraph of the foreign policy declaration the America First inclinations of the Progressive platform makers stick out. The concluding paragraph says:

"Progressives reaffirm their profound conviction that in the last analysis our greatest contribution to world peace will be determined by what America does for Americans. Our primary task is to make democracy and equality of opportunity living realities here at home. By putting our own house in order we can prove to people everywhere that men can have both freedom and security."

If this doesn't mean that America should go it alone in a post-war world, what does it mean? The familiar slogan, "Put our own house in order," is the favorite alternative always suggested by La Follette Progressives whenever the question of foreign policy is brought up. We have never been able to understand why any plans for putting our own house in order should preclude us from taking our part in helping to build a decent world order. Must we necessarily solve the poll-tax question before we can proceed to the job of trying to stop future world wars?

Yes, indeed; the Milwaukee Journal was right when it said: "It is a peculiar property of truth that when you mean a thing you don't need a thousand words to say what you mean."

Resolution of the Polish-American Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD the correct and officially signed resolution passed by the Polish-American Congress together with a communication from Charles Rozmarek, addressed to me. This is intended to correct the error contained in the resolution inserted by the distinguished Member from New York, Hon. WALTER G. ANDREWS, Monday, June 5, 1944:

POLISH NATIONAL ALLIANCE,
Chicago, June 9, 1944.

Hon. JOHN D. DINGELL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DINGELL: We presume in submitting herewith for your kind consideration the text of the resolution unanimously adopted by 3,174 delegates gathered in council at the call of the Polish Congress on May 28, 29, and 30, in Memorial Hall Arena at Buffalo, N. Y.

This resolution, we feel certain, expresses the sincere sentiment of the overwhelming majority of American citizens of Polish ancestry.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES ROZMAREK,
President.

Three thousand one hundred and seventy-four delegates and delegates at large, gathered in council at the call of the Polish Congress in Buffalo on May 28, 29, and 30, 1944, authorized by mandates given to them by societies, organizations, churches, and clubs in their communities to speak in behalf and in the name of 6,000,000 Americans have unanimously voted to address the following appeal to the civilized world now engaged in total war against the enemies of democracy.

We are mindful that this appeal is being written on Memorial Day, when our Nation pays tribute to those who have given their lives for the United States. Many thousands of old graves of Americans of Polish ancestry, many monuments of Polish heroes, will be decorated today with the American flag. Thousands of mothers will weep today, their hearts will bleed not knowing where the graves of their beloved sons are.

There is in this sacrifice a holy unity between them and all the mothers in America, Poland, and other lands.

We are also mindful that the thoughts and sentiments of this appeal are being written on the eve of the invasion of Europe. We all live in grave anticipation of news that will announce victory—and death of many.

We can, therefore, speak only in solemn seriousness in the name of our beloved ones who are there with our consent and with our blessing.

To all of us there shall be only one consolation that will redeem this great sacrifice—the knowledge that they have not died in vain. The principles for which they fought are accepted by all the nations who signed the Atlantic Charter.

Poland signed the Atlantic Charter, accepting those principles as rights as well as obligations.

We wish to remind the world that on September 1, 1939, when the German barbarians invaded Poland there was only one boundary question. Poland's boundaries were violated by the Germans. The whole world stood up in arms because the boundaries of one nation were violated by force and brutality of another nation.

England and France declared war because this violation of a principle challenged international morality, the principle that the boundaries of every country are a sacred responsibility of the whole world. One could enumerate many sins of diplomacy that have brought upon us this global war. All started with violations of boundaries as in China, Ethiopia, Austria, and Czechoslovakia. A fourth partition of Poland, by any nation would be dangerous to peace and tend to destroy the moral influence and responsibility of the United States. Our soldiers understood the perilous trip to the battle fronts of the world and will march on carrying the flag of the United States as a symbol that America not only lends and leases money, food, and arms, but also lends and leases the lives of millions of Americans who are carrying with them the American tenets of a new world embodied in the "four freedoms" and the Atlantic Charter. This specifically applies to Russia, to whom Poland as one of the United Nations will be the best guaranty against Germany. Poland had repeatedly rejected German attempts to win her into an alliance against Russia, always faithful to her pledges and pacts.

Unjustified propaganda claims that Poland may become a Fascist country. There need be no such fear. Poland had been partitioned three times before—because she was a democracy and she now self-sacrificed herself for the cause of democracy, rejecting fascism and religious oppression.

Russia need not fear Poland unless she fears democracy.

The Atlantic Charter pledges that "no territorial or other aggrandizement should be tolerated."

That the United Nations "desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned."

The Polish people will never give accord to Russian claims or grab by force. They will continue to repeat this pledge of the Charter and we Americans shall join them, because the Atlantic Charter is America's moral responsibility to humanity.

The Atlantic Charter plainly states that—

"The United Nations believe that all nations of the world, for realistic as well as spiritual reasons, must come to the abandonment of use of force."

It is for this reason that we resolve to unite our material and spiritual forces to defend the Atlantic Charter, which is a passport for every American soldier on his way to victory, and any attempted act repudiating the Atlantic Charter is a thrust at the unity of nations.

We solemnly appeal to our fellow Americans and to the citizens of all civilized countries to stand by and adhere to collective responsibility for Poland. This is a test case of international morality.

To the Polish Government in London, the only legitimate and constitutional representative government of Poland, to the Poles whose country is again a battlefield in the common cause of civilization and Christianity, to our sons in the American armed forces, to the gallant soldiers of the Polish Army and to the armies of all United Nations, we send this message that we dedicate ourselves to the end that they will not have suffered, fought, and died in vain.

CHARLES ROZMAREK,
Chairman, Polish American Congress.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, when the early immigrants to our shores caught their first glimpse of Old Glory fluttering in the clean free wind of the New World, their eyes filled with tears of gratitude to Almighty God, and their hearts were lifted up with fresh hope and faith and courage and resolution.

Even as they fled the ancient oppressions and quarrels of the Old World to defend and enjoy the privileges and opportunities of the New World, so today once more their sons and their sons' sons—yes, and their daughters, too—are fighting and dying all over the world under the same glorious flag to preserve for us and our children and the countless generations as yet unborn those same privileges and opportunities.

What did our gallant marines, storming the blood-stained beachhead at Guadalcanal, think and feel as they followed that banner into battle; followed Old Glory through the perilous murk and mist of the tropic dawn; followed through shot and shell and ambush and death—until that flag floated in triumph over the Solomons? It was no mere piece of colored cloth to them; not just a sheet of striped silk waving gracefully before their grim eyes. Ah, no, it was far, far more than that. It was the visible symbol and memory and meaning of the American creed and American courage.

Listen with hushed and thankful hearts as Old Glory whispers the inspiring message of Bunker Hill. Listen as it shouts the deathless heroism of Gettysburg. Listen as it sings the crimson bravery of Belleau Wood. Listen as it storms the stubborn cliffs of Tunisia or the fog-shrouded ridges of Attu. Listen as it keeps the lonely watch with the sailor at sea or the sentry at his post.

To all of them and all of us it speaks with one voice as the banner of one people, united in war and in peace; the grandest banner that ever hallowed the winds of the world. It speaks, declaring in effect: "I am Old Glory. For more than eightscore years I have been the banner of hope and freedom for generation after generation of Americans. Born amid the first flames of America's fight for freedom, I am the symbol of a country that has grown from a little group of Thirteen Colonies to a united Nation of 48 sovereign States. Planted firmly on the high pinnacle of American faith, my gently fluttering folds have proved an inspiration to untold millions. Men have followed me into battle with unwavering courage. They have looked upon me as a symbol of national unity. They have prayed that they and their fellow citizens might continue to enjoy the life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness which have been granted to every American as the heritage of freemen. So long as men love liberty more than life itself; so long as they treasure the priceless privileges bought with the blood of our forefathers; so long as the principles of truth, justice, and charity for all remain deeply rooted in human hearts, I shall continue to be the enduring banner of the United States of America. I am Old Glory."

Indeed, we can with profit take a lesson from the flag pledge of the Boy Scouts of America:

> My flag! Whether floating proudly in the sunshine before the Capitol at Washington, or fluttering from the stern of a battleship ready to protect our liberties, or borne in loyal peace in school, church, or civic occasion, my flag. The flag of my America, home of liberty, soil of opportunity, tower of power rightly used My America. * * * The blue of my flag represents justice, like the eternal blue of the star-filled heavens; its white is for purity, cleanness of purpose, of word or deed; its red is the red lifeblood of brave men and women, ready to die or to live worthily for their country.

Let us this day, and all our days, remember that if we look to our flag for the guaranty of our cherished "four freedoms," our flag looks to us for the full discharge on our part of the corresponding four responsibilities. From every citizen who finds in its glorious folds the benefits and blessings of the American way of life—our flag, I insist, has a right to expect the fulfillment, without evasion or half-hearted compromise, of the four responsibilities, namely: Service, sacrifice, tolerance, and patriotism.

For, in the eloquent words of President Woodrow Wilson, uttered during the darkest days of the last war:

> This flag, which we honor and under which we serve, is the emblem of our unity, our power, our thought, and purpose as a Nation. It has no other character than that which we give it from generation to generation. The choices are ours. It floats in majestic silence above the hosts that execute these choices, whether in peace or in war. And yet, though silent, it speaks to us—speaks to us of the past, of the men and women who went before us, and of their records they wrote upon it.
> We celebrate the day of its birth; and from its birth until now it has witnessed a great history, has floated on high the symbol of great events, or a great plan of life worked out by a great people. * * *
> Woe to the man, or group of men, that seek to stand in our way in this day of high resolution, when every principle we hold dearest is to be vindicated and made secure for the salvation of the Nation. We are ready to plead at the bar of history, and our flag shall wear a new luster. Once more we shall make good with our lives and fortunes the great faith to which we were born, and a new glory shall shine in the face of our people.

In that same spirit and with that same fortitude and noble resolve, we, here in the Capital of the Nation, as well as in the humblest American home, shall hold Old Glory high in our hearts, shall follow that beloved flag to new victories and triumphs, and shall, in the end, under God, enjoy a just and lasting peace.

Problems Facing Forest Communities in Washington State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, H. J. Andrews is regional forester, Northwest Pacific Region of the United States State Forest Service in the Department of Agriculture. His headquarters are in Portland, Oreg. Recently he made a notable address before the Northwest Conservation League in Seattle which contains very interesting observations and information of a highly educational nature. I commend its reading and study to those who would familiarize themseives with the present status of the lumber industry and who are interested in America's potential timber resources. Forester Andrews, in this speech, predicts that the rate of movement of logs into Puget Sound should decline fairly rapidly in the State. He suggests some remedies for the grave situation confronting the Pacific Northwest with respect to lumber. His proposed remedies are particularly striking and worthy of serious attention. The address is as follows:

PROBLEMS FACING FOREST COMMUNITIES IN WASHINGTON

(By H. J. Andrews, Northwest Conservation League)

Your chairman asked me to talk on the topic "Forest Resources of the State of Washington." I suggested that a mere statistical picture of acreages and types of forest land and volumes of timber and general statistics on depletion and growth might be rather dreary. Also, that in my opinion the next 20 or 25 years will be a very critical period in Washington and that I would prefer to discuss the problems facing the communities and forest industries in the State in the next 20 or 25 years.

Originally, there was a tremendous volume of timber in the State of Washington. There still is a lot of timber. There has been a large industry developed as a result of this timber. In the past few decades this generated more employment than any other industry. This employment has been the accompaniment of a surplus of installed capacity, in fact far too much installed capacity. I would like to see certain aspects of the current situation continued, particularly the employment possibilities. I doubt if the present rate of employment in the forest-using industries can be continued in spite of some additional transition from sawmills to pulp and paper mills and to veneer mills. Broadly speaking, those mills which manufacture pulp and also paper use more man hours per cubic foot of wood than the average sawmill, and to a lesser degree this also is true of veneer mills. As I stated, I have been doubtful for some time if this employment could be continued and the recent pressures of the war for timber have more than confirmed my doubts. Prior to the war we had a so-called open-log market on Puget Sound and on Grays Harbor. In those days there was more private timber than public timber. Today the situation is somewhat reversed with public timber, including both State and Federal, greater in volume than private timber.

The Forest Service has been selling timber for years. Prior to Pearl Harbor some sales were small and for short terms and others were larger, extending over periods of several years. When the war came along we changed this policy and are making no more long-term sales for the duration. Existing sales were not canceled, but for the most part, since Pearl Harbor, new sales have been on a year to year basis, or for even shorter periods. The reason for this is that we have reached a time when, except for the war, many mills would have cut out and might have quit business or moved elsewhere. Due to the war it is costly and almost impossible to move a mill and we have tried our best to keep as many mills as possible going so long as they have no timber of their own or no contractual arrangements for other private timber. This has meant some over-cutting in certain sustained-yield units but there seemed to be no other choice. In order to do the best possible job of marketing the timber we have left and also because Senate bill 250 (the so-called cooperative sustained yield bill) seemed as though it would pass during 1944 we figured it was time to take stock of the situation. So late last fall we asked all of the forest supervisors in the two States to spend January, February and March working on the problem. We furnished each forest with a map showing every description of merchantable old growth timber in the two States. On these maps the supervisors indicated timber ownership and the location of each and every wood-using plant in the State. The approximate life of each mill was then determined and from this analysis of the timber situation outside the boundaries of the national forest we expect to get a fairly accurate picture of the needs of each mill in each community for public timber. This has been quite a chore. The maps and reports came in to our office about the first of April and we are now integrating and analyzing these data. I think it will be another 40 to 60 days before we have the job all done, but even now we can come to certain preliminary conclusions as to the situation. I have the data to present the picture in every major economic unit in the State but in the short period allotted for this talk I will speak only of the situation on Puget Sound.

The Puget Sound area comprises all of the territory that drains into the sound, including the north side of the Olympic Peninsula. In this area there is something over 93,500,000,000 board feet of timber in old growth merchantable stands of which around 43,000,000,000 feet is in private ownership, 40,000,000,000 in national forest and about 11,000,000,000 in other public ownership, principally State. Note that I said "timber in old growth merchantable stands." The figures I am using do not include the volume in trees of merchantable size in second growth stands and the volume in some of the more remote and currently inaccessible parts of the national forests. The inclusion of such timber might increase my volume figures by about one-fifth. However, whether such timber is or is not included in this discussion will have but little bearing on what I have to say about the mills which will be out of timber in the near future. For the most part any timber volume I have not accounted for will be used by mills whose life is estimated at over 15 years.

The present annual log requirements for established plants, including sawmills, pulp mills, plywood and veneer plants, and shingle mills, is about three and one-half billion board feet. The allowable cut based on the present mature timber, together with the growth on restocking lands, is estimated at a little less than one and one-quarter billion feet.. In other words, the allowable cut is approximately one-third of the actual cut. In our preliminary analysis we have projected a few years ahead the average annual cut of mills during the last 5 years in order to get a picture of probable future developments.

In general, the requirements are about as follows: 218 sawmills require a little over 2,000,000,000 feet annually; 11 pulp mills require about nine-tenths of a billion feet annually; 18 plywood mills require close to thirty-six one-hundredths of a billion feet annually; and 74 shingle mills require about two-tenths of a billion feet.

In all, some 320 plants require about three and one-half billion board feet of logs per year. If private timber, only, were taken into consideration, and if all of these plants were to cut exclusively in this private timber, there would be sufficient to last the industry about 12 years. Actually, of course, some plants have an assured life longer than this in their own timber, but others will be forced to close even sooner. Based on the best information available to us and again speaking only of private timber, it appears as though some 165 mills with log requirements of about one and four-tenths of a billion board feet would be out of logs in the next 5 years. About 100 plants with annual requirements of 260,000,000 feet would cut out in the period from 5 to 15 years from now, and another 55 plants which require about one and eight-tenths billion feet a year would have an estimated life over 15 years.

That is not a very optimistic picture. To say the least, it poses some very difficult problems to the administrators of publicly owned timber, both State and Federal. To follow the line of least resistance and sell all public timber just as fast as needed by every applicant would violate the principles of sustained yield. It would give full-scale employment for 10 to 15 years and then there would be a wholesale shut-down on a scale which would shock the economic structure of the region.

Note that without public timber, both Federal and State, and without imports 41 percent of the production would cease in from 1 to 5 years, 8 percent in from 5 to 15 years, and 51 percent can go beyond 15 years. This is based on present uses and standards; that is, boards, veneer, pulp. Under peacetime conditions we would not work toward long-time community stability if we allocated any great volume of national-forest stumpage to mills which have at best a very short lease on life. This would seem to indicate that the major portion of public timber should be used to continue the existence of mills which give promise of contributing to long-time community stability. Only half the current production seems to offer this promise. I feel that if preference is to be given any firms and communities—and recent legislation legalizes such preferences—we should bend our efforts to see that public timber goes into the channels which will give the most employment per unit of raw material and also sustain this employment for a long time. However, there may be some virtue in using a part of the federally and State-owned stumpage to taper off the closing out of the 41 percent of production which otherwise may be out of the picture in the next 5 years. To do this would reduce the allowable sustained cut from the national forests involved 5 years from now and thereafter for the balance of the first cutting period. On the other hand, a loss of 41 percent of production is quite a jolt for the Puget Sound region to take all at once. At the moment, I have no "tapering off" formula. At best it should involve only a small part of the publicly owned stumpage. I realize that developing one will create a lot of headaches for the administrator of public timber.

You will recall that the mills now in the Sound area require 3,500,000,000 feet of timber per year. I estimated the life of the industry on the basis of the remaining private timber in the same area. There is a fallacy in my predictions to the extent that logs reach Puget Sound area from Canada and from other areas in Washington and Oregon, in some instances from points pretty far south in Oregon. If logs continue to be shipped into the Puget Sound area from the Grays Harbor or Columbia River areas in Washington or from the central or southern Oregon areas, my predictions as to life of plants will be too conservative. I doubt if the movement of logs from one section of the Douglas-fir region to another continues at past rates for very long. Very few national-forest logs have been manufactured outside the territory in which they were cut. I anticipate that the Forest Service will not look with favor on long-distance moving of logs from point of cutting to point of manufacture. The recently passed cooperative sustained-yield law permits the earmarking of Federal timber for communities and many communities are showing a decided interest. Some are also interested in the disposal of the privately owned stumpage in their vicinity.

Puget Sound may, therefore, continue to import logs, but I would guess the rate of import will decline fairly rapidly. One good reason for this is that the Grays Harbor, Columbia River (both Oregon and Washington) and Willamette Valley areas are more or less in the same fix as Puget Sound because of excess milling capacity.

In the rest of western Washington exclusive of the Puget Sound territory the situation is briefly as follows: About 143 mills of different sizes require some 2,300,000,000 feet a year. Old growth stands in the same area amount to about 48,000,000,000 feet, about 46 percent private, the rest public. Without public timber and based on no imports from the outside, some 20 mills, representing about half the current annual requirements can continue over 15 years, the balance would be through in the next 15-year period. In eastern Washington (exclusive of the Spokane territory) with about 23,000,000,000 feet of old-growth timber, some 46 mills use 317,000,000 feet annually. In this area about half the current production is in mills which can continue over 15 years.

What can be done? There is no single step which can quickly remedy a situation involving a heavy overinstallation of mill capacity together with a serious depletion of standing timber. Certain moves will help. In some of these the action will have to come from the industry, individually and collectively; in others the action will have to come from the public. The following would help:

1. The best possible utilization in woods and mill. Some plants have just about attained this goal; many others have not.

2. Development and prompt application of new uses.

3. A maximum of local manufacture.

4. More use of so-called "minor" species, including hardwoods.

5. Stop premature wasteful cutting of second-growth stands except as a thinning process.

6. Development of certain main-line common-carrier railroads to tap large bodies of public timber together with intermingled private timber. These could be fed by individually owned truck roads. Improvements in forest transportation systems usually result in far better forest utilization.

7. Help resist pressures to break down sustained-yield programs for public timber.

8. Protect scenic and recreational areas, including roadside strips.

9. Develop sources of employment in the region other than those depending on timber.

10. Individual and collective effort on the part of industry to so conduct its cutting and logging operation as to keep lands reasonably productive and assure a future crop.

11. The practice of selective logging where feasible as a means of reserving for future quality products, material which for various reasons is presently not utilized but is torn down in the clear-cut logging process. There is danger in the unqualified assumption that test-tube forestry and fabricated pieces will enable western producers to compete in eastern markets with eastern and southern manufacturers. Quality lumber always has and will continue to move at premium prices.

You will note the emphasis is on better utilization. In general, we leave one-fourth of the tree in the woods and after sawdust, slabs, and various trimmings are accounted for, the average sawmill turns out in finished products about one-half of the three-fourths that come to the mill. In other words, finished products account for about 37½ percent of the solid-wood volume in standing timber. The utilization in pulp and veneer mills is better. It is physically possible to make various products such as alcohol, plastics, etc., from the five-eighths of the tree which is either not used at all or used for fuel. If these processes can be put on a commercial basis, obviously more labor can be obtained from our remaining old growth. It is doubtful if these miscellaneous uses which can be developed from the so-called waste in the woods and sawmills should be developed in a manner which would result in a faster rate of depletion of our remaining timber. Certainly, first efforts should be toward an integration of industry so that more hours of employment result from every tree felled. If, as techniques improve and requirements change, the various "new" uses such as alcohol and plastics give more employment than is obtained from puttings logs through sawmills, then such uses may well replace some sawmill capacity, preferably that which gets the least out of the logs.

In any event, I can see no basis for any increase in the rate of cutting. There is no control of practice on private lands. Some owners are trying to prolong their woods and mill operations and get on a sustained-yield basis, others aren't. I anticipate strong pressures on the Forest Service to overcut the sustained-yield capacity of its several units. They are already being felt and one argument is that Forest Service sustained-yield calculations are based on rotation ages which are too high; that in the future, wood conversion will be either a process of converting chips into various products or gluing little boards together to make big ones. If this is so, 30- to 70-year rotations may serve instead of 100-year or long rotations. When and as this theory is proven our concepts of rotation should be changed; not before. Also, when that happens, the west coast will take on a type of competition with the East and South which it is not now carrying.

The bulk of our finished forest products, pulp, paper, lumber and veneer, are marketed outside the region with a heavy transportation charge, a much heavier charge than forest products manufacturers in the East and South have to pay. The industry in the Northwest pays woods and mill wages which are higher than those in other parts of the country. In the past and today it is the high quality of our lumber and veneer that has allowed this region to ship its products to other regions where the local forest industries have every advantage except in quality of timber. When everything is on a chip and glue-up basis these other regions will have every advantage, smaller freight charges, cheaper labor. Even today with wartime demands we have great difficulty in getting the smaller trees used on national forest timber sales. Our old growth should be treasured and used to tide over a very difficult transition period. In the next few decades it can help carry the competitive load which will face those who will manufacture our oncoming second growth.

Our analysis of the forest situation in Washington indicates that if all the second-growth areas come through as we hope they will, we may be better off 50 years from today than in the next two or three decades.

Texas on the War Path

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted, I am including, at the request of an old-line Democrat; a press release recently distributed by the anti-fourth-term American Democratic National Committee.

My attention is called to the fact that the importance of the revolt is not to be found in the number of delegates involved so much as in the fact of the number of Texans really behind the opposition to a fourth term.

The recent resignation of the Honorable James A. Farley as State chairman in New York and the more recent activities in Texas in opposition to a fourth term lend added interest to what the American Democratic National Committee is attempting to do.

The press release follows:

The anti-fourth-term American Democratic National Committee hails the split in the Democratic ranks in Texas, as another feather in its cap.

From its national headquarters in Washington, former Congressman John J. O'Connor, of New York, eastern vice chairman of the American Democratic National Committee, today stated:

"The split in the Democratic ranks, this week, in Texas, over a fourth term, was, at least, in part, due to the work of our committee there, under the leadership of our vice chairman, Texas Secretary of Agriculture, J. E. McDonald, with headquarters in Fort Worth. Likewise, we participated in the uprisings of Democrats in Louisiana, South Carolina, and other States, where the followers of Thomas Jefferson have balked at the orders of alien-tongued cheer leaders for the New Deal. Before Chicago, there will be more States heard from!

"What has happened in New York recently should deter a considerable number of real Democratic delegates from even attending the perfunctory convention, to be held in the Windy City in July. That meeting, originally called by the Democratic National Committee, formerly presided over by a real Democrat, James A. Farley, will be run by the Big Four organizations, which have already decreed that Mr. Roosevelt, and also Mr. WALLACE, mind you, must be renominated. It's all over, 'cept the singing of the Internationale!

"The American public now knows that the bosses of the Democratic machine are no longer Tammany and Hague and Guffey and Kelly and their like. While those leaders are still in the game, because they do not dare to quit the captain and face the court martial, they have been benched for none the less than Browder, Hillman, and Dubinsky, the three big bosses of the Big Four and the fourth term drive.

"The Big Four are:

"First, Browder's refitted Community Party or association.

"Second, Hillman's Communist C. I. O. Political Action Committee, which just used its slush fund to renominate the 'rubber stamp' Senators—PEPPER in Florida and HILL in Alabama—and to defeat independent and courageous Representatives STARNES, of Alabama, and COSTELLO, of California—not to forget the boastful threat the same bunch held over the head of Representative MARTIN DIES.

"Third in the Big Four is Hillman's—the same habitue of the White House, a sort of a two-timer boss—communistic American Labor Party. That this cell is Communist-infested is admitted by its former tenants.

"Fourth in line is the Liberal Party, the illegitimate offcast of Hillman's A. L. P.

"In pleading for the united Communist support of Mr. Roosevelt for a fourth term, Mr. Browder, whose right to vote, even, rests upon President Roosevelt's pardon from prison, said—despite the Communists' hocus-pocus about disorganizing and changing their name—'We remain an organization of Communists * * * who hold the principles of Marxism.' So does Stalin! As long as he does, they will.

"Incidentally, that is the same Communist Party which Mr. Roosevelt's General Biddle—second in command at the battle of Montgomery Ward—legally held as having as its principal purpose the overthrow of our form of government by force. Yet they're still doing business at the same old stand—1600 Pennsylvania Avenue.

"The second boss is Mr. Hillman, of the White House-blessed firm of Hillman, Lepke, and company, about which Governor Dewey, if nominated for President, will probably have a great deal to say.

"Add the third boss, the 'Leftist,' pinkish radical, Dubinsky.

"What a triumvirate to be running, not only the affairs of our party of Jefferson, but actually directing the destinies of a Nation of 130,000,000 people, with whom they have nothing in common.

"In fact, they and their lieutenants, who are now running the administration, with Mr. Roosevelt as their tool and Mr. WALLACE as their new 'white hope'—

"They just don't look like Americans;
"They don't think like Americans;
"They don't act like Americans;
"They don't smell like Americans,
"They just 'ain't' Americans.

"Despite all of which, they have the audacity to use the word 'American.' They then warp the word 'liberal' to meet their foreign concepts—the principles Marx stood for.

"Like President Roosevelt's announcement of the dropping of the shibboleth 'New Deal,' they change their party names, as well as their own—willy-nilly.

"Talleyrand said: 'An important art of politicians is to find new words for institutions which under their old names have become odious to the public.'

"The real Americans in the two great parties could meet this challenge to the continuance and the future welfare of our country, by recalling that 112 years ago, last Monday, the first Democratic National Convention nominated as its candidate Mr. Andrew Jackson, who, 4 years earlier, had been elected President, as a Republican. We have today a Farley and a BYRD and many other real Democrats and outstanding Republicans, who can proudly carry the standard of the real Americans."

The Plight of the Stock Grower

OF

A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address prepared for delivery by me at the fifty-fifth annual convention of the stock growers at Scottsbluff, Nebr., June 9, 1944:

Mr. President, members of the stock growers association, ladies and gentlemen, like every other group in this country, the stockmen are looking to the future and trying to make plans to weather the succeeding crises that are bound to come before we again settle down to a more or less normal life in this country. I am convinced that the problems they are facing today have been brought about to a great extent by too much planning on the part of governmental agencies that are long on theory and short on experience. I have lived and worked for 25 years in the cattle country and for the past year and a half have had daily contact with the agencies of government who have taken over control of the production, distribution, and the regimentation of this country. One thing seems certain, that there is entirely too many Government agencies with their fingers in the pie of the production, handling, and distribution of food. There should be one individual with authority to head up all of the buying for the Army, Navy, lend-lease, and for civilian use. This has been recommended by the food producers of the country. It is being ignored by Washington authorities.

In spite of the fact that there are from ten to fifteen million more cattle on the ranges in this country than at any previous time, the consumer finds it impossible to get good beef in the retail markets in sufficient quantities to satisfy his wants. While the supply of cattle on the range has greatly increased, there has been a 30- to 40-percent reduction in the feed lots of the country. This will eventually mean less meat to the consumers because meat is actually produced in the feed lots of America. At this date, June 9, 1944, we understand some orders are being considered which may change the classification of meat and may well bring further discouragement to the producers of cattle. It is difficult to find out just what orders are about to be issued, but some are forthcoming. It is not likely that it will clarify or help the meat situation. It may even cause a further unbalanced situation.

One thing seems certain with the greatly increased supply of cattle on the range coupled with a marked decrease in the amount of available feed, and with the reduction of the amount of labor, we can well expect a flood of grass fed cattle going to the markets between September and December. It may well surpass the congestion which occurred in the marketing of hogs. It could mean a demoralized market. The cattlemen must be prepared. Regardless of the number of cattle on the range, it through a combination of circumstances, it cannot get to the consumer, the surplus is bound to affect the price and it spells a rough road ahead. Right now there is a decided shortage of labor on the ranches. This picture is liable to change soon after Germany is defeated. Then there is a shortage of grain and protein feeds. On top of all this the Government is maintaining a ceiling price on livestock. The factors I have mentioned above—shortage of labor, scarcity of feeds and their high price, and the ceiling price of livestock—have brought about this natural result and accounts for the shortage of good beef on the retail markets.

There is an additional matter that the cattlemen must take into consideration. It is the unintelligent and unsympathetic handling of the meat situation by Government agencies. Although committees have been set up to advise these agencies they have too often been considered with suspicion and their advice, when given, has been disregarded. Most of the time the committees have been summoned to hear an announcement of a policy already decided upon by some planners in the agencies.

The entire cattle industry is under an artificial price control. These controls are being manipulated and conducted by inexperienced men in Washington. These controls bring on a hopeless tangled condition. It means red tape and confusion. The cattlemen's business has been subjected to man made rules and regulations which hamper, annoy and bring discouragement to the industry. Many of these conditions will prevail until there is an end of hostilities and a change of this administration. I am certain there are men in this administration who want to control and regulate everything from your shoe strings to your hair tonic. It is up to the American people to effect a change.

Up to recent weeks the administration has not been interested in getting cattle in the feed lots. They have not wanted any corn-fed meat. They fail to realize that it is possible to put two or three hundred extra pounds of meat on the same frame by giving the animal a little grain. There were recent meetings with the War Food Administration and O. P. A. and it seems now that they may adopt a different attitude and even urge that cattle be placed in the feed lot in order to produce more meat.

Politics is another factor that the cattlemen must consider in their future plans. You will recall that Mr. Bowles, Administrator of O. P. A., had an article in the May 6 edition of Collier's in which he said there would be no changes in the near future in the rationing of meat. However, on May 4—he had written the Collier's article before this—he announced the take-off of points on all meat with the exception of a few cuts of beef. Mr. Bowles had no intention of changing O. P. A.'s policy on meat rationing when he wrote the article. The policy had been determined upon by his experts in the agency. But Mr. Bowles did not have the last word. No, somebody in the inner cabinet figured it would be good politics to relax rationing at this time and ordered him to do so in spite of his experts. You see, there is the Office of Economic Stabilization, set up by the President without authority of law and presided over by Judge Fred Vinson, whose principal purpose seems to be to take care of the political angle. This is the Office that carries out the orders of the New Deal inner circle. It gives orders to O. P. A., the War Food Administration, the War Labor Board, and the other war agencies.

There is another major factor that must be considered by the cattleman in making his future plans. That is the factor of national income for the future of the industry will depend a lot on this factor. There has never been an oversupply of food in this country. Rather there has been underconsumption because the people lacked the money with which to buy. The national income reached a high in 1929 of $83,300,000,000 and then dropped to a low of $39,900,000,000 in 1932. In 1942 it was $119,700,000,000. It is estimated it was over $150,000,000,000 in 1943 and will also top that figure in 1944. In order to continue prosperity in this country it is believed that the national income must be maintained at not less than $100,000,000,000. In addition to the demand for meat in this country we will be faced with furnishing food for a time to the people of the liberated countries.

All these things must be taken into consideration by the cattlemen in their plans for the future. The cattleman is essentially an individualist. He is that because during the past he has had to meet the staggering problems of his business with his own ingenuity. Through his associations he has spread his experiences and gained from the experience of others in his own field. He will continue to do this and will continue to solve his problems. There is only one thing that he will be unable to cope with and that is a continued unintelligent and unsympathetic interference of government in the industry. We must see to it that government controls are relaxed as soon as possible after the war is over and in the meantime we should make every effort to get Government agencies to take a different attitude toward the problems of the production and distribution of meat.

Franco—Hitler's Imitator

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have been attempting to persuade my colleagues and the people of the country that they should exert themselves to the end that we sever diplomatic relations with Franco Fascist Spain. It is my contention that we stultify ourselves in the eyes of the people of occupied Europe and the champions of democracy everywhere in the world when we appease and collaborate with Franco Spain.

Miss Dorothy Thompson, in my judgment, is one of the most eminent feminine intellectuals in America. She is a profound student of international relations. She has a thorough understanding of the complicated picture affecting the diplomatic maneuvering between various countries of Europe. She is realistic. She recognizes the transcendent importance of our showing to the people of Latin America that we mean what we say when we claim to be fighting a war against fascism. The state of our relations with Latin America depends in no small part on the acceptance by the Latins of our bona-fides as implementing our professions of devotion to democracy. Recently, Miss Thompson delivered a notable address over the Blue Network of the National Broadcasting Co. which was reprinted in the weekly magazine The Nation. This speech sustains the position I have taken in the Congress with respect to Franco and Phalange. Here it is:

FRANCO, NEW AXIS CHIEF

(By Dorothy Thompson)

During the past weeks I have been observing something I think very important. You may not be convinced by what I am going to say, but I shall produce concrete evidence. Fascism is not just an Italian or a German idea. The chief German Nazis—Hitler, Rosenberg, Goering, Goebbels, Himmler, Hess—are not ordinary German nationalists at all. (Conrad Heiden, in his book Der Fuehrer, calls them armed bohemians.) Of these six men I have just named, only two—Goering and Goebbels—were even born in Germany. All of them have always looked far beyond Germany. They organized, in national socialism, a movement which was designed to sweep the world. They built up this conspiracy methodically in all countries. Their idea was to create a new kind of state, and world union of states, based on the overthrow of popular governments and the substitution of military despotisms by means of organized mass movements—all these states to be pawns in the hands of the intellectual and political leaders of the Nazi-Fascist Parties.

The key point of the whole plot was Berlin, the strongest capital of the strongest state in Europe.

They know now that the Nazi-Fascist war may be lost. They have to take that into their reckoning. Of course, they will prolong it as long as they can. They know that there can be many a slip in war. Allies, for instance, can split; governments can change, bringing new policies. They will try, and probably succeed, in turning the path to Berlin into a path of blood. But they have to take into their calculations that in all probability, sooner or later, they will lose the war. So then what will they do?

What they are already laying plans for is to create a new Axis. They are planning to find new ground from which to continue their fight against free governments and peoples, against the passion of the peoples to cast off their chains of militarism and oppression and—as Lincoln said—find freedom in the brotherhood of life.

The Nazi international foresees that Europe may be almost wholly lost to it. Whether the Russians descend on Germany with grim, relentless fury, or whether the Anglo-American troops march triumphant from Calais to Berlin, fascism will be finished in belligerent Europe with our winning of the war. It will be finished in Norway, Holland, Belgium, France, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Rumania, and Poland. And it will be finished in Berlin and Rome.

Where then will it go? I will tell you. It is going to make this hop: Berlin-Madrid-Buenos Aires. The center of the new Nazi-Fascist Axis will not be Berlin. It will be Madrid. Hitler's experience shows that you don't need a great power to start with. He didn't even start with Germany, but with one town—Munich. The rest he did by propaganda and tactics. And the rallying ground for a new attempt to overthrow political freedom and the countries based on it will not be in the Old World but in the New World—in Latin America. The signs and portents reveal themselves daily. And the old familiar pattern repeats itself, too—the pattern of appeasement.

The most dangerous man in the world the day after victory will not be Hitler, who will have managed to ally the whole world against him and lead his country to catastrophe. No; the most dangerous Fascist will be Franco, who is managing to help the Axis while winning gratitude from us for his so-called neutrality.

What does that neutrality amount to? Is it a neutrality comparable, for instance, to that of Sweden and Switzerland? Is it the neutrality of a man who wants us to win, because his country is, like Switzerland and Sweden, freedom-loving and democratic? Not at all. Franco's neutrality is the neutrality of a man who would like to see the Axis win and has repeatedly said so, but who thinks it may not, and intends to preserve one place in Europe where fascism can take a new lease on life after this war. Franco is betting on Germany and Italy being defeated but on fascism surviving.

For the past weeks dispatches from Madrid to the United States have appeared under such headlines as "Franco currying favor with Allies," "Spain frees republicans for Christmas amnesty," "Franco seeks to allay hatreds—his new liberalism intended to remove threats of revolts, Spain paying debt to United States exporters"—all these creating the impression that Spain is swinging over to our side in the war and even to domestic liberalism. Several news reports from Spain say that Franco is gradually dissolving the Phalangist Party—the Spanish Fascist Party.

But if one reads these dispatches carefully they furnish no evidence whatever that any of this wishful thinking is true. Has Franco freed political prisoners, in a movement toward greater liberalism? According to the Phalangist newspaper, there were in January 1940, 270,719 republican political prisoners. The Christmas amnesty freed 40,000 of these. That left more than 230,000. Dispatches say that 34,000 cases are under review. That would still leave over 200,000 unaccounted for. And a little item explains this. "The majority of Spanish prisoners," it says, "were arrested without any charges whatsoever and the amnesty does not apply to them." So our liberal Franco is apparently holding around 200,000 persons without warrant, without indictment, without any reason ever given to them or to the world. These men who were imprisoned for their resistance to fascism are infinitely worse off than Nazi prisoners of war in British or American internment camps, whose treatment is under international conventions and checked by the Red Cross.

Is Franco gradually dissolving the Phalangist Party, as reported by Herbert Clark, correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, on January 8? The only evidence Mr. Clark gives for this is that Franco is taking some non-Phalangists into his government. Hitler has had men who were not Nazi Party members in his government from the beginning to the present time. The Phalangist Party is the only legal party in Spain. It is supported right out of the state treasury. And this year's budget increased the appropriation for the Phalangist Party. A fine way to dissolve a party—to subsidize it out of the taxes of the people.

How about the Spanish Legion, fighting with the Germans on the eastern front? Franco has had to admit that 1,500 of them are still fighting. And what do you think he told British and American diplomats when asked to explain. He said they were mostly criminal elements, whose return to Spain would be bad for the country.

There are some other things happening which tell the truer story. The International Labor Office knows that Franco still has a treaty with the Germans, entitled "Concerning the Allocation of Spanish Manpower." Under that treaty Franco has furnished labor to German factories. These workers aren't volunteers. They are conscripted by their own Government and sent to Germany to make bombs with which to kill us. No such treaty exists between Germany and any other neutral country.

On January 16 news broke of a series of bomb explosions on British ships carrying oranges from Spain to England. This made the British hopping mad, and the British Ambassador to Madrid took occasion, at a dinner given to the diplomatic corps, to take Franco aside and protest in no uncertain terms. What was the result? Franco got the American Ambassador, Carlton Hayes—who has leaned over backward to behave correctly toward Franco—into a conversation and told him that Algiers was a hotbed of communism, and all the Free French were Communists. Hayes was so angry that it almost came to an international incident—but it's proof enough that Franco feels little necessity to appease us.

It is as clear as distilled water that Franco is playing the Axis game as a neutral while making himself the pet boy of the Allies. He apparently hopes to emerge from the war as the only decent Fascist in the public opinion of a large part of the Allied countries. And what does that mean to us, the United States?

It means the most dangerous situation imaginable. For all European countries, the one with the greatest influence in Latin America is Spain. Latin America is predominantly Spanish in culture. Already one Fascist coup has been engineered in the Western Hemisphere, namely, in Argentina, where a Fascist military dictatorship on the Franco pattern has seized power. The Ramirez dictatorship is pro-Axis. The recent severance of diplomatic relations with the Axis is no more in conflict with this fact than is Franco's neutrality. The best position for a Fascist regime today is that of neutrality toward or collaboration with the winners—especially if they are able to strangle the country's economy.

The Argentine dictatorship speculates that after the war fear of the colossus of the north can be created in country after country south of the Rio Grande. The argument that Latin America is threatened by northern domination will be used to prove the necessity for strong governments, namely, military and totalitarian dictatorships. And this Argentine pattern is already spreading—to Bolivia, for instance.

Just the other day I heard from a most reliable source that the Nazi regime is preparing, when defeat is no longer avoidable, to shift machinery from German industries to neutral Spain, where it is to be stored until it can be shipped after the war to the Argentine. Their idea is to industrialize and arm the Argentine, spreading from there through all Latin America. They already—as the papers revealed last week—have a formidable spy ring operating from there. In it are even Argentine officials. When the British arrested the Argentine consul in Trinidad, exposing a whole plot, the Argentine Government was forced to act. It had to pretend it had only just discovered the machinations of the Axis in its country, whereas in fact the plotting had been thoroughly exposed by an investigating committee of the Argentine Congress. A Montevideo newspaper published a letter the other day from the secretary of the political bureau of the German Embassy in Buenos Aires promising the iron cross from the Fuehrer to those who work well in Latin America and help all revolutionary anti-Allied and anti-Semitic elements in Latin America. * * *

What can we do about all this? There is only one thing we can do. Diplomatic notes and formal protests may change tactics but not essential sympathies. What we can do is to help our real allies, who are the people of these countries. There are strong popular underground movements in both Spain and Argentina—movements which, not for our sakes but for their own, long to overthrow these military despotisms. We should help these movements, help them by all possible means. Hitler saw long ago that the way to get on without war is to overthrow hostile governments from within. And that much we should have learned from him.

Coast Guard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I know that the House today will want to join in the all-America salute being accorded Vice Admiral Russell R. Waesche as he begins his third 4-year term as head of the United States Coast Guard. Serving with great distinction, Admiral Waesche and the Coast Guard have contributed mightily to the winning of this war. With his officers, men and women, the admiral should be proud of the manner in which they continue to carry on the great traditions of this sea service. I mention the women because the SPARS, under the capable direction of Capt. Dorothy Stratton, are now a part of the Coast Guard and their contributions have been such as to warrant their permanency.

The Washington Post this morning editorially pays Admiral Waesche and the Coast Guard the following timely tribute:

COAST GUARD

It gives us a good deal of pleasure to extend our congratulations to the amiable and energetic Vice Admiral Russell R. Waesche, who today enters his third 4-year term as head of the United States Coast Guard. Admiral Waesche is, we believe, the first Coast Guard officer ever to hold so high a rank, and the honor is in itself a recognition of the very large and important role which has been assigned to this service in this war. Since its establishment in 1790, the Coast Guard has had some part in all the conflicts in which this Nation has been engaged, and had a considerable part in World War of 1917–18, when the number of its officers and men lost in action was proportionately greater than that of any other service. But this is the first time that its activities have taken it so far beyond those coasts of which it is the traditional guardian and policeman. The Coast Guard seems to have had some share in nearly all the campaigns involving operations by sea and an important share in those at Singapore, Tulagi, Guadalcanal, the Gilberts, Salerno, and Normandy.

Although, as regards publicity and eclat, the Coast Guard perhaps is still the most neglected of the services, it in no way suffers by comparison of its record with that of any other service. The work of the Coast Guard harbor and coastal patrols is perhaps less vital now than it was in the months immediately after Pearl Harbor. But is was certainly vital then. It was the first American service to take German prisoners in this war. It was a Coast Guard man, you will remember, who engineered the capture of the saboteurs landed on Long Island from a German submarine, and it was Coast Guard vigilance that discouraged the Nazis from landing others. It certainly did its part and a little more in the great and difficult battle that may yet prove to have been the really decisive battle of the war, namely, the Battle of the North Atlantic. In the meantime it has continued all those duties of lifebuoy tending, ice breaking, life saving, and so on, which are its peacetime province, though it is probable that the revenue-collecting activities may have slumped a bit. Looking over the record, Admiral Waesche and his officers and men have every reason to be proud of their now highly ramified organization.

Jews in Up-State New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. BYRNE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. BYRNE. Mr. Speaker, Jewish participation in the development of up-State New York began when there was yet no such thing as New York. While in the commencement of American settlement, the bulk of the Jews coming, went to Manhattan, there was from the very inception—a trickle up the Hudson. In 1655, we already have record of a real estate transaction in Albany in which the name of Asser Levy figures.

At the time, Albany was a small trading post established by the Dutch West India Co. and was known as Fort Orange. It will be recalled by those who know their early American history that Peter Stuyvesant was something of a pompous and arbitrary official, scarcely typifying the Dutch spirit of tolerance, which particularly shone out at that time of almost universal intolerance.

The city of Amsterdam in Holland was one place where Jews in Europe could become citizens. It was not only Jews who took advantage of the Dutch tolerance. As we know the Pilgrims also found refuge there. A reactionary of the day characterized Amsterdam contemptuously as a "mixture of Arianism, Anabaptism, and Judaism."

The Dutch West India Co. which sponsored the settlement of New Amsterdam had a considerable percentage of Jewish stockholders. There was, therefore, every reason to expect, both from the point of view of the Holland traditions and that of material interests, that Peter Stuyvesant would uphold in full the Dutch traditions as to equality of the Jews in New Amsterdam.

Unfortunately, while an able individual in many ways, Stuyvesant was narrow—a narrowness which some historians believe was largely the cause for the loss of New Amsterdam to the Dutch, for when the English attacked New Amsterdam, there was little resistance on the part of the people—many of the people believing that they would fare better under a less arbitrary regime if the English took charge.

The Jews in Manhattan under Stuyvesant were subject to numerous restrictions as to trade and one forbade them to trade at South River and Fort Orange.

An appeal was made to the Dutch West India Co. The company wrote to Stuyvesant reproving them:

We have seen here and learned with displeasure, that your honors, have against our apostille of the 15th of February 1655, granted to the Jews or Portuguese nation at their request, have forbidden them to trade at Fort Orange and South River and also to purchase the real estate which is allowed them here in this country without any difficulty, and wish that this had not occurred, but that your honors had obeyed our orders which you must hereafter execute punctually and with more respect.

Asser Levy who was the first Jew to have any business dealings at Albany had already established a reputation as a fighter in Manhattan.

He first came in the limelight when the schout—sheriff—of New Amsterdam entered his butcher shop with a bill for taxes.

Asser Levy looked up. "Why, I have already paid my taxes."

But this, the schout explained, was a special tax on Jews imposed on them for their exemption from standing guard and military service.

"But," remonstrated Asser Levy, "I have not asked for any such exemption, and moreover I insist on my right to stand guard like the other burghers."

Asser Levy had a fight on his hand, but he won this one of the first battles for religious equality in America.

Asser Levy was always fighting. His name appears frequently in litigation with the most prominent residents—the aristocracy. Generally, such a man is classified as a turbulent sort and does not enjoy the respect of the community, and yet it is very evident that this is not so in the case of Asser Levy.

The Jew who insisted on his right to shoulder his gun and stand guard apparently enjoyed a wide respect among his fellows of the community. This is evidenced in particular by the number of non-Jews who named Levy executor of their wills. Apparently he was a man whose integrity was respected by all of his Christian neighbors and who was thoroughly trusted.

Among other Jews who are mentioned as having traded at Fort Orange and the South River along this period of 1655 are Joseph de Acosta and Benjamin Cardoso.

In colonial days, Jonas Phillips was a well-known resident of Albany. Levy Solomons who was engaged in the manufacture of chocolate and snuff is listed as among the ardent supporters of the American Revolution.

The first Jewish settlers of Albany were Jews of Spanish-Portuguese derivation. Around 1838, with the beginning of a heavy German immigration to this country, the German-Jewish element became dominant and in that year the first Jewish congregation was formed. While previously, the immigrant flux stayed in New York, canals, turnpikes, and steamboats transported the newer immigrants to the rapidly growing urban centers of Albany, Troy, Peekskill, Poughkeepsie. Jews penetrated far north into the Plattsburg settlement and went west to the cities of Rochester, Syracuse, Utica, and Buffalo.

The first rabbi of the Albany Jewish community was Isaac M. Wise, a man who was destined to play an important role in the whole of American Jewish life. Wise was a very interesting figure and counted among his special friends Seward, whom he first met when the former was Governor of New York.

Wise, then an immigrant from Germany, has told of his first visit to Albany. He wrote:

The steamer seemed to be a floating palace, the people higher beings, and the Hudson a second Chedquel, flowing out of the Garden of Eden. The lofty walls of rock above New York seemed to shut off the Old World and the steep heights in the vicinity of West Point were for me the mighty door, the giant gate opening into the New World. Overcome with awe and devotion, I could have embraced every mountain, every rock. Then we reached the broad valley near Rhinebeck.

In the midst of this ecstasy which the sight of the Hudson evoked in him, Wise relates a comical incident, which helps us visualize those times when the Hudson scene was bursting with new life as large numbers of immigrants were coming into the country. Continues Rabbi Wise:

When I began to feel somewhat more prosaic, I saw a man who seemed a countryman of mine walking through the boat anxiously and searchingly.

"Have you lost anything?"

"I have lost everything," he cried, "I have lost my English language."

"You have lost the English language? I do not understand."

"You do not understand? Neither do I and therein lies my misfortune. I arrived at New York and after I had paid all my debts, I had $20 and 5 shillings left. So they said to me, 'Cohen, you must have a basket for 6 shillings and $20 worth of kuddel muddle and then you must go peddling in the country.'

"I cry out: The country speaks English, and I do not. How in the world can I get along?

"That makes no difference, they told me. We will write everything down for you. Well, they gave me the basket filled with kuddle muddle and wrote for me the English language on a piece of paper and sent me up the Hudson. Now I have lost the English language and am perfectly helpless."

"If that is all you are in need of, I can help you." I told him to write down in German the terms of which he required the English equivalent and translated these words for him. He now had his English language again.

Enthusiastic about American institutions, it was natural that when the occasion offered, Rabbi Wise should stop off at Washington to see the Capitol. Seward, whom he had known as Governor of New York, was now in the United States Senate, and through Seward Rabbi Wise was to meet Daniel Webster and on different occasions several of the Presidents of the United States.

The first President he met was Polk. Later he met "Old Rough and Ready" Zachary Taylor.

"You came because you never before saw a President of the United States," said President Taylor.

"No," said Rabbi Wise. "Your Excellency, I had already met a President. I met President Polk. I came to meet the hero of Buena Vista."

General Taylor made a gracious bow at this.

Later, Wise met President Fillmore, who at one time as Comptroller of New York had lived in Albany, although Wise had not formed his acquaintance there.

Fillmore was very gracious to Wise, but after some talk it was plain there was something on Fillmore's mind. Finally it came out, when Fillmore said: "Well, Washington is an expensive place to linger in. So if you have anything to say, there is no reason for delaying. I presume you are here about the petition."

"Petition," said Rabbi Wise. "What petition? I know of no petition."

"Do you mean to say you know nothing about this petition?" said President Fillmore, taking out a long petition signed by many score residents of Albany asking that Rabbi Wise be appointed to a position at the Congressional Library.

Rabbi Wise was dumbfounded. A number of his Christian neighbors who knew President Fillmore had, without asking Wise, asked the President to name him to a political post.

Rabbi Wise said the offer to the Library was very attractive to him, but at the time he had other ideas. Wise was grateful for the incident as showing him the respect which he enjoyed in the Albany community.

BUFFALO

A few Jews were to be found in Buffalo from almost the very beginning, but it was not until 1825 that something of outstanding interest in connection with the Jews developed there. This was nothing less than a scheme to establish on Grand Island near Buffalo a kind of American Zion—a haven for the oppressed Jews of the world.

The sponsor of the scheme was Maj. Mordecai Manuel Noah. Major Noah was born in Charleston, S. C. George Washington, according to a tradition, was present at the wedding of his parents.

In Charleston, Noah was editor of a paper, fought several duels, and then moved to New York, where he became an important figure politically. He was the publisher of the New York Enquirer and was generally regarded as the editorial spokesman of Martin Van Buren. It was probably due to his meetings with Van Buren that Noah became familiar with up-State New York. Anyway, he appeared to have developed an attachment for the region. His daughter, Zipporah, he sent to a school in Schenectady.

This scheme for the establishment of a Jewish haven on Grand Island was quite an extravagant one (but the major had a great imagination). As early as January 19, 1820, Noah petitioned the State legislature to permit the sale to him of Grand Island in the Niagara River "for the purpose of attempting to have the same settled by the emigrants of the Jewish religion from Europe," but not until September 1825 did Noah issue an appeal to world Jewry, solemnly inviting them to join him, Mordecai Noah. He described himself in this call as a "citizen of the United States of America, a late consul for the said States for the city and kingdom of Tunis, high sheriff of New York, and counselor of and by the grace of God, governor and judge of Israel."

Most of the things which he claimed in this description were true. He had served as consul to Tunis, appointed by President Madison, and he had been sheriff of New York, but the post of governor and judge of Israel he had conferred on himself.

He named this place of asylum "Aararat," thus tying up the ark of Noah of the Bible with his own proposed ark.

Noah was a firm believer in the theory then held by not a few that the Indians were the lost 10 tribes. It was held in support of this theory that the Indians, for example, counted time as the Jews, by the moon, not the sun, that they seemed to partake of an aversion to pigs, that some of their laws for sexual purification resembled the Jews'. In this new asylum for Jews at Grand Island, Major Noah proposed to reunite the lost 10 tribes of the Indians with the Jews. Apparently, he had converted Red Jacket, the famous Indian chief, to this view. At any rate, Red Jacket was present at the exercises laying the cornerstone of the new settlement.

Preceding the exercises, a company of New York Militia marched through the village of Buffalo to lend martial dignity to the event.

The dedicatory service was held at St. Paul Church in Buffalo, as there were not sufficient boats for the crossing to Grand Island. Major Noah and the rector of the church were the only two speakers.

Alas, nothing was to come of Major Noah's grandiose and benevolent idea. The slab of stone for the dedication may still be seen at the Buffalo Historical Society. It is all that is left of this American Noah's Ark.

Noah, as has been indicated, was a versatile sort. He had something of a flair for playwriting. He wrote no great plays—he dashed them off lightly and apparently had no delusions about his being a great playwright, but his plays were well received by the public. He was, one might say, the original George M. Cohan. The patriotic motif was accented. One of his plays, She Would Be a Soldier, dealt with the War of 1812. Another of his plays, Marion or the Hero of Lake George, as its name indicates, deals with the locale of northern New York. It is interesting to note that recently when the bicentennial of George Washington was nationally observed, Columbia University, in marking this event, gave a production of Noah's Marion.

JEWISH PATRIOTISM

If Noah paid tribute to the patriotic sacrifices during the Revolutionary War, another family in up-State New York gave a splendid exemplification of patriotism in real life. This was the Hays family which was scattered in the up-State, with the seat of the family at New Rochelle.

The Hays family was of Dutch descent and emigrated from Holland in the early part of the eighteenth century. According to a family tradition, they came in their own ships together with that of their servants, cattle, implements of agriculture, arriving in New York in 1720. Many of them remained as farmers.

Benjamin Ettings Hays, who farmed at Bedford, was highly esteemed by his Christian neighbors, who spoke of him as "Uncle Ben, the best Christian in Westchester County." He was very philanthropic and donated the land for the first school in Pleasantville.

Jacob Hays, the eldest of the four brothers, lived in Rye, Westchester. His sons, Michael and David Hays, were farmers at Mt. Pleasant.

David Hays, Jr., served under George Washington in the French and Indian War and was present at Braddock's defeat.

The family of David Hays played a very dramatic role in the American Revolution. Westchester County, by reason both of its strategical importance and the large number of Tories scattered among its patriotic population, was the scene of almost constant warfare during the Revolution, regular and irregular.

David Hays was too old at the time of the Revolution to do much fighting himself but he helped with his cattle in provisioning the American Army, while his sons were members of Washington's fighting forces.

Once, while all the menfolks of the Hays establishment were absent with the patriot army, the Tories entered the Hays house, finding only Mrs. Hays and her daughters and a Negro servant in the house. The Tories suspected that members of the Hays family had driven the cattle to the American lines through the enemy lines and they sought to get the facts out of Mrs. Hays—about this and other American plans. Mrs. Hays was lying on her sick bed at the time with her infant child but she refused to play the traitor and the house was burned down. Mrs. Hays was conveyed by the faithful Negro servant to a shelter in the woods.

Mrs. Hays' brother, Reuben, a clerk in a bank, had joined the American Army immediately after the Battle of Lexington. He was taken prisoner by the British at Charlestown and when the British learned that the rebel was a Jew, they gave him for food only pork, which he refused to eat, subsisting, until exchanged, on such morsels of unforbidden food as he could obtain from his fellow prisoners. Weakened by confinement and privation, he died of consumption soon after his release.

Jacob Hays, born in Bedford, 1772, the eldest son of David, was later to achieve almost national renown, when he was appointed high constable of New York. He acquired world-wide fame as a detective. Old Hays was said to have been a terror to evildoers.

In the French and Indian War, Judah Hays played a conspicuous part. His 16-gun ship, Duke of Cumberland, saw service as a privateer during the French and Indian War.

In the War of 1812, Maj. Mordecai Myer achieved the reputation of a hero. He later served as mayor of Schenectady. He was an officer of the Thirtieth United States Infantry and was wounded at the battle of Chryslers Field. From 1831 to 1834, Myer was a member of the New York Assembly and from 1851 to 1854, he was mayor of Schenectady. He was very prominent in Masonic circles.

None has made early New York life so well known to posterity as Washington Irving. Most of us who have any knowledge of old Dutch days derive it from Irving's writings.

In that connection, there is a very interesting story about Irving and a character for which he was responsible, but which he did not create. That character was Rebecca Gratz, the daughter of a leading Jew of Philadelphia.

It was at Saratoga Springs that Washington Irving met Rebecca Gratz, who was to become, thanks to Irving, the "original" for the Rebecca of Scott's Ivanhoe.

The acquaintance between Irving and Rebecca Gratz stemmed from the fact that Rebecca Gratz was a very close friend of Matilda Hoffman, the one love of Washington Irving's life.

When the beautiful Matilda Hoffman died of consumption Washington Irving was heartbroken, as were indeed all those who had known the beautiful Matilda. A solace to all of them in this hour of trial was Matilda's friend, Rebecca. She proved a great comfort to Judge Hoffman, the father of Matilda and to Washington Irving.

Sometime after that Washington Irving went abroad and met Sir Walter Scott and told him about Miss Gratz. After Scott had finished Ivanhoe he wrote to Irving, asking if the picture he had drawn of Rebecca tallied with the original.

To enumerate the multitude of ways in which Jews have participated in the life of up-State New York would be an endless story. There is much that might be said in the field of commerce, of education, of philanthropy, of all fields.

In the city of Amsterdam, it was Julius Wasserman who developed that town as a center for the making of carpets. The philanthropies of Lucius N. Littauer, of Gloversville, are well known. Up-State New York has sent two Jews to Congress—Mr. Littauer and Meyer Jacobstein. To the supreme court, it has given Michael Hirsberg, of Newburgh; Irving Goldsmith, of Saratoga Springs; Simon Fleischman has been president of the City Council of Buffalo; Morris Block, mayor of Kingston; Myer Einstein, mayor of Dunkirk; Julius Frank, mayor of Ogdensburg; David Heller, mayor of Elmira; Eugene H. Lehman, mayor of Tarrytown; Julius M. Goldstein, mayor of Oneida.

Louis Marshall, for long one of the foremost constitutional lawyers of America, was a native of Syracuse and practiced law for many years in Syracuse before going to New York City. The law was his profession, but Marshall was a lover of forestry and did much for the conservation movement in America. It was fitting that the University of Syracuse should have given his name to their building devoted to forestry.

Charley Wilson of W. P. B.—True Giant of Production

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Chicago Daily News of June 6, written by Edwin A. Lahey, entitled "Charley Wilson of W. P. B.—True Giant of Production":

CHARLEY WILSON, OF W. P. B.—TRUE GIANT OF PRODUCTION

(By Edwin A. Lahey)

WASHINGTON, June 6.—Whatever a critical citizenry might say to the contrary, the war has brought to Washington a number of men who are giants in their own right, men big enough not to be embraced in Joseph Tumulty's observation that "Some men grow in Washington; others just swell."

Of the true giants on the scene today, Charles Edward Wilson is one of the least known, but not the least. Here are the statistics on him:

He's Executive Vice Chairman of the War Production Board; 56 years old; 6 feet 1 and 200 pounds; mild mannered and cordial, but one of the toughest men in Washington; he gets $8,000 a year; works from 9 till 7 in his modest office, and more at his hotel apartment; he has enacted a Horatio Alger story in his life—born on the West Side of New York of poor parents; went to work at 13 at $3 a week; studied in the New York night schools, stayed with the same company all his life, and became its $175,000-a-year president.

General Electric is his company. He had run its business up to $1,000,000,000 a year when he took a leave of absence 2 years ago to become one of the main cogs in Donald Nelson's organization. Charley Wilson felt with some pride that $1,000,000,000 a year was a pretty big business. Today he is running a $70,000,000,000-a-year business, superintending the manufacture of our war equipment.

STILL AN INDUSTRIALIST

Wilson has remained the industrialist during his stay in the Capital. Washington frequently has subtle effects on the business and professional men it draws into the war machine—they become touched with the virus of bureaucracy, the purr of international society, the lure of power, or the intrigue of politics, but the General Electric executive is today no more nor less than what President Roosevelt has called him, one of the ablest production executives in the country.

Not that Charley Wilson lives in an intellectual vacuum, a slave to the assembly line which is in his blood. He has very vigorous ideas of the kind of society we can make after the war is over. He becomes energetic when talking of the possibilities for post-war America. Last December he startled the members of the National Association of Manufacturers, whom he calls, "my own people," by telling them at their convention in New York that they had less to fear from left wing ideologies than from their own reactionary approach to the problems of a dynamic industrial society.

We asked him, when we visited Wilson in his simple office in the W. P. B., whether he still felt as strongly about the hard shell attitudes of his fellow industrialists as he appeared to feel that day in New York. He laughed, and opined that industry is "swinging in the right direction."

The right direction, for Wilson, is a spirit of cooperation, a recognition by all segments of society of a common stake in the future.

SCALE OF LIVING

"We are going to have to provide a scale of living that we're capable of," Wilson says, "and to do that men of good will in every phase of life, industry, labor, agriculture, government, have got to sit down wholeheartedly and work out the future.

"We are on the verge of great things, a better standard of living, and we won't get results by poking at one another. The areas of disagreement are not so wide as to be insoluble."

A framed cartoon on Wilson's office is the tipoff to the man's interest in post-war problems. The cartoon shows a man and wife at a dinner party, with the wife berating the husband as follows: "Really George, I've never been so humiliated. Everybody has a post-war plan but you."

General Electric has been Charley Wilson's whole life; hence it is reasonable to assume that his post-war thinking is tied up with the future of his corporation. There are reports in Washington even now that Wilson will soon surrender to an itch to return to General Electric.

His intimate personal plans are his own secret, however, and right now he is up to his neck in his Government job, wrangling and planning with the brass hats of the Army, the Navy, and the Maritime Commission, reviewing and approving their production schedules, keeping the vast rivers of supplies moving into the factories of the nations, and the instruments of war moving from these factories to the fighting fronts all over the globe. His office day is a constant round of conferences and telephone conversations.

The present stage of war production is a challenge to the industrial genius of Wilson. The "all out" phase of production, in which factories produced all they could of everything, is past. Programs today are highly liquid, and must be kept closely attuned to changing military needs.

Wilson's organization has just been through a process of cutting and changing production schedules to keep the increasing need for landing barges and heavy military equipment balanced with the military requisitions for invasions.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. SCANLON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. SCANLON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say something which very much needs to be said to the membership of this House. Some of the Members seem to think that O. P. A. is like a man with his hand upon a faucet which he can turn on to make this or that price adjustment or rent adjustment, then turn off at will. They think we can give a little more profit to the textile mills, already making almost 900 percent more than they made before the war. They think petroleum prices can be advanced to swell the greatest profits ever earned by the oil industry. They have 100 other schemes for increasing the earnings of this or that industry or for lending aid and comfort to black-market operators—to raise prices the underground way by weakening enforcement. They know that all these proposals will increase the cost of living—each one a little; taken together a great deal. But they think then that the faucet can be turned off again and all will be forgiven and forgotten.

Instead of being like a man with his hand upon a faucet which he can turn on or off at will, O. P. A. is like the little Dutch boy with his finger in the hole in the dike. The danger is not from the trickle that will come through if the finger is removed. The danger is that the trickle will become a stream and the stream a flood inundating the land with inflationary prices and bringing human devastation in its wake.

In the last war we paid a sorry price for inflation. Fixed incomes shrank to 40 cents on the dollar. War costs were increased by 70 percent. And the collapse which followed inflation was tragic beyond belief. Business profits turned to losses. Business failures rose 40 percent above the pre-war period. Unemployment rose five and one-half million, and the pay of those who kept their jobs shrank 25 percent.

Farm prices fell from 35 to 80 percent and the income of farmers shrank from $1,360 a year to only $460. And in the next 5 years over 450,000 farmers lost their farms through mortgage foreclosures.

Those things happened last time. But the forces of inflation then were picayune compared with those now abroad in the land. The total cost of the last war—inflationary cost and all—would pay for only 4½ months of this war. The income of the Nation today is over three times what it was in the fourth year of the last war. Then, moreover, 75 percent of all goods produced stayed home for civilians to buy. This time only a little more than half of all goods produced stay home for civilian purchase. At the end of the last war money in circulation totaled only $5,900,000,000. Now it totals over $20,000,000,000.

Yet, due to O. P. A., the price line has been held for 12 consecutive months without gain against these tremendous inflationary pressures. Living costs are today right where they were in May, 1943.

I, for one, will not, after such outstanding success and in view of the power of inflationary pressures, vote to take any step that will turn the price line upward again. I am against any order to O. P. A. to remove its finger from the dike to let even a trickle through.

No one who wants to squeeze further the 20,000,000 people with fixed incomes will get my vote. No one who wants to add billions to the cost of this war, so as to place a needless burden upon future taxpayers, will get my vote. No one who wants to swell already swollen wartime profits of corporations, to upset the morale of the Nation and our fighting forces, will get my vote. No one who wants to force the workers of the Nation into strikes to keep up with a soaring living cost, and so hamper war production, will get my vote. No one who wants to let price and rents soar now, making a post-war collapse inevitable, will get my vote. No one who wants to hamper O. P. A. enforcement action so as to give aid and comfort to black-market operators will get my vote.

The American people are almost solidly united for price control; as the recent Gallup poll showed. And they are going to be a lot more important when the votes are counted next fall than the swarm of lobbyists who have been infesting the halls of Congress during recent weeks seeking added profits for industries already better off than they ever were before. If I do not miss my guess, any man and any party that votes against price control and for inflation, even for a trickle of inflation, is going to have some explaining to do to the people back home, whose happiness they put in jeopardy. The price line must hold right where it is now.

Veterans' Hospitals in Alaska

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, earlier today I introduced in the House two bills, H. R. 5021 and H. R. 5022 for the establishment of two veterans' hospitals in Alaska, one in south central Alaska and one in southeastern Alaska. Each bill authorizes an appropriation of $1,000,000.

The principle outlined in these bills is completely sound. Alaska veterans eligible for hospital treatment should be cared for in Alaska. The delay incident in travel and communication between Alaska and the States is so great as to deny prompt relief in many cases where it should be given to the sick or injured veterans. These bills were drafted in the office of Mr. W. M. Floyd, national commander of the Regular Veterans' Association. In support of the bills, Mr. Floyd has given me the following statement outlining the need for such legislation:

The Regular Veterans Association is asking that two Veterans' Administration hospitals be established in Alaska without delay. Since World War No. 1 over 9,000 veterans have settled in Alaska and since 1941, 756 have voluntarily enlisted and over 4,000 have been inducted. These thousands of Alaska veterans, many of whom will be maimed or diseased during this global war, will return to their native land, Alaska, following the peace, and many thousand more veterans will elect to make Alaska their home in the future. Some provision must be made to care for the hospitalization of these men who have so honorably served their country during the present war.

Let me call your attention to some facts pertaining to the difficulty of caring for a disabled Alaska veteran in a Veterans Hospital at the present time. It now takes well over 20 days for a disabled veteran in Alaska to be admitted to a hospital if he is lucky. It is necessary for the veteran to appear before a medical doctor in his town in Alaska. The doctor in turn will write to the Veterans Hospital in Seattle, Wash. In the meantime, the veteran waits until this mail has gone through by boat and has been considered by the Veterans' Administration doctor. The Veterans' Administration doctor after considering the application will then see if there is bed space in the Seattle hospital. If they have space, they will write to the doctor in the veteran's town and the letter will return to Alaska by boat. Then the veteran must wait for the boat to take him to the States in order to be admitted to the hospital. If he is still living by this time, it will have taken approximately 20 days to complete this red tape.

Already specialists of the United States Employment Service are recommending Alaska for discharged members of the armed forces who have suffered from malaria and similar tropical diseases as the climate seems to be a cure for this type of disability.

We, of the Regular Veterans' Association, believe that men who have served in the armed forces should have the best of care after this war. It should not be necessary for our Alaska veterans to face all of the red tape now required for hospitalization, and neither the Veterans' Administration nor our Government should expect this. Some part of the funds recently appropriated by Congress to the Veterans' Administration should be made available for two hospitals in Alaska, one in the southeastern part of the Territory, which can be reached by boat in 2 days. Travel by boat is practically the only means of transportation which we have. The other hospital should be located in or around Seward, Alaska, which can be reached by boat in 3 days or by train in 18 hours.

By establishing these hospital facilities, the members of the armed forces will not be a burden on the small hospitals in Alaska which are few and far between. This matter is of the utmost importance to the welfare of the members of the armed forces who have served their country in its time of emergency and who have kept our enemies from invading the shores of both the United States and Canada.

I am a resident of Alaska and I know what I am talking about. Our organization has 1,995 members in Alaska. Many hundreds more belong to the Disabled American Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the American Legion.

I know that following this war the residents of Alaska will welcome any and all members of the armed forces who select our Territory for their permanent home. All we ask is that you give us a square deal and let our veterans remain in Alaska for speedy treatment of their disabilities. We ask you to support this measure at once. These bills are H. R. 5021 and H. R. 5022.

G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, my pledge to G. I. Joe is: History shall not repeat itself.

I am fully cognizant of the failure of the Congress following World War No. 1 to enact the Woodrow Wilson League of Nations Peace Pact, and to enact legislation to protect the war veterans of that historic conflict. The isolationists behind closed doors in Washington failed to capitalize on legislation to honor at least in a small measure the human sacrifice made, and as a result the national expression "They died in vain" was born. Lest we forget, our heroes and starving veterans of World War No. 1—many of them carrying the wounds of Flanders Field, Chateau-Thierry, and Verdun—were run out of the National Capital at the point of bayonets and with tear gas when they came to fight for their rights—simple rights—to work and earn a livelihood in a democracy for which so many of their buddies paid the supreme sacrifice. With that record so clear in my mind, I pledged to my boys fighting everywhere, and to their parents, that history shall not repeat itself.

As one humble Member of the Seventy-seventh and Seventy-eighth wartime Congresses, I am happy to lend my influence and cast my vote in favor of the conference report on the G. I. bill of rights, the provisions of which bill are now substantially the same as when it passed the Senate. It is the greatest and most liberal forward measure enacted for war veterans anywhere in the world.

The major concern and the principal thought in the minds of all our gallant fighting sons in the Air Corps, the Infantry, Navy, Marine Corps is, Will I get my job back? Will the country soon forget me and fail to get me employment? While looking for work, will my Government tide me over so that I will not be required to sell apples or seek relief?

What agency will answer my questions and help me? Can I continue my high-school and college education? Can I repurchase my garage business which I sacrificed to go to war? Can I borrow sufficient money to make home improvements? Can I borrow money to build a home?

I am happy to support the G. I. omnibus bill of rights that fully answers all these questions and protects you, G. I. Joe, completely. The bill, which will soon be signed by President Roosevelt, provides for complete Federal aid in the readjustment to civilian life of returning veterans of World War No. 2. The bill makes provision for expeditious completion of additional hospital facilities for war veterans. It provides for a director of servicemen's education and training under the direction of the Veterans' Administration. Those eligible for education and training shall be entitled to the full benefits of a college education. A veteran, while going to school, shall be entitled to $50 per month for subsistence if single, and $75 per month if married.

Further, the bill provides for definite processes of rehabilitation; we must guarantee to all our gallant soldiers that this Government will do everything possible to restore the sick and wounded to good health. There must be absolute assurance as guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration of a sound convalescent-treatment program.

Social adjustments bristle with difficulties. The handicapped will be trained for occupations so that they will be able to earn a decent livelihood to prevent any panhandling, peanut vending, or apple selling which became such familiar scenes following World War No. 1.

The G. I. bill of rights provides for guaranteed loans up to $2,000 and interest for the first year to be paid by the Veterans' Administration, in order to give the veteran a flying start.

The bill provides for an effective job-counseling and employment-placement service within the United States Employment Service for veterans.

A great feature of the bill which I urged and fought for in the House is the unemployment-compensation provision which allows each veteran $20 a week for each week of unemployment after discharge up to 52 weeks. It will give every veteran who is tired, hardened, and calloused after discharge a chance to get his bearings and recondition himself to civilian life.

These—employment, education, training, hospitalization, loans, job-counseling, unemployment insurance—are substantially the main provisions to reestablish our veterans when they return and provide a solid foundation that will go a long way toward the complete rehabilitation of G. I. Joe. This the Nation owes to him.

No amount of money could ever repay the great sacrifice made by the flower of American youth. We all remember—and will never forget—Pearl Harbor, Bataan, Corregidor, Guadalcanal, Tarawa, Anzio beachhead, D-day. Thousands of our gallant boys died so that we might live. Thus, it is clearly our responsibility to guarantee these returning servicemen the right to live, work, and worship as they believe, in a great country that has clearly proven in wartime that by working together we can outproduce the world. And certainly we have the facilities to continue such production to rehabilitate the world in time of peace.

We must not fail our servicemen. They have not failed us.

Many Millions Prefer Silver as Money Base

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Nevada State Journal, Reno, Nev., of June 8, 1944:

MANY MILLIONS PREFER SILVER AS MONEY BASE—STOCKS DEPLETED AS INDUSTRIAL USE EXPANDS

Figures released by the War Production Board show that domestic industrial consumption of silver in 1943 totaled 118,000,000 ounces. During the same period we imported only 63,000,000 ounces because that was all the silver offered us by foreign countries. Most of it came from South America, the Wallace Miner reports.

Because there is not enough foreign silver at the market price, industry is drawing heavily upon the silver stocks in the United States Treasury and the Treasury supply is being depleted faster than it can be built up. Mexican imports of silver declined from 108,000,000 ounces in 1942 to 45,000,000 ounces in 1943.

The United States controls the price of silver and the future of the metal rests with the United Nations, China, India, Mexico and many of the South American and European countries favor silver as their principal money metal and would no doubt welcome a gold and silver money standard.

In a recent meeting in Mexico City, the Mexican Bankers Association stated that it was the opinion that "silver is still the favored medium of exchange among nearly half of the inhabitants of the globe and the devaluation of silver would bring about a tremendous upset among all these millions of people."

The association requests the American Treasury "not to alter the established price without having previously consulted the central banks of the other American countries."

The Mexican bankers base their valuation price at $35 for gold and $1.29 an ounce for silver.

Those countries which have had the experience of changing governments know the worthlessness of paper money not backed by gold or silver. Silver coins would always buy them bread under any circumstances when paper money would not.

The paper money now being printed and circulated by Germany and Japan will be worthless after they have lost the war, but the silver and gold coins the people have been able to hide from the invaders will buy bread.

The gold and silver standard is, of course, a man-made system for the control of money, but no better system has ever been devised for the purpose. The United Nations can make it a wonderfully popular and successful system.

Facing the Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED ROWE

OF OHIO

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, very recently, through the facilities of the O. W. I., William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, was permitted to broadcast over the short-wave radio a message to the workers of Germany. I want to commend the O. W. I. for this particular effort because it is my profound conviction that a bond of understanding exists between the workers of all the nations of the world, which rises above diplomatic and political efforts toward international understanding.

It is also noteworthy that the real keynote and spirit are emphasized in the statement that "It has never been America's purpose to seek vengeance against Hitler's unwilling slaves, against the common people who were duped by him or forced to do his bidding at the point of the bayonet." This one statement most emphatically pronounces the feeling of understanding among the workingmen of the nations of the world and the spirit of justice upon which the permanent peace that we seek must be founded.

FACING THE FACTS

(With Philip Pearl)

The soil of France again is being soaked with blood. Fate seems to have ordained it as the perennial battleground of freedom. Radiophotos of our dead lying on the beaches of Normandy and of enemy dead strewn along the highways to Cherbourg remind us of the terrible price which human beings have been forced to pay through the ages to be free and to stay free.

Not all the fighting is being done on the battlefields. Despatches from neutral countries report widespread strikes in France against the Nazi overlords and even armed uprisings in several industrial communities. Many of these workers will be slaughtered for their daring resistance against their oppressors.

This kind of fighting may seem futile and hopeless, but in the long run it probably will accomplish more toward the overthrow of Hitler's gang than air raids and frontal attacks by tanks, artillery, and infantry.

Collapse of Hitler's war machine behind the lines—in Germany as well as in France and other occupied countries—will end the war much sooner than an unaided military assault, even with superior forces. This was proved in the last World War, when Germany was forced to surrender because its people suddenly quit supporting the Kaiser's war effort.

GERMANS FED UP WITH HITLER

Our hopes for ending this war much sooner than expected rest upon the belief that the common people of Germany must by now be completely fed up with Hitler's lying promises, with his terroristic methods, and with the sufferings which he has brought upon them.

They must realize, as all the world does, that the cause of the Nazis is now hopeless and that further resistance against the United Nations will only multiply tenfold the torrent of death and destruction pouring down upon them relentlessly, day after day and night after night, from the skies.

Can any human beings endure indefinitely the modern holocaust of air bombings when they no longer can hope for or expect relief?

The workers of Germany, who were never sold on Hitler and have served as his unwilling slaves under threat of execution or imprisonment in concentration camps, must be near the breaking point.

For this reason, A. F. of L. President William Green addressed a message to them via the short-wave radio facilities of O. W. I. a few days after the successful invasion of France by the Allied armies of liberation. He advised the workers of Germany to stop working and stop producing for Hitler and to prepare themselves for the signal to rise up against him when such action can be taken with some assurance of success. That time may not be far off now, but an unplanned and premature uprising would be unfortunate. The signal must be given by General Eisenhower at the proper moment.

THE SWORD OF FEAR

The only hold Hitler still maintains over the workers of Germany is fear. He has made this sword of fear a double-edged weapon. They fear his vengeance and they fear our vengeance.

It is important, therefore, that we blast Hitler's propaganda regarding our motives and purposes with respect to the common people of Germany.

All Americans are in agreement that those responsible for the Nazi atrocities must be punished with utmost severity. Unquestionably, a large proportion of German workers join with us in the hope that this punishment can be meted out at an early date.

But it never has been America's purpose to seek vengeance against Hitler's unwilling slaves, against the common people who were duped by him or forced to do his bidding at the point of the bayonet.

Hitler is trying to make his people believe that the Allied troops intend to put every German to death. Those Americans who prate about a hard peace and who profess to regard every German as a murderer are, therefore, playing right into Hitler's hands.

If we hope to shorten the war by inducing the German people to turn against Hitler, we must make clear to the German people that such efforts on their part will earn mercy and consideration at our hands.

Right now, those inside Germany who know the facts—and the number is growing daily—realize their only hope of survival and salvation lies in a quick victory for the United Nations. If we slam that door in their faces, they can only go on fighting and resisting with a hopeless desperation which will not change the outcome of the war, but will delay it and cost many thousands of lives.

James A. Farley's Visit

OF

HON. MATTHEW J. MERRITT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the Batavia Times, Batavia, N. Y., Thursday, June 1, 1944:

JAMES A. FARLEY'S VISIT

One of the pleasant and profitable gains of the summer are the acquaintances we make. Folks are friendly, more friendly after passing through another winter. Such was the case last Saturday when this outstanding gentleman of national prominence paid a visit to Batavia to honor the editor of this paper on his fiftieth anniversary in connection with the printing industry. The event took place at the Stafford Country Club, which was a beautiful setting for such a party.

Much color was lent to it through the appearance of Mr. Farley, a close friend of long standing of the editor of this paper. All those present knew what a busy man Mr. Farley is, and when he left Batavia, it was his sixth straight night on a Pullman and for him taking the time out to come to this event, was another thing that not alone pleased ourselves but the many people who attended the event. There were many prominent Republicans present and even the Republicans were very democratic and came out to greet us.

Appearances fool you. A fellow like Jim Farley comes along in an informal dress like the rest of the folks and to your surprise, he really is somebody. Often the loudest are the least and the homeliest are the highest. Nature calls for naturalness and the most important are usually the last in posing. That, perhaps, was the opinion of many, but we know that always they have had a real admiration for Jim Farley's name.

One who does the work and shares few honors when the job is done, a plugger, he, and a plodder and a patient performer, so we say that many learned the great admiration for Jim Farley because he is one of those who has always carried the load and brought his party into pleasant places. Faithful is his name and loyal is his nature. It was really typical and pretty to see the friends that Jim Farley made. Perhaps that is his great gift, because all who met him at the Batavia Club prior to this event showed him much respect.

It has been said of Mr. Farley that he never forgets a friend, which was proven on this occasion to come this distance to pay his respects to the editor of the Times. As far as we are personally concerned, we thank him for his presence and we would like to tell our friends that he has an amazing memory—so much sagacity he shows which is almost more than human and we know, to our many friends who had not meet him, it was a pleasure and that he left an impression of a very interesting, natural man—rightly named.

He is admired by all for his uprightness and his honesty. The words of truth he speaks, the fair way he has always dealt with the public in his high political activities, and his honesty of purpose. Few men like him are living today, so that is him, Jim Farley, the man.

Flag Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. CURLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is Flag Day, a day set apart to commemorate the adoption of our National Banner and celebrate its glory and inspiration.

The Stars and Stripes, whose silken folds salute the American skies from a hundred thousand staffs today, is the symbol of the Nation, the insignia of its power and authority, the emblem that brings to our minds a vision of the Republic's greatness and to our hearts a new dedication to its service. At home or abroad the sight of that flag of beauty with its significant stars and stripes is to every American an assurance of peace and protection, of freedom and faith, of safety and security, and as it waves in the free air of heaven it wakes in the breast the loyalty of the citizen and the pride in our country and its glorious mission on earth, and its bravery and beauty are a call to patriotic duty and devotion.

Nevertheless with all its appeal, with all its associations, with all the heroic deeds it recalls and the historic memories it revives, we must not forget that the flag of our country, the Stars and Stripes, is after all only a sign, a symbol, an emblem of something greater, higher, nobler—the United States of America, the greatest Republic on earth, the fairest effort made by men to bring justice, humanity, equality, and freedom to the race, and frame it in a scheme of human government. In honoring the flag, in our insistence that it shall be treated with respect by all our citizens on all occasions because of its symbolism and significance, in demanding that it be treated with a usage commensurate with the pride and power, the dignity and decorum it represents, we must remember that back of the flag is the fatherland, the Nation.

The Stars and Stripes is a symbol of our country and not a synonym for it. The flag and the fatherland march down the years together; and while we honor the flag and hail it with patriotic emotion, our duty and devotion, our sacrifice and service, must be given to the Republic, to the land that has given to the world government of the people, by the people, for the people. This is an age of unrest, an age marked by much shallowness and superficiality; of much talking and little thinking; and here in this magnificent country of ours there is too easy an acceptance of the shadow for the substance, of the promise for the performance and a growing habit of evading the realities and responsibilities of our citizenship and the obligations we owe to good government. It is not sufficient answer to the call to public duty, to the need of maintaining good government, and the correction of the evils that creep into public administration, to hail it and cheer it, and to shelter ourselves in its folds, while evils afflict the government it is the emblem of. Patriotism is a work of conscience and conduct that calls for service and sacrifice that will keep our country free from peril and disaster in peace and war. Flag-flapping, shouting, cheers and unthinking emotions do not constitute patriotism. No land was ever saved by the lungs and tongues of its people; and when people convince themselves that shouting is the whole duty of American citizens the flag ceases to be an emblem of honor, and the country is in danger.

Every rightly constituted American loves and honors the flag of his country; it has been in the forefront of all his country's triumphs; it has emerged from disaster and defeat when they have come, without stain or dishonor; and the suffering and sacrifice of the long years of the Nation's life have endeared it to the American heart. To love and honor the flag is a passion of every American worth his salt; and because of this consuming passion he is open to the arts and crafts of the traitors and rascals in the American community, who degrade and dishonor our beautiful symbol of Americanism by flouting the American flag, behind whose ambush they plot the destruction of American liberty, the perversion of American principle, the nullification of the American Constitution and the end of that peace, justice, and equality that have made our country what it is. This is one of the great evils that grows out of the conduct that makes the worship of the flag the supreme duty of an American, instead of making the respect and honor we give the Stars and Stripes subordinate to the preservation of our Government and its principles, which is the first duty of the real patriot.

War, as a rule, comes unexpectedly, like a flash of lightning from the skies; and while untoward events have led up to war, the declaration itself has come suddenly and has usually found us unprepared; and that false economy which puts off the day of preparation and that delusive folly that seeks to convince us that war will never come again have combined in all our history to increase the horrors of war and multiply the waste of human life and treasure when the battle is on.

War is the horror of national life, peace is the normal condition of the country's days, and because we have found no way yet to avoid war, the common sense of America demands that we put the sentimentalism and theory of visionaries and dreamers behind us and by serious and practical measures prepare ourselves for the inevitable. America loves peace—conscious of its strength, power, and resources of men and money, it seeks quarrel with no nation—and for the honor of the land and flag it meets the weak with justice and consideration and the powerful with confidence and dignity; but it has learned that the country that is rich and peaceful and unprepared is never safe from the encroachments of the powers that are predatory and prepared and seeking imperial domination.

Brief as the years of war have been in the life of the Nation they have placed a heavy burden on the years of peace. The waste of war has arrested the onward march of the Nation, it has crippled industry, handicapped commerce, multiplied misery, and made life harder for every man and woman in the Republic, and the practical and sensible thing to do is to so prepare ourselves in peace that the powers that prey will hesitate long before they strike.

Flag waving is folly when it becomes a substitute for practical patriotism, it is treason when it is made an excuse to cover up weakness and unpreparedness.

We must never permit the flag of our country to be made the rallying place of sham patriotism or the emblem of treason and betrayal. Under that beautiful flag the brave and true have served and sacrificed, fought and died; it has ever been as a pillar of smoke by day and of flame by night to the armies of freedom. It was consecrated by the labor and wisdom of Washington and his heroic soldiers; it was held aloft by Lincoln and the armies of liberation in the battles that freed the slave and preserved the Union; it fluttered in the flame and smoke of the titanic First World War and was borne in triumph from Chateau Thierry to the Argonne; and it has become to all the world and its people, par excellence, the symbol of free government and free people.

Honor and salute the flag of America; keep it sweet and clean from the soil and stain of the secret plotter, the slinking conspirator, and the nocturnal traitor. Hold it aloft in the light of the sun and proclaim it the oriflamme of liberty, equality, and good government; and add to its honor and acclaim by adding to the honor, greatness, and fame of the Republic whose emblem it is.

Honor the American flag and bring it the unbought honor of the world by making the honor of the American Republic secure and stainless by our service and devotion. As long as that splendid flag waves over a country conceived in liberty and dedicated to government of the people, for the people, by the people, administered in the spirit of the fathers and sustained in the loyalty and honor of its citizens, the Stars and Stripes will salute the heavens in honor, secure in the faith of its people.

The American flag is one to follow, to fight for, to fall for, if need be, for it symbolizes in its folds and its history a record of work well done for the liberation of a world from age-old wrong, the rescue of a race from the oppressions of kings and conquerors, the severing of a people from the corrosions of feudal systems and the degradation of hereditary rule. With its unfolding to the free skies of America that glorious flag told to the earth that a new dispensation had come to men, which was the flower and fruit of the seed sowed on the Mount of Calvary, when He died who came to liberate the souls of men.

Salute the flag of America, the symbol of liberty. Hail it and honor it, and so live in loyalty and serve in allegiance that none can stain or dishonor it.

Hog Price Ceilings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions:

PRICE DISCRIMINATION AGAINST NORTHEASTERN INDIANA HOGS

Whereas W. F. A. hog price ceilings for the northeastern Indiana area are 10 cents per hundredweight lower than are the ceilings for the central Indiana area; and

Whereas the hogs from the two areas are consigned largely to the same eastern packers; and

Whereas the hogs from the two areas are believed to be of the same grade and quality; and

Whereas the freight rates from the two areas to slaughterers are practically identical; and

Whereas W. F. A. ceilings are said to have been determined on the market histories of the respective areas, indicating a long-time discrimination against the northeastern Indiana area: Be it hereby

Resolved, That we, the undersigned members of the United States Department of Agriculture War Board, for Allen County, Ind., petition the Federal Office of Price Administration, the War Food Administration, and the Director of the Purdue University Agricultural Experiment Station to (1) establish the cause or causes for discrimination in price against hogs marketed from the northeastern Indiana area, and (2) that State and Federal agencies with authority take the necessary action to correct and eliminate said discrimination in price ceilings and market practices; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be submitted to all Federal and State agencies concerned, to other county U. S. D. A. war boards of the area and to the press.

HENRY J. KOLMERTEN,
Chairman, County Agricultural Adjustment Association.
A. LEIGH BOWEN,
Field Supervisor, Farm Security Administration.
ROY W. LINT,
Field Agent, Albion Production Credit Association.
C. V. KIMMELL,
County Agent, Cooperative Agricultural Extension Service.

Unanimously adopted, June 5, 1944, Fort Wayne, Ind.

EVASION OF HOG MARKETING REGULATIONS

Whereas we, the undersigned, local representatives of the United States Department of Agriculture and others, acting under instructions from our superior officers, in 1943 urged farmers to maintain a high rate of pork production as a patriotic duty, assured that they would at least receive the Federal W. F. A. floor price for their hogs; and

Whereas farmers did respond by producing for the 1943–44 market one of the county's largest hog crops; and

Whereas farmers in marketing their crop have been forced to accept prices much below the floor price established for the area and promised them by the Government; and

Whereas farmers have been obliged to submit to unusual, unorthodox and unethical practices on the part of buyers in their (buyers) effort to bypass the intent of the floor regulations; and

Whereas pork products are retailed to consumers on the basis of O. P. A. ceiling prices independent of prices paid to the farmer; and

Whereas packers are subsidized $1.30 per cwt. on all pork products slaughtered (regardless of weights) to enable them to pay floor prices or better for live hogs; be it hereby

Resolved, That we, the undersigned members of the United States Department of Agriculture War Bonds for Allen County, Ind., petition the respective Federal authorities in charge—

1. To keep faith with hog producers by making the support prices apply to all weights of hogs, thereby eliminating "floor dodging."

2. To provide that packers who resort to unusual practices not common prior to floor regulations, thereby securing unusual shrink in weight or otherwise evading the intent of the floor's objective, be made to disqualify themselves for subsidy payments in so doing.

3. To investigate the hog marketing system in this area; to withhold subsidies past due from all packers who have in any way evaded, or colluded with others to evade the intent and purpose of the floor; and to make the withholding retroactive on all such evasion purchases; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the War Food Administration, the Office of Price Administration, the United States Senator and Representative in Congress for this county, the National and State U. S. D. A. War Boards, the U. S. D. A. War Boards of other counties in this marketing area and to the press.

Chairman, County Agricultural Adjustment Association.
A. LEIGH BOWEN,
Field Supervisor, Farm Security Administration.
ROY W. LINT,
Field Agent, Albion Production Credit Association.

H. R. 4883

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted at the thirty-ninth annual conference of the Municipal Finance Officers Association of the United States and Canada held recently at Cleveland, Ohio. I am inserting this in the RECORD since the subject matter of the resolution is included in the bill (H. R. 4883) which I introduced on May 25, 1944, and which has for its purpose extending retirement pension and annuity payments up to $1,440 a year:

Whereas there are in operation in the United States many State and municipal retirement and benefit systems for public employees maintained in whole or in part by taxes levied against local taxpayers; and

Whereas the Federal income tax now cuts deeply into the income which these beneficiaries receive, which, in most cases, is their sole and only means of support, and which income they cannot generally supplement to offset the rising cost of living because of their advanced age or disablement; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States has deemed it wise and just to exempt from taxation the pensions received under the Social Security Act, Railroad Retirement Act, World War Veterans' Act, and similar benevolent legislation, and many States have exempted allowances or pensions paid by the United States from the application of their State income-tax laws: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the committee on public employee retirement administration of the Municipal Finance Officers Association of the United States and Canada, in regular meeting assembled at its annual conference now being held in Cleveland, Ohio, this 8th day of June 1944, respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to amend the Federal income-tax law so that it will provide that there shall be excluded from gross income, for the purpose of income-tax computation, all annuity, pension, or retirement income up to $1,440 in any year which any participant or his beneficiary shall receive through a legally created and established retirement, pension, or annuity system, or by any combination thereof, by reason of service rendered to any State or municipality or political subdivision thereof; and be it further

Resolved, That the executive director of this association be, and he is hereby directed, to forward a copy of this resolution to the chairman and each member of the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate, and to the chairman and each member of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the end that they may initiate or support proper legislation to carry into effect the purposes and intent of this resolution.

Baer Field

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, when I was recently privileged to make a visit to Baer Field, the air base in Fort Wayne, Ind., I was guided over ground that had been familiar to me for many years. During the period of my early familiarity with the area, however, it had presented quite a different picture. There today an air base is humming with activity where before—not many years ago—were farms and fields. There today are smooth, paved runways over which mighty planes skim speedily along where before were lanes and paths which knew only the trot of horses' hooves and the trundle of wagon wheels. There today are huge hangars and busy administration buildings where once were friendly houses and big red barns. The passage of time and our amazing scientific achievements have wrought a tremendous transformation on this land I knew so well, and as I was introduced to the efficient and varied activities now carried on at this vitally important base, I found it hard to believe that not so long ago I had driven in horse and buggy over this ground on many occasions to make professional calls on the farms that once flourished on these acres. And not so long ago I had played and hunted through the woods where now are busy offices and barracks. Little did I then dream that in a few short years mighty birds of war would be thundering over this once quiet, rustic ground.

It was in August 1940, that citizens of Fort Wayne began working on a project to bring an air base to the city. In November 1940, Mayor Harry W. Baals was notified by Army Air Corps, Washington, that construction would begin in the spring of 1941. A site southwest of Fort Wayne was purchased by the city, and Baer Field came into being.

Named for a World War No. 1 hero, Baer Field has from its inception played a most important role in World War No. 2. Originally designed as a pursuitship base, the field was assigned to the First Air Forces in March 1941. The first plane landed at the field in August 1941—by accident. A member of the Thirty-first Pursuit Group on a cross-country flight got lost and landed on the field while it was still under construction.

The field's first commanding officer was Col. E. A. Lohman. Selfridge Field, Mich., Langley Field, Va., and Camp Lee, Va., supplied the original complement of men stationed at the base. In September 1941, Colonel Lohman was assigned to Langley Field, Va., as commanding officer. He was followed as base commander by Maj. James Ferry and Lt. Col. Peter B. Skanse.

The first group of pursuit ships, P–39's, arrived at Baer Field a few days before Pearl Harbor and left a few days after December 7 to make an outstanding name for themselves both in the Mediterranean and South Pacific areas. Base commanding officer at this time was Lt. Col. Ulysses G. Jones.

After the departure of the Thirty-first Pursuit Group, two more pursuit groups were based at the field. On January 1, 1942, Col. Douglas B. Netherwood was named commanding officer.

In September 1942, Baer Field became part of the Third Air Force as a base for the famed B–26 bombers. During this period the mission of the base was an extremely important one, since it was at this field that the final processing of the bombers for overseas duty took place. The field was only a few hours from the actual front in terms of air travel as the ships made only one stop from the field before they were actually involved in combat. An incredible record of action against the enemy was marked up by the planes which left the field, among which were such famous ships as the Coughin' Coffin.

The field remained a B–26 base until March 1943, when the I Troop Carrier Command took over the post, although B–26's were processed until April 1943, when the first C–47's arrived.

Organized in less than 2 years to transport parachute, glider, and other air-landing troops as well as equipment, and to evacuate the wounded, planes and pilots of the T. C. C. have participated in combat operations in every major war theater.

From the inception of the I Troop Carrier Command, Baer Field has played an extremely significant role in the processing, equipping, and maintaining of T. C. C. ships.

The present base commander, Col. Robert L. Copsey, came to the field in October 1942, from the Springfield depot, Springfield, Ill. Colonel Copsey's background in aviation goes back to 1917, when he became a flying officer at Kelly Field, Tex. He is a native of Wyoming, and his Army career includes 11 years in the National Guard. Associated with aviation since 1917, he is a member of two noted flying clubs, the Master Pilots and the Early Birds, which is a group of aviators who flew before the entry of the United States into World War No. 1.

The base organization under Colonel Copsey performed its all-important role of maintaining the base and its services and equipment with a high degree of success. As the coordinating agency between the Troop Carrier Command and the Air Service Command, the unit performed a most important mission in the carrying out of the work performed by the subdepot for the T. C. C.

The first reception and final phase unit was set up as a separate unit at Baer Field in April 1943 under Maj. Richard E. Pfennig, acting commanding officer. The original purposes of the reception center were the reception and classification of all personnel initially assigned to the T. C. C.; inspection and completion of all personnel records; basic training and reassignment of personnel to other T. C. C. bases and units. The final phase unit had the mission of fully equipping tactical units, combat crews, and planes; the inspection of combat crew members for proficiency; inspection and completion of personnel records; inspection of planes for modification for designated theaters; first and second echelon of maintenance; and familiarization of combat crew members with overseas flight routes and communication procedures.

In October 1943 the reception center was closed, and Col. Samuel J. Davis became commanding officer of the Final Phase Unit. The end of March 1944 saw the Final Phase Unit merged with the base organization under Colonel Copsey to become what is now the Eight Hundred and Sixth Army Air Forces Unit.

The fifth subdepot, which had been under the Air Service Command until January 1, 1944, when it became part of the Troop Carrier Command, has played a major role in the sending out of the planes and equipment playing a vital role in the present-day conduct of the war. The depot, composed in the main of civilian employees, processed and equipped through its engineering, supply, and signal sections planes which have gone to all parts of the globe to perform their missions.

Today, after almost a year of service to the Troop Carrier Command the Eight Hundred and Sixth Army Air Force Unit of Baer Field represents a highly efficient, closely coordinated working organization. Combining all the work formerly performed by the subdepot, the final phase unit, and the base organization, it represents in terms of the functions performed an all-important part of the Troop Carrier Command. Recently commended by Brig. Gen. Frederick W. Evans, commanding general of the First Troop Carrier Command, for its splendid accomplishment in meeting a processing directive, the personnel of Baer Field is today ready to carry out its future tasks, confident that these tasks will be performed with the same high degree of success that has marked its work in the past.

The original land area of the base was 741.95 acres and has been increased 284.39 acres to make a total of 1,026.34 acres. The total construction cost to date is approximately $10,000,000.

There are six hangars at the field, one 150 by 400 feet, three 120 by 75 feet, and two 130 by 320 feet. Since the original design of the field was for a fighter plane base, it became necessary to increase the thickness of the runways when the bombers and C–47's arrived. At present the runways are heavy enough to hold every type of aircraft in existence.

The entire area now occupied by barracks, offices, and so forth, was originally completely wooded and had to be cleared before construction could be started. At the present time there are 255 buildings on the post although the post has never been completed and construction still continues.

The field is like a small city. It maintains its own water plant, which is fully automatic and produces 100 gallons per capita per day and can accommodate 10,000 persons. It has its own fire department, which has grown from one truck to a size comparable to that of a city with 10,000 population and includes a crash truck on duty 24 hours a day. The field has its own theaters, stores, heating facilities, police department, and so forth. The only facilities derived from Fort Wayne are electrical, telephone, and laundry facilities.

Baer Feld is a typical example of an Army air base. Its men come from all over the United States and represent every type of military skill and occupation necessary to the maintenance of such a base. In May 1943 the first contingent of WAC's arrived, and today are represented in almost every section of the field. They work side by side with men in communications, driving, hospital work, and as office and administrative technicians, supply workers, entertainment directors, mechanics, radio operators, and so forth.

The Five Hundred and Seventy-first Army Air Force Band at Baer Field is one of the best-known military organizations of its kind in the entire Midwest area. Its weekly dance orchestra broadcast "Baer Field calling," as well as its military band broadcasts, are heard by thousands from one of Indiana's largest radio stations. The military band plays for all reviews, formal retreats, and other military occasions. The dance orchestra plays for numerous occasions, including a weekly dance at the Fort Wayne Servicemen's Club.

The civilian personnel of Baer Field has from the opening of the field played a major role in the success of the carrying out of the mission of the post. Working in skilled technical capacities in the subdepot organization, as well as in many and varied administrative capacities, the civilian population of the field has contributed much to the field. Not the least of its jobs is the maintaining of the upkeep and facilities of the field under the direction of the post engineers.

The military personnel at Baer Field have expressed themselves as being extremely fortunate in receiving the finest type of hospitality from the citizens of Fort Wayne. At the Service Men's Center, 600,000 soldiers have found a home away from home. The Service Men's Center sponsors all types of entertainment, including 2 weekly radio shows—the Farnsworth Firing Line broadcast and the Baer Field dance orchestra. These are open at all times to the men and women of the field. The U. S. O. maintains a center in downtown Fort Wayne as well as a lounge in the Pennsylvania railroad station. Free movie tickets are available to military personnel, and the entire city has joined in offering hospitable entertainment to Baer Field.

The record established by Baer Field since its opening is an imposing one. Approximately 300 B–26 bombers were processed at the field and left there to deal death and destruction upon the Axis. Approximately 2,500 cargo-type planes have left the field since the Troop Carrier Command took over the post. Countless thousands of parts have been manufactured and repaired at the field since its establishment.

The Fourth Congressional District of Indiana can indeed be proud of the part played by Baer Field in today's conflict. Its contribution is immeasurable.

I Am Old Glory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, at the request of one of the elderly citizens of Los Angeles, I wish to insert in the RECORD a poem which he has written entitled:

I AM OLD GLORY

(By Frank B. Hewitt, 72 years of age)

For more than eight score years, I have been the banner of hope and freedom for generation after generation of America.
I represent the ideals, aspirations, and history of our people,
I engender a feeling of patriotism and respect.
I was born amid the first flames of America's fight for freedom
I am the symbol of a country that has grown from a little nation of a group of 13 colonies to a united nation of 48 sovereign States.
I am the symbol of every right enjoyed by the American people; having been planted firmly on the high pinnacle of American faith, my gently fluttering folds have proved an inspiration to untold millions.
My beauty of truth flies over the capitols of all our States—over our county courthouses and our public schools signifying education and the administration of justice.
I fly perpetually over our National Capitol as a sign of national perpetuity.
Men have led me into battles with unwavering courage, peoples have looked up to me as a symbol of national unity, in this citizens might continue to enjoy the life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness, which have been granted to every American as the heritage of free men.
I represent the law of the land. I reflect the wealth and grandeur and patriotism of this great land of opportunity.
I believe in tolerance. I stand out as a badge of the Nation's greatness and the emblem of destiny.
At a time like this when European monarchies, kingdoms, and republics are in constant change and crumbling, I as your great flag—the American Flag—have a greater dignity, a greater significance, a greater purpose than ever before.
So long as men love liberty more than life itself, so long as they treasure the priceless privileges brought about by the sacrifice of human blood of our forefathers, so long as the principles of truth, justice, and charity for all remain deeply rooted in human hearts, I shall continue to be the enduring banner of the United States of America.

Freedom's Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Postmasters Gazette, Mount Morris, Ill., of June 1944:

FREEDOM'S FLAG

I am the American flag. For more than a century and a half I have been the light of the world, the hope of every man and woman who loathes tyranny and loves liberty, who has a horror of slavery and to whom freedom is dearer than life itself. Born in the flames of the American Revolution when the brave men and noble women of the Thirteen straggling Colonies, on the Atlantic seaboard wrested democracy from the mailed fist of oppression, I have been the hope of the world and the symbol of the American Republic.

Planted firmly on the mountaintops of the immortal faith that all men are created equal with the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, I float o'er land and sea, the emblem of the American Republic, in defiance to oppression and the guarantee to the nations that created me that liberty shall not perish from the earth, and that as long as the sons and daughters of the Republic treasure the priceless heritage purchased by the blood, agony, and tears of the people seeking liberty, I remain the standard of truth, charity, and justice of the mightiest Nation on which the sun has ever shone.

I am not a painted rag, I am America and all that America means. In my silken folds and stripes of white and red runs the blood of brave men living and dead. My stars shine brighter than the morning stars of high heaven, before they start to dim in the rising sun. First fashioned in the dark days of the American Revolution by the skillful hands of Betsy Ross and officially recognized by the resolution of the Continental Congress on June 14, 1777, my natal day has been celebrated each succeeding 14th of June.

Woe to the man or men, nation or group of nations, that seek to tear one thread from my stripes or dim one star in my field. I have been unfurled to the breeze of the war score of times and never furled in defeat and please God never shall be. Wherever I go, the knees of tyranny shall quake, the thrones of the oppressor shall crumble. I am the insignia of the last best hope of the earth. I am the Star Spangled Banner, Old Glory.

Letter From Secretary Hull to Speaker Rayburn Relative to Congressmen Jarman and Chiperfield's Mission to South America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission granted, I take pleasure in inserting in the RECORD a letter from Secretary of State Hull to your distinguished self which is complimentary of my friends, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JARMAN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD], two of my colleagues on the Foreign Affairs Committee:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 16, 1944.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I am certain that you and your colleagues in the House of Representatives will be interested in knowing of the reports which I have received from our Embassies in certain of the other American Republics concerning the excellent impression which Congressmen PETE JARMAN and ROBERT BRUCE CHIPERFIELD made in Chile and en route there as the official representatives of the House of Representatives of the United States of America at the ceremonies arranged by the Chilean Chamber of Deputies for the celebration of the "Day of the Americas" on April 14.

Ambassador Bowers in Chile reports that Congressmen JARMAN and CHIPERFIELD made a very favorable impression at Santiago by their cordiality and their natural liking for people. He says that they were overwhelmed with invitations and that their visit did a great deal of good. The Ambassador feels that Messrs. JARMAN and CHIPERFIELD rendered a real service to their country, and that it was most advantageous to the United States to be so well represented at the celebrations.

Ambassador White in Lima reports that the two Congressmen, who stopped in that capital on April 12 on their way to Chile, made an excellent impression upon the Peruvians.

Chargé d'Affaires Muccio at Panama was equally enthusiastic in regard to the two visitors.

The above remarks indicate only too clearly how successfully Messrs. JARMAN and CHIPERFIELD have carried out their mission and leave little for me to add except an expression of my own appreciation, not only for the real contribution they have made toward improving our relations with the other American Republics but also my gratitude for the very cooperative and understanding assistance which you, Mr. Speaker, have rendered in selecting two Members of the House so well qualified to represent you at this inter-American celebration.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Legislation by Decree

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an editorial appearing in the May 19 issue of the London News Chronicle. This editorial, Legislation by Decree, was sent to me by Capt. William McCulloch, former Speaker of the Ohio House of Representatives, now a member of the armed forces. Mr. Speaker, you will note this editorial deals with a subject, Legislation by Decree, that we in the United States are familiar with, and I am sure will prove interesting:

The House of Commons has this week been considering one of the most difficult of the many problems which the circumstances of the war have thrown into relief.

This is the problem of delegated legislation. The war has made necessary an enormous increase in the degree of interference which the Government exercises over people's lives. There is hardly any type of organized activity which is not now subject to control. Hence, to enable the executive to function, ministers have taken power, on an unprecedented scale, to promulgate what are in effect new laws in the form of statutory rules and orders.

This development—which is only novel in that its scale has been intensified—has confronted Parliament with a very awkward dilemma. The House of Commons already has the power to criticize, and even to annul, regulations to which strong exception is taken.

But that device is a clumsy one. Administrative decrees, far-reaching in their scope, may be overlooked altogether. Thus Parliament must either accept the fact that a good deal of legislation is carried through by ministers on their own responsibility, or must risk impeding the Government by continual interference.

This problem will continue after the war. It is hard to imagine any plan of social reconstruction being carried through expeditiously which does not involve the delegation to ministers of very considerable powers.

It is all to the good that this vexed question has now been tackled by the House itself. As a result of this week's debate, the Government is to move the setting up of a permanent committee of the House which will review proposed administrative decrees and will recommend their amendment should they be vague, ill-defined, or unnecessarily comprehensive.

This committee will not, of course, be concerned with the principles underlying the proposed regulations. That is a matter for Parliament itself. The committee's job will be to see that the regulations conform to the powers granted by Parliament.

If this device works well—and there is no reason why it should not—it will be a constitutional development of some importance.

Let's Keep the Record Straight

OF

HON. FRED A. HARTLEY, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of talk about "weakening" amendments and "inflationary" amendments to the Emergency Price Control Act.

Some have gone so far as to say that if Congress insists on "emasculating" O. P. A. the Chief Executive will find it necessary not only to veto the amended act but to appeal to the public in an effort to obtain public support of his veto.

It is high time that the American public were given the facts.

Congress wants prices controlled and will insist upon an administration of price control that will insure the American consumer the lowest possible prices.

The so-called Hartley amendment prohibiting O. P. A. from use of the highest price line limitation provision is not inflationary in any sense of the word.

It will not weaken price control. Rather, it will permit the consumer to buy at lower prices.

This amendment leaves O. P. A. completely free to establish ceiling prices in any manner they desire. They may continue to use the present formula for establishing selling prices. Or, if they desire, they may establish dollars-and-cents ceilings or frozen mark-up percentages.

This amendment does not in any way restrict O. P. A. in establishing ceiling prices. They may use any formula they desire, so long as it is generally fair and equitable.

The highest price line limitation does not now and never did have any bearing on the establishment of selling prices for women's and children's outerwear. All these goods have been priced by use of a pricing chart which is prepared by each retailer in accordance with O. P. A. pricing instructions. O. P. A. is free to require that each merchant continue to use such a chart. Price control is not interfered with in the slightest degree.

The amendment does, however, require that the O. P. A. permit free competition at or below the ceiling price they have established.

It permits the small stores and the low-priced stores to compete on all goods that are currently available and because such stores customarily operate on low margins, the American housewife will soon again find them able to supply her needs at lower prices than she is now forced to pay speculators, profiteers, or high-priced stores for identical goods.

Congress never intended that O. P. A. have the right to eliminate competition or to tell legitimate businessmen what they could or could not sell. Is it not ridiculous for O. P. A. to stop a dress store from selling dresses and permit a men's shop to sell the identical dress at higher prices—or a furniture store, or a garage?

Is this price control?

This amendment will give the small stores and the low-prices stores the right to sell women's and children's outerwear—dresses, coats, suits, skirts, jackets, slacks, and coveralls at prices lower than O. P. A. now permits the identical garments to be sold for by high-priced establishments and profiteers.

The amendment will bring prices down and lower the cost of living by permitting the low-priced stores to sell for less.

By eliminating or restricting the small stores and the low-priced stores, O. P. A.'s regulations have forced women's and children's wear prices to advance four times as fast as other goods. They have forced quality to deteriorate to a point that it is considered a national scandal. They have forced low-priced merchandise off the market.

The consumer has been forced to patronize high-priced establishments, pay through the nose, or do without.

Again the amendment does not interfere in the slightest degree with O. P. A.'s complete authority to fix and regulate prices.

The inexpensive small stores, and the low-priced larger stores, can make a sizeable contribution toward lowering the cost of living, and this amendment will afford them an opportunity to do so.

It will not permit any merchant to increase the selling price of any article.

It will give the consumer the opportunity to buy for less.

With Victory There Will Be Freedom for Everyone and Glory Enough for All

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD D. COOLEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address which I delivered at the national memorial services of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States in the magnificent Temple Emanu-El in New York on Sunday afternoon, May 21, 1944.

Following a beautiful and colorful parade down Fifth Avenue, 7,500 persons assembled in the temple for the purpose of honoring the memory of those of Jewish faith who have made their contributions to the cause of freedom, and I had the honor of delivering the following address:

We meet in this serene and sacred shrine for an exalted and patriotic purpose. We are at this hour motivated by the highest and the holiest impulses that have ever animated the human heart. We gather in a memorial which renders homage to the distinguished dead, who not only stood in the "rockets' red glare" but who laid down their lives on the altars of freedom.

We come not to glorify bloodshed but rather to commemorate the memory of those who have made their grand contribution to the cause of freedom. We come not to beautify the character nor to exalt the life, but rather to commune with the spirit, of those of Jewish faith who have made their lives sublime. We come today to touch again their lives and to feel again the dynamic power of their magnificent presence.

By feeling again the majestic spirit of those of Jewish faith who have suffered and died, in those heroic times when to love the institutions of freedom meant to lay down one's life in the cause of freedom, all Americans may reinvigorate their just devotion to the great principles which they by their lives and labor so well exemplified.

As we recall the glorious aspirations which thrilled the souls of the men who engaged in the terrific combats from the burning fires of which freedom was born and upon the ashes of which a republic was built, we must be ever mindful of the grand contribution which was made by those of Jewish faith to the success of that fight for freedom.

I cannot recapitulate all of the countless contributions which have been made to freedom's cause by those of Jewish faith. They have lived and labored and fought and bled and died on every field of glory, from the dim dawn of civilization to the present hour, and today they are writing their achievements in their own blood, on all of the battle fronts of the universe; they are fighting courageously and they are dying magnificently in the ancient cause to which they have always been devoted; the cause of individual liberty. Their patriotism needs no praise and offers no apology. In peace as well as in the pageantry of war their achievements speak more eloquently than all of the beautiful words which may be spoken in their behalf.

I speak to you not as men and women of Jewish faith, but rather as Americans who love the traditions and institutions of your great Republic. The world may be a temple of tumult and a tower of discord, but America must not be divided. There are those who would divide us according to race and color and creed. Yes, there are those who enjoy the hospitality of this great home of liberty-loving people who would pull down the temple and crush and destroy the institutions which we have here established. We are heirs of the same inheritance and children of the self-same God. We are born in the image of our Maker and in our breasts is a spark of that celestial flame which surrounds His throne. Our immortal souls cry out against evil forces which seek division, disunity, and destruction, but in unity we shall continue to carry the banners of freedom and will "proclaim liberty to all the land and to all of the inhabitants thereof." That is the inscription which is emblazoned on the Liberty Bell; that is the language of the Old Testament and language which was spoken by a man of Jewish faith.

Our teeming and towering cities may at this hour be silhouetted against clouds of conflict, yet they shall continue to stand as monuments in the march of mankind, and the green fields and golden plains of America shall still commune with Nature's God, as our people, with undaunted courage, go forth to defend the ideals and the institutions for which true Americans have always been willing to make the supreme sacrifice.

This thing that we call Americanism is an attribute of the spirit and a quality of the soul. It is an impulse of holiness which inspires a supreme devotion to the grand ideals and the great principles upon which our Republic was founded. It embraces all of the immortal instincts and nobility of purposes which are embodied in the high and holy ethics of civilization. It loves justice and equality. It adores tolerance in the truest sense of that word—yet it means fortitude and courage which cannot be surpassed.

In all of the languages of earth you will not find a word that is more all-embracing nor more comprehensive than the word "Americanism." In it there is love of honor and of heroes, and of home; the love of mother; the love of God and love of country; the love of martyrs who have given their blood on a thousand blood-drenched battlefields, and on a hundred crimson seas, that men might worship at the altars of freedom. In it is love of the pioneers who carved this Nation from the heart of a wilderness and established here a home, an asylum, for the persecuted and oppressed of every land beneath the bending sky, and gave to men and women the right to cherish the sanctuaries of worship and the altars of their God. It is something intangible, yet dynamic and full of force. It despises oppression and hates all battles of conquest.

Though we have lived by such a standard, yet our civilization has come again to the crossroads; one road leads to death and devastation, to oppression and despotism, and the other road leads across the fields of carnage to the citadels of freedom. Though we have lived by such a standard, yet we are today living in a sad and sorry world, a world that is torn and twisted by the agonies of an awful war. Men have been forced to abandon the gentle arts of peace and have turned again to the cruel arts of war.

Today Americans are fighting for a new world—the world of tomorrow—a world born of death and bloodshed, but which will be dedicated to the ethics of a new civilization. The world of tomorrow will be a world of peace but it will be a peace which has been purchased by the precious blood of patriots. Only by thinking of that world of tomorrow and of the future in which we must live shall we be able to influence the destinies of our great Republic and the lives of the people who dwell therein.

I know that I need not tell you of the intriguing schemes and imperialistic ambitions which have caused men and women in other parts of the world to renounce their belief in the soundness of democratic government, and to lose their faith in the ability of people by their own judgment to govern themselves.

I need not tell you that the homes of men are haunted by fear and the lives of men are beshadowed by sorrow, as ruthless, evil, and imperialistic power runs roughshod over the sacred rights and liberties of men and women who once enjoyed the blessings of free government.

This Nation was dedicated to the cause of peace and to the gentle arts which minister to the welfare and progress of mankind. We would heal the heartaches of humanity and we would ease the pains of the troubled hearts of the universe, and with godly faith we would find the perfect light which would lead all mankind to the sacrament of divine love, to the hilltops of human happiness and to universal peace. But evil forces beyond our immediate control have compelled us to engage in a conflict, the consequences of which we cannot yet determine.

Though we still pray for peace, we are engaged at this moment in war—war with all of its agonies—its broken hearts and blighted lives, its toils and its tears, its woes and its wants, its deaths and devastation, its ghastly ghosts, and all that rides in the bloody wake of modern warfare.

Though we love peace, we are building all of the instrumentalities and machines of death which have been devised by the genius and ingenuity of man throughout the ages. The sons of America are bleeding and dying on the bosom of the seven seas and on all of the battle fronts of the world. We are spending countless billions in a fight for the preservation and perpetuity of the priceless heritage of freedom which was purchased by the blood of the patriots whose memory we honor at this hour. They neither asked nor counted the cost, but were inspired by a superiority of purpose and by a supreme devotion to the ideals for which they fought and died. With their blood they purchased these institutions of freedom, and with our blood we shall preserve them. We shall not cringe in fear before the tyranny of merciless power. We shall not be terrified nor intimidated. The spirit of America can never be conquered; yea, though we must walk through the violent vortex of death, the spirit of America shall triumph.

Not the wealth nor the rich resources of our Nation; not the might nor the power of our military forces, but the moral fiber and fabric of our people is our grandest garrison, a garrison which will never fall, neither under the first nor the last assault. America bows only in humble submission before the infinite wisdom of an omnipotent God, from whose Divine Hand we have received a grant of power, infinite in its scope and magnitude and unequaled by that of any nation on earth and in wielding that power we shall not be actuated by the glamour of conflict nor the glory of conquest.

Thank God our Nation can rise above the spirit of vindictiveness and above the promptings of angry passions, sinister impulses, and selfish motives. In the true spirit of America and in the splendor of moral greatness and strength and power we shall meet our enemies on all of the battlefronts of this troubled and distracted world. We shall devote the genius of our generation to the consummation of the grand task to which we have dedicated the rich resources of our Nation, and God Almighty shall direct our course as we go forth to battle for the preservation of the integrity of our territory and this great Republic, the sanctuary of freedom.

Unless the men and women of America are inspired by patriotic zeal and do, not just their bit but, their dead level best in the winning of this war, they will fail their Nation and their heroes in this hour of greatest peril.

Civilization's greatest curse of the centuries has been the persecutions of those of Jewish faith. The demons of hell must have shuddered at the diabolical atrocities which have been committed in the name of the superior race and according to the wish of that mad-dog who cursed the earth with this war. No greater crimes have ever been committed.

Our beloved country will never be truly worthy nor really great until love and brotherhood are engraved upon the many forms of its great heart. In the silence of the tomb death knows no distinction; in common graves the Catholic, the Protestant and the Jew, sleep the sleep that knows no awakening. Each night there sails on the bosom of a lonely sea a Rabbi, a Priest and a Protestant, and out yonder on the ramparts of freedom men of every faith are dying in a common cause and for the Stars and Stripes.

If I should dislike a man because of his race, color or creed, I would hate and despise myself for having committed an offense so great. Only by ridding ourselves of intolerance and bigotry can we be really united in the cause to which we have devoted all of our resources and the lives of all of our citizens.

If we are to continue to enjoy and to intensify the blessings of free government, we must fully appreciate the importance of a united and all-out effort, and we must follow the magnificent leadership of our Commander in Chief, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the real and true friend of all men who love liberty, regardless of their race and color or their creed. In this war we have but one Commander in Chief, and upon the success of his leadership may well depend the survival and the supremacy and the perpetuity of representative government. With victory there will be freedom for every one and glory enough for all.

Fulfilled Promises

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Daily Globe:

FULFILLED PROMISES

The past week deserves to go down into history as the week of fulfilled promises. When the heavy cloud of fascism turned day into night for several hundred million people in Europe years ago, life would not have been worth living for them had it not been for that faint light in the west, where the sun disappeared after Dunkerque and where the people of Europe hoped it would rise again some day. To see that dawn again they have endured hardships for years; to see it they have continued a life which otherwise would have been nothing but a burden. Day after day, month after month, year after year they have waited and have watched the west for the rising of that sun of freedom. Many times they thought to see the first rays of the coming dawn. It turned out to be a mirage of their wishes, not a reality. But this week the sun rose again. The invasion has begun. Liberation is in sight.

Another promise seems nearer fulfillment.

Four years ago, a week from tomorrow, a little-known French Army officer stepped up in front of a microphone of the B. B. C. in London and made a historic pledge: "Although we are today crushed by mechanized force," he said, "we can, in the future, conquer through superior mechanized force. Therein lies the destiny of the world." He also told his compatriots: "France is not alone. She is not alone. She is not alone." England and the United States are behind her, he said.

Perhaps few Frenchmen then believed in those words of Gen. Charles de Gaulle. As time went on more and more saw their only hope in that promise, and today there are very few who have any doubt of fulfillment of the pledge. They will enthusiastically greet the redemption of another promise made by the President of the United States, who, to them, has become the symbol of the power and the assistance that will come from this country.

Mr. Roosevelt told his press conference that he had invited General De Gaulle to see him. The general might arrive in Washington to seal, finally, French-American friendship on the anniversary of the day on which De Gaulle begged the French to build their hopes and their future on this friendship.

The forthcoming visit of the head of the French Committee of National Liberation means still more. It has been an open secret that relations between De Gaulle and Mr. Roosevelt have not been too cordial because the general desired recognition of his leadership of France, while the President considered it wiser to be slow in making promises. All he would do was assure the French and the world that the appointment of the semi-Fascist Darlan and his clique was "temporary expediency." When the time appeared ripe for it, the Fascists were dropped. Now the last cloud seems to be disappearing. Unity among the Allies may well become stronger, as a promise of a brighter, securer morrow for all people who believe in democracy.

That confidence received further strength yesterday, when the other much-criticized expedient was discarded with the changes in the Italian Government. This one week brought the liberation of Rome, the retirement of a king who—voluntarily or involuntarily—had played ball with the dictators, and the resignation of a premier who, much as he opposed Mussolini as a rival, was not entirely opposed to the Fascist ideals of imperialism and aggression if there was no risk involved.

Events in Italy and in France are symbolic and symptomatic. There was a time when it looked as if treachery and brutality would win in the end. Then came the turning of the tide. And today—on the fourth anniversary of Mussolini's declaration of war on France—the greatest promise of all emerges: That confidence in the victory of decency will be rewarded.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Keynote Address by Governor Cooper, of Tennessee, Before the State Democratic Convention

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address delivered by Hon. Prentice Cooper, Governor of Tennessee, at Nashville, Tenn., on June 6, 1944, before the State Democratic convention.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Democrats and fellow Americans, June 6, 1944, will be remembered because of an event that took place on the northern coast of France, as long as this Nation endures, compared to which any action taken here will seem of small importance; yet what is done here and in similar State-wide conventions held throughout this Union, will determine how this Nation will be governed. On how this country is governed, depends how this war will be run, when it will end, and what kind of a peace will be made. In other words, we meet to carry out certain orderly processes of democracy that are vital to the very existence of this Government of freemen because we are here to name men to conduct it.

We meet today to elect delegates to the Democratic National Convention and to prepare for the fall elections of the important offices of President of the United States, Vice President of the United States, Governor of Tennessee, Members of Congress, and utilities commissioner. A great responsibility rests upon us here on the home front, for we are met not only as Democrats but as leaders of the Democratic Party in Tennessee, the party that the people have entrusted with power.

I am proud to be a Tennessee Democrat and I want to thank you, the Democrats of Tennessee, for the wonderful support you have always given me, and to tell you how greatly I appreciate all that you have done for me. Not only have you nominated and elected me Governor of Tennessee three times, but 4 years ago you named me chairman of your delegation to the Democratic National Convention and today you have honored me by naming me your keynote speaker for this quadrennial convention, which, in some respects, is the most important since the Democrats started holding conventions in this capital city more than a hundred years ago.

I hope it may not be regarded as out of order, since we meet only once every 4 years, to briefly consider Tennessee democracy. Ours is a great party with a great record. We are proud that our founder was Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence. Tennessee, hereself, contributed that patron saint of democracy, Andrew Jackson, to the party. But Tennessee has also furnished to the Nation two other Democratic Presidents. James K. Polk, who added more territory to the United States than any other President, was a Democrat; and, strange as it may seem, Andrew Johnson was also a Democrat, who had been elected as a Democrat as a running mate of Abraham Lincoln to compose differences then existing among the border States.

Tennessee's Democratic roster of the past is replete with the names of great men such as Sam Houston, Aaron V. Brown, John Bell, and Isham G. Harris, and many others of an earlier day, as well as of distinguished Democrats, whose voices have so recently been stilled that we can almost hear their eloquence today in these halls; like Robert L. Taylor, E. W. Carmack, Benton McMillin, James B. Frazier, and Austin Peay.

Likewise new chapters are being written in the history of our party today by distinguished Tennesseans.

No man of our time excels, in respect, throughout this Nation, our great Secretary of State, Cordell Hull. He has had charge of this Nation's foreign policy longer than any other man in its history and by his reciprocal foreign trade agreements has offered the world one of the best ways to avoid future wars by substituting economic cooperation between nations for economic warfare.

Another distinguished Democrat, who has won more victories for the party in Tennessee than any other, a fearless leader and tireless champion of good government, is our Democratic National Committeeman, Edward Hull Crump.

Another has served longer in the United States Senate than any other Tennessean, the author of the Federal Aid Road System and of other great programs, the Honorable KENNETH D. MCKELLAR.

TOM STEWART, our junior United States Senator, deserves mention for making a valiant fight for something very near to the heart of the South—equality of freight rates.

Leadership of the Democratic women of Tennessee is in the capable hands of a faithful and effective party worker and organizer, a woman of grace and charm, Mrs. Albert E. Hill, of Nashville, our Democratic national committeewoman.

Nor can we overlook on this occasion in our preliminary remarks the distinguished service rendered to the party by our Democratic Representatives in Congress. One especially typifies the harmony now existing within our party—JIM MCCORD.

And, finally, a word of appreciation should go to those prominent Democrats now serving the party on the Democratic State Committee, and especially to the committee's distinguished chairman, Russell Kramer.

We may note with satisfaction that the leaders of Tennessee Democracy assemble today when our party was never better united. In this time of supreme crisis there is no serious division of opinion among us. We know what we want. We are determined. We believe in ourselves and in the accomplishment of the Demorcatic Party. Democratic leadership has been proven and tried by the severest ordeals of history. It has stood the test.

Since I have been responsible as Governor for the conduct of this State's affairs for the past 5½ years, I feel I would be remiss in my duty to the Democratic Party if I did not, at least briefly, outline the accomplishments of this Democratic administration.

It is of the utmost importance to know that the Volunteer State has maintained its great tradition of powerfully assisting this Nation win every one of its wars and in this greatest of all wars, Tennessee is second to no State in the Union in assisting the Federal Government in the successful prosecution of this war.

Tennessee appointed this Nation's first defense council on May 22, 1940.

Tennessee originated this Nation's best wartime agricultural program, as is shown by the fact that Tennessee's home-food-supply program was made a model in most of the States of the Union.

Tennessee completed one of the largest State armory programs in America with 15 new armories constructed at strategic points throughout the State.

Tennessee was one of the first States to send an industrial representative to Washington to secure wartime industry, and Tennessee today has more than a billion dollars worth of war industries. Not even the Republicans are asking for any more.

Tennessee has the largest State guard in the Nation in proportion to population, well equipped and well disciplined to preserve peace and enforce the law within the State during this war.

Tennessee taxpayers contributed a million dollars to buy land on which to locate Camp Forrest and Smyrna Air Base.

Tennessee has been the training ground for a million soldiers and sailors to fight in this war.

Tennessee has been complimented by the Federal authorities for the efficient manner in which it has raised an army of 275,000 of her sons—to go away and fight upon the battlefields of the world. This compares with only 78,000 Tennesseans who fought in the First World War.

Tennessee has based its war effort on the strong foundation of sound fiscal policy. We have paid $45,000,000,000 on the State debt. We have accumulated the State's largest surplus. We have saved a million dollars a year by reducing personnel 20 percent.

The State's credit is at an all-time high. Sixty percent more money has been spent on education than ever before; free textbooks have been introduced and the education of Tennessee's children during this war has been protected by increasing 20,000 school teachers' salaries $20 per month.

The greatest humanitarian program ever undertaken in this State has been made effective to raise old-age pensions. Aid to dependent children, and aid to the blind; to establish a modern system of tuberculosis hospitals throughout the States and to complete the State's largest institutional building program for the care of its unfortunates.

All these things have been accomplished without new taxation, leaving the taxpayer free to better shoulder the heavy burdens of this war.

I wish I had time to tell you how our forests and park lands have been increased seven times; how we have accumulated an unemployment compensation fund of 54 million dollars; how labor reforms have been instituted; how insurance rates have been reduced; how the laws have been enforced by holding pardons to a minimum, and by giving increased law enforcement powers to an efficient highway patrol.

These accomplishments and many others have been made through excellent legislative cooperation that has resulted in the shortest sessions of the legislature in the history of Tennessee. Our last regular session was the shortest in America, lasting only 39 days. These sessions demonstrated the ability of the Democrats of Tennessee to work together in the public interest to get things done with expedition and economy.

The people in wartime have appreciated such attention to business and will not hazard the conduct of their affairs in 1944 by installing a Republican Governor to be at loggerheads with a Democratic legislature while the people wait patiently for needed laws which, in all probability, would never be enacted.

Let's turn now to national affairs. The people of Tennessee are proud that a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress gave us T. V. A. T. V. A. has justified itself alone on the basis of its wonderful contribution to America's war effort, but it has also improved navigation, established flood control, and given Tennessee the lowest electrical rate they have ever enjoyed.

The President has made some mistakes and so has every man that is human, but the President has done these things of supreme importance, supremely well. We all know that the supreme objective of this Nation is full and complete victory over Germany and Japan. To this one great end, everything else must remain subordinate.

We are assembled at the most fateful hour of history. We have embarked on the great crusade. This very day during the early morning hours, under a full moon, on the northern crest of France, the invasion of Europe began.

All this morning American boys—boys from east, middle, and west Tennessee—by the thousands have been landing by sea and from the air along the beachheads of the northern coast of France, especially near the great French port of Le Havre and at the mouth of the River Seine.

It is the greatest amphibious military operation in all history—one of such magnitude that Hitler at the very height of his power after Dunkerque would not dare to attempt. It will probably be at least 72 hours before we can judge how great our initial success has been.

We do know that our military forces are irrevocably committed to this undertaking. They cannot now withdraw. The march to Berlin has begun. We have crossed the Rubicon.

Four years ago almost to a day on June 10, 1940, a proud and arrogant Mussolini stood upon a balcony of the Venezia Palace in Rome. He was in the company of the foreign minister, his son-in-law, Count Ciano. Il Duce was dressed in the gaudy uniform of an Italian field marshal. As he addressed the crowd, he lifted his chin and shouted that he and Hitler would destroy the decadent democracies of the world. Two days ago one of those "decadent" democracies—the United States of America—with some help from the British, captured Mussolini's capital, the proud, eternal city of Rome, including the very palace where Mussolini had done his boasting. Of course, he, himself, had long since fled. Months before his little Fascist world had crumpled under the force of our arms and Mussolini, lacking other means to wreak his vengeance, blamed his son-in-law, that same Count Ciano, who had married his favorite daughter and had been his bosom friend, and had him murdered by his own personal order.

Today is the beginning of the end of Hitler. General Eisenhower is commanding the armies of the democracies, assisted by General Montgomery, who is commanding the actual invasion forces. Montgomery, with our powerful help, already has beaten Rommel in Africa and Italy. Rommel will again be beaten in France. The nations that both Hitler and Mussolini have ridiculed as weak and decadent struck this morning with 4,000 ships, supported by 11,000 planes, a force without even a near parallel in the world's history.

On this historic day we can definitely see that we are on our way to victory and are about to be rescued from Hitler's threat of tyranny and of slavery. Who, we may well ask, is responsible for this happy chain of events? There is one man in the world who, more than anyone else, has gotten us thus far on victory's way, and his name is Franklin D. Roosevelt, our Commander in Chief. Do we at this time want to replace him?

Those of you who voted for Roosevelt 4 years ago in our Democratic State Convention and later in the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, and broke precedent by nominating Franklin D. Roosevent for a third term, can know that by naming him Commander in Chief of our forces at that time that you had a part in the successful invasion of north Africa, of Sicily, of Italy, and of the capture of Rome. We know these miracles have been wrought under his leadership. We cannot assume they would have occurred had our ship of state been steered by a less experienced pilot. "The difficult we do immediately—the impossible takes a little longer."—Motto on wall of a Roosevelt secretary.

Some of you have sons who at this moment are on the coast of France taking part in this invasion of Hitler's Fortress Europe, and all of us have relatives who are fighting for us today in this greatest invasion of all time. Are any of us here willing to commit their safety into untried hands? I propose that we all take as big a part as any of us are capable in the overthrow of Hitler and Hirohito by endorsing Franklin D. Roosevelt for a fourth term.

It is true that the democracies of the world have been on trial since the Second World War began, more than at any previous time, because the democracies of the world were opposed by a new kind of foe, the Hitler-Mussolini type of powerful dictatorship that could act as quickly as one man could change his mind. The processes of democracy operate more slowly and are necessarily more cumbersome. There was a time after Dunkerque when there was a question whether there was time for the democracies to mobilize their strength.

It is probable, indeed, if three great men, Marshal Stalin, Winston Churchill, and Franklin D. Roosevelt, had not gotten together to do a great job in mobilizing the resources of Russia, Great Britain, and the United States, Hitler's dream of world conquest might have become a reality.

In this grave hour of our Nation's peril, we would do well to capture the spirit of a Tennessee boy, Capt. Clare McLain Smartt, pilot of a Flying Fortress. This Putnam County boy was flying his bomber when a wing was severely damaged before the bomber had made its run. Captain Smartt ordered the crew to continue in formation. A few minutes later one of the engines was knocked out. Captain Smartt's order still was to follow formation. The bombs were dropped, the objective was attained. A number of German fighters were brought down, but upon his return to his English base, Captain Smartt's only report was: "Followed formation."

We, too, as Democrats, must hold to our party organization and maintain formation to gain the objective set for us by Thomas Jefferson and keep secure the principles of democratic freedom that gave our Nation birth.

Legislation To Prevent Monopolistic Growth of Bank Holding Companies Is Essential

REMARKS
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, repeatedly I have warned the House about the dangers of the power of monopoly in our American economic life. I pointed out how the very existence of monopoly renders it impossible for the benefits of technological improvements to reach the people generally; how monopoly makes a mockery of the very phrase, free economic system, or private enterprise. I have introduced legislation to try to prevent the further growth of monopoly in the period at the close of the war, and in connection with the disposition of Government-owned plants, and I have shown how financial monopoly has over and over been the mother of industrial monopoly and the very heart of the monopoly dangers.

In this connection there is an important recommendation for legislation in the 1943 Annual Report of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System which demands immediate and serious consideration. I refer to the Board's recommended legislation on bank holding companies commencing on page 34 of the report.

The Board, in the light of its experience, says frankly that the present law is inadequate. It advises us that the corporate device can and has been used to "run around" branch banking statutes and otherwise to accomplish by indirection objectives which could not be accomplished directly. It calls our attention to the lack of any effective control over the unlimited expansion of these companies in banking or, for that matter, in any other field. It points out the facility with which the holding-company device can be used by a few people to obtain control over vast resources and to use the resources so obtained to acquire additional properties. Finally, it objects, with good reason, to a bank-holding company being in all sorts of businesses and to a situation where the borrower and lender of depositors' funds are under the same management.

Let me call your attention to the situation in my own and surrounding States.

In California practically half—49 percent to be exact—of all the banking offices in the entire State are controlled and dominated by one management. I refer to the management of Transamerica Corporation and Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association. Bank of America alone has 495 branches. Think of this—50 percent of the total of 1,035 banks and branches in California are controlled by the management of Transamerica Corporation and Bank of America. These banks and branches hold over 40 percent of all bank deposits in the State, well over three and one-half billions of dollars.

In Nevada 80 percent of the banking offices holding 80 percent of bank deposits are controlled by this management; in Arizona 13 percent of the banking offices holding 23 percent of bank deposits; in Oregon over 34.3 percent of the banking offices holding over 40 percent of bank deposits; and in Washington over 4 percent of the banking offices holding over 4 percent of bank deposits. In these five States this one management controls and operates over 40 percent of all banking offices holding more than 36 percent of all bank deposits, a figure of more than $4,250,000,000.

This is aside from other controlled businesses which are varied and far flung. According to its latest report, Transamerica Corporation controls the Occidental Life Insurance Co., the largest life insurance company on the Pacific coast and among the 25 largest in the United States. It controls the Pacific National Fire Insurance Co., a fire insurance company, and the Premier Insurance Co., an automobile insurance company. It controls the Axton-Fisher Tobacco Co., in Louisville, Ky. It controls Adel Precision Products Corporation and Aerco Corporation, which fabricate or manufacture airplane parts and accessories. It controls Enterprise Engine & Foundry Co., which builds engines and machinery. It controls General Metals Corporation, a foundry; and it controls vast real-estate resources, urban and suburban, through one of its companies, the Capital Co.

Here, indeed, is an illustration of the great economic power which, through the holding-company device, can be wielded by a small group without the responsibilities of complete ownership. Only last year its resources were used in an attempt to acquire stock in a local bank in Los Angeles. Here was a case where one day Transamerica Corporation delivered an ultimatum to the directors of the bank and the next day initiated a high-pressure public campaign, unloosing brokers, and offering the equivalent of $33 per share in cash for stock which only the month before had been quoted at from $23 to $25 per share. Cases like this are not rare—it just happens to be the last one. I do not know what percentage of the stock of this bank it obtained as a result of its efforts, but I do know that, with the resources of millions of people in these few hands, there is nothing to prevent new offers at higher and higher figures until the last vestige of independence is gone.

I warn my colleagues that unless they are prepared to assume a responsibility which I, for one, do not wish to share, we had better act, and act quickly. The Board's report checks it squarely up to us:

Summary of Bureaucratic Growth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS LUDLOW
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, the resolution I have introduced, which provides for a nonpartisan, nonpolitical congressional investigation of bureaucracy and unconstitutional trends of government is attracting strong support throughout the country.

Lawrence Sullivan, the distinguished author of Bureaucracy Runs Amuck, one of the latest of the best sellers, has sent me the following letter:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LUDLOW: The press of the country reflects enthusiastic approval of your proposal (H. Res. 547) to inquire into the operations of our top-heavy Federal bureaucracy. You are doing a great work in keeping this important discussion on a nonpartisan basis, for it is truly a problem on which all defenders of the American constitutional system can unite wholeheartedly. Our prevailing system of dictatorial bureaucracy threatens the whole structure of ordered liberty under law. One need only examine the recent report of the Senate Judiciary Committee on the Montgomery Ward case to understand how far we have drifted from our constitutional moorings.

* * * * *

I will be most happy to have you call on me at any time if I can be of assistance in this great enterprise.

With kind personal regards,

Sincerely,

LAWRENCE SULLIVAN.

Probably no one in our country has devoted more time and conscientious study and research to the evolution and development of our bureaucracy than Mr. Sullivan. He has prepared a summary of bureaucratic growth which is interesting and edifying. It is as follows:

Throughout the Nation bureaucracy has become a household word—a symbol of burdensome and excessive regulations and compulsory civilian routines interfering with the vigorous prosecution of the war.

"Give America her head, and watch our smoke" is the coast-to-coast plea from the home front.

Yet few citizens have paused to examine details of the new Federal structure, or inquire into its aims, methods, and gargantuan fiscal diet. Not until the Senate Finance Committee discovered some 35 different Federal agencies engaged in various phases of post-war planning did Congress undertake a systematic vivisection of the recent yeasty growth of our American bureaucracy.

Through the Byrd committee Congress found that some 200 new Federal bureaus, boards, commissions, offices, and administrations had been created by law or Executive order since 1933—an average of about 20 additional governing units each year. Many had begun with an elaborate questionnaire to be filled in, audited, and certified in triplicate. And several of these new agencies, while presumed to be discharging purely war functions, were discovered to be assiduously shaping plans for post-war operations on a permanent basis. While our military services are smashing through to certain and conclusive victory on the far-flung battle fronts, many of our civilian bureaus and commissions in Washington are digging in for post-war permanency.

Today the Federal civil pay roll carries 3,300,000 men and women exclusive of all military personnel. This is about 1 Government employee for every 41 in the national population. In June 1933 the combined civil rolls of the Federal Government carried only 567,000 names (again exclusive of the military), or about 1 to 200 population.

Senator BYRD'S committee reports have alluded to this extravagant civilian pay roll as a peril to America's victory program, saying:

"It is imperative that the people of the United States become aware of this shocking abuse of manpower in the Federal Government, and that they promote the transfer of all unnecessary Government workers to essential war industries. Unless this is done quickly, the overstaffing and inefficiency in the Federal establishment will constitute a serious peril to our war effort.

"Excluding those engaged in mechanical and construction work, one may say that fully one-third of the entire remaining civilian personnel of the Federal Government could be dismissed. Rather than impairing the necessary functions of government, this action would result in greater efficiency, provide manpower for industry and the armed forces, reduce the cost of government, and aid substantially in the successful prosecution of the war."

Although there has been a consistent trend of Federal expansion over the last century, the increase of bureaus during the last decade has been on a scale previously unknown anywhere in the history of the world.

Between 1800 and 1925 the Federal departmental pay rolls doubled about every 20 years. But after 1933 Federal civilian employment doubled in 7 years—from 500,000 to 1,000,000. And after June 1940, it doubled again in 18 months, to 2,000,000. Then another million were added during the next 14 months, to 3,000,000. During the last 10 years the national population has increased by approximately 10,000,000, and more than one-fourth of that number have been added directly to the Federal civil rolls.

Already we hear in Washington of plans to convert the great civilian agencies of wartime administration to the work of peace: "Rationing must be continued indefinitely * * * price controls must be maintained * * * lend-lease surely cannot be abandoned." During 1943 and 1944 bills were presented in Congress to expand social security, Federal health and medical programs, agricultural controls, and manpower allocations.

We experienced no such expansion in World War No. 1. Between June 1916 and November 1918, Federal employment doubled, but the November 1918 peak was only 918,000 civilian workers—fewer than we had at the start of the rearmament program in June 1940.

Today we have 1 civilian pay-roller for every 3 men in the military services—against a peak of 1 to 6 in the last war.

As compared with the last war, why do we now need twice as many civilian workers in government for every man in military uniform? That's the challenge of bureaucracy today.

The total Federal civilian pay roll today equals, in manpower, the striking force of 220 infantry divisions on the battlefield. (The total field force of the entire Nazi military machine is estimated at only 330 combat divisions.)

For the whole Federal structure, two out of every three civilian pay-rollers are men.

The country recalls vividly that during the period 1933–36 every new Government program was establised as an "emergency" enterprise to fight the depression. The implication was clear, often stated officially, that the end of the emergency would bring demobilization of the costly programs. But the depression emergency merged smoothly with the greater war emergency, and now we see the war emergency merging again with the even more compelling emergencies of peace.

Every bureau costs money. In 1933 Uncle Sam's civilian pay roll for a month averaged about $75,000,000. But now it is $475,000,000 a month, exclusive of the military.

Here are some of the queer activities and interests which make the current picture of bureaucracy at work and play:

Although the Federal Government operates the largest printing establishment in the world, covering 33 acres of floor space, it still buys outside printing at the rate of $10,000 a day.

One copy each of a week's mimeographed press material from Washington weighed 46 pounds and 12 ounces, making about 875 columns of type in a standard newspaper.

One war agency published a home-maker pamphlet advising, "If sheets are laundered at home, use plenty of soap and water."

Publicity bureaus of the Federal Government (exclusive of the military service) use 8,813 cameras—movie and still—to apprise the taxpayers of their accomplishments, plus 19,078 pieces of auxiliary photographic equipment and 53,717 pieces of photo processing equipment.

A Senate committee discovered at least 6,000 draft deferments in nonwar agencies.

The Federal telephone bill, exclusive of the military, runs about $30,000,000 a year.

One member of the Cabinet has 18 Federal Executive-order jobs besides his regular departmental responsibilities, and another is a director in 33 federally owned corporations and business associations.

Heroism of Corp. Paul B. Huff, Cleveland, Tenn., Is Great Inspiration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the newspaper report of the Chattanooga Times, Monday, June 5, which sets forth the remarkable acts of heroism of Corp. Paul B. Huff, a constituent of mine from Cleveland, Tenn.

Tennessee had the distinction of furnishing Sgt. Alvin York, the No. 1 hero of World War No. 1. The noble acts of Corporal Huff will place him in the front list for consideration as No. 1 hero of World War No. 2:

CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL WON BY INTREPID CLEVELAND MAN—CORP. PAUL B. HUFF, PARACHUTE INFANTRYMAN, CITED FOR HEROISM IN ACTION AGAINST GERMANS

Corp. Paul B. Huff, 25-year-old parachute infantryman and former railroader of Cleveland, Tenn., has been awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for heroism in action against the Germans near Carano, Italy, February 8, the War Department announced yesterday.

Corp. Huff, son of Isham Huff, of Route 6, Cleveland, will receive the medal, the Nation's highest honor for a fighting man, at an overseas ceremony, the announcement stated.

In action almost paralleling that of Sgt. Alvin York, Tennessee's famous hero of World War No. 1, Corp. Huff, single-handed, advanced 350 yards under heavy artillery, mortar, and machine-gun fire through an enemy mine field and wiped out a German machine-gun crew. He then deliberately drew enemy fire on himself to determine the strength and location of the enemy and led his six-man patrol to safety after the German unit was annihilated.

Corp. Huff's parachute infantry battalion was in a forward position in the vicinity of Carano, Italy, on February 8, when the battalion started receiving small arms fire on its exposed right flank. He volunteered to lead his patrol into enemy territory to determine the strength of the Germans facing them. The weather was clear and there was almost no cover. The enemy had good observation when the patrol began its dangerous trek early in the morning.

Huff and his men selected a slight draw as the only possible point from which to observe the enemy. The draw, in addition to being mined, was covered by three enemy machine guns and a 20-mm. gun. The guns opened up on the patrol from about 350 yards and with bullets peppering as close as 3 feet away and mortar shells exploding within 5 or 10 yards, Corp. Huff ordered his men to take cover and he went forward alone to within 75 yards of the first machine gun.

"Under direct fire from the rear machine gun," reported his company commander, Lt. Joseph J. Winsko, Niagara Falls, N. Y., "he crawled the remaining 75 yards to a position behind the closest one, which was well hidden and strongly emplaced, and with his machine gun killed the crew, and put the gun out of action.

"He fired from a kneeling position," Lieutenant Winsko continued, "in a deliberate effort to draw the fire of the enemy, from which he was able to estimate correctly its strength and location, thus accomplishing the mission of his patrol."

Corporal Huff, according to War Department information, then returned to his patrol and under concentrated fire led his men to safety after having been under enemy fire for 4 hours.

KILL 27, CAPTURE 21 NAZIS

His reconnaissance enabled his unit to kill 27 Germans, capture 21, and route the remainder of an enemy company of 125 men, his officers reported.

The citation to the Medal of Honor follows:

"For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity at risk of life above and beyond the call of duty, in action on February 8, 1944, near Carano, Italy. Corporal Huff volunteered to lead a six-man patrol with the mission of determining the location and strength of an enemy unit which was delivering fire on the exposed right flank of his company. The terrain over which he had to travel consisted of exposed, rolling ground, affording the enemy excellent visibility. As the patrol advanced, its members were subjected to small-arms and machine-gun fire and a concentration of mortar fire, shells bursting within 5 to 10 yards of them and bullets striking the ground at their feet.

"Moving ahead of his patrol, Corporal Huff drew fire from three enemy machine guns and a 20-millimeter weapon. Realizing the danger confronting his patrol, he advanced alone under deadly fire through a mine field and arrived at a point within 75 yards of the nearest machine-gun position. Under direct fire from the rear machine gun, he crawled the remaining 75 yards to the closest emplacement, killed the crew with his submachine gun, and destroyed the gun. During this act he fired from a kneeling position, which drew fire from other positions, enabling him to estimate correctly the strength and location of the enemy. Still under concentrated fire, he returned to his patrol and led his men to safety.

"As a result of the information he gained, a patrol in strength sent out that afternoon, one group under the leadership of Corporal Huff, succeeded in routing an enemy company of 125 men, killing 27 Germans and capturing 21 others, with a loss of only 3 patrol members. Corporal Huff's intrepid leadership and daring combat skill reflect the finest traditions of the American infantryman."

ALWAYS A SURE SHOT

Huff's exploits are not surprising to friends around Cleveland, who remember him as the quickest and surest shot of the gang, with gun or pistol, on hunting trips to White Oak Mountain, near Cleveland. His friends also had heard of his interest in the parachute branch long before he entered jump training at Fort Benning, Ga. Prior to entering the service, he was splitting his civilian time working between the Cleveland Chair Co. and the Southern Railway System. Often when talking things over with the boys at his lunch hour, he would declare:

"When my time comes, and it's coming soon, I want the paratroopers. They call it the suicide squadron, but that's for me."

He has been overseas 2 years. He was inducted in June 1941, just 3 days after his twenty-third birthday. He received his basic training at Camp Wheeler, before being assigned to the parachute school at Fort Benning.

FAVORITE OF ENGINEER

Born in Cleveland, the son of Isham Huff, veteran employee of the Southern Railway System, Paul, like his three brothers, wanted to be a railroad man. One of his biggest rooters is C. J. Butler, veteran engineer, to whose engine Huff was often assigned as fireman. Butler observed:

"Yes, sir, Paul's a tough Tennessee nut and if we had more like him, we wouldn't need such a large Army."

The parachutist likes horseback riding, swimming, boxing, and dancing, according to friends. His girl friend, Miss Ruth Gentry, also resides in Cleveland and friends predict their betrothal when the hero returns home.

His father and stepmother live on Harrison Road, Route 6, Cleveland, and Paul lives with his brother, Clayton, a short distance from his father's home. His mother died when he was 3 years of age.

He has three brothers and six sisters. One brother, Clinton, is with an engineering battalion in New Guinea. The other brothers, Clayton and Decatur, live near Cleveland. Also living in Cleveland are the sisters, Mrs. S. M. Lemons, Miss Beryl Huff, Mrs. D. W. May, Mrs. Neil Chase, Mrs. Homer Green, and Mrs. James Ingram.

During his overseas service, Corporal Huff has not been content with physical action against the enemy. He has sent $1,300 in War bonds to his sister, Mrs. Neil Chase, for safekeeping.

Insurance Legislation

HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, for the past several days telegrams have been sent to the membership by various labor leaders in which they voice their protests against the attempts being made by the Committee on the Judiciary to prevent a further encroachment by the courts on our prerogatives.

It has been suggested that if the insurance bill becomes law, it may be so construed as to remove the employees of insurance companies from the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act and other laws which have been enacted for the protection of labor.

Not only is this fear entirely groundless but, as a matter of fact, the aim of the advocates of the bills is completely in harmony with the position of labor itself in regard to the antitrust laws. Labor has consistently opposed the application of the antitrust laws to labor unions and its position has in large measure been sustained by Congress and the courts. Insurance, on the other hand, has never been subject to the antitrust laws and the purpose of the Bailey-Van Nuys bill is to insure that the existing status shall be continued and to prevent the great injury which would result from suddenly applying the antitrust laws to a business which has been built up under an entirely different system of regulation by the States.

The bill does not modify in any way the Fair Labor Standards Act, the National Labor Relations Act, or any other labor legislation, nor does it affect the constitutional basis of such legislation. It does not purport to declare that insurance is not commerce—that question is under consideration by the Supreme Court, and the bill does not deal with it. The bill merely declares that the Sherman Act and the Clayton Act shall not be construed to apply to the business of insurance or to acts in the conduct of that business or to impair its regulation by the States. The applicability of existing labor legislation is in no case dependent upon whether the employer is subject to the antitrust laws.

Even the question whether the employer is engaged in interstate commerce—and we repeat that the bill does not affect this question—is not the test which determines the applicability of labor legislation to insurance employees. The Supreme Court, in United States v. Darby (312 U. S. 100 (1941)), said that it has "many times held that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce extends to the regulation through legislative action of activities intrastate, which have a substantial effect on the commerce or the exercise of the Congressional power over it."

The Court in that case held that while manufacture is not of itself interstate commerce, the control exercised by Congress under the Fair Labor Standards Act of the wages to be paid to workmen engaged in manufacture is within the power of Congress.

The Fair Labor Standards Act—Twenty-ninth United States Code, pages 201–279—applies by its terms to employees engaged in interstate commerce or in production of goods for interstate commerce or employed in any process or occupation necessary to the production of goods for interstate commerce.

Another example of the application of the Fair Labor Standards Act to an intrastate activity is found in Kirschbaum v. Walling (316 U. S. 317 (1942)). The Court there upheld the application of the act to employees of a loft building—including firemen and elevator operators—who were not themselves engaged in interstate commerce, on the ground that the work of these employees had such a close tie with the process of production for commerce that they should be regarded as engaged in an occupation necessary to the production of goods for commerce.

The National Labor Relations Act—Twenty-ninth United States Code, pages 151–158—applies to activities affecting commerce. In National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation (301 U. S. 1 (1937)), the Court upheld the application of that act to employees engaged in a manufacturing operation which in itself was not interstate commerce.

The Supreme Court, in Wickard v. Filburn (317 U. S. 111 (1942)), upheld the application of the Agricultural Adjustment Act—Seventh United States Code Annotated 1281 et sequentia—to production not intended in any part for commerce but wholly for consumption on the farm. There a farmer was penalized for raising for his own use more wheat than his quota allowed him. The Court said that Congress can appropriately consider that wheat consumed on the farm where grown, if wholly outside the scheme of regulation, would have a substantial effect in defeating its purpose of stimulating trade at increased prices, since the grower thus forestalls resort to the market by producing to meet his own needs.

In United States v. Wrightwood Dairy Co. (315 U. S. 110 (1942)) the Supreme Court upheld the application of the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act—Seventh United States Code, page 608–c—to the business of purchasing and reselling milk entirely within one State, on the ground that it was in competition with milk which came from without the State. The act by its terms applied to the handling of milk in the current of interstate or foreign commerce or which directly burdens, obstructs, or affects interstate or foreign commerce in such commodity.

Under the holdings in the above cases, it seems abundantly clear that the power of Congress to legislate respecting labor does not depend on whether the employer is in interstate commerce, and a fortiori it does not depend on whether the employer is subject to the Federal antitrust laws.

The Government itself, in its brief in Polish National Alliance of the United States against National Labor Relations Board, now pending before the Supreme Court, argued that the National Labor Relations Act applied to the insurance business because it affected interstate commerce, and that "the Court has never held respecting any aspect of the insurance business that it did not affect commerce."

Commencement Exercises in Mooseheart, the City of Childhood

OF

HON. CHAUNCEY W. REED

OF ILLINOIS

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in the midst of the horrors and chaos of a global war, it is most reassuring as we survey this broad land of ours to observe in numberless communities diligent and thoughtful programs for the training of young people in exercising their responsibilities as citizens that they may be better prepared for the task of directing the destiny of our Nation in the years that are to come. It is comforting to realize that the future of our country will rest in the hands of these millions of young men and women being thus reared and educated, because we are satisfied that the strongest safeguard of future national security and progress is a generation properly prepared for citizenship, and trained in responsibilities and obligations to each other and to their fellow man. Today, throughout the world, we witness the heartbreaking spectacle and the grim tragedy of sovereign nations being ravaged and strangled and bled—the shocking and inevitable result of a generation of young Fascists trained to exalt evil and terrorism and war, and taught to practice murder and brutality and every vile instinct that would drag mankind to a level lower than that of the beast.

Mr. Speaker, one of the many communities dedicated to the great task of combatting the evil tendencies of the old world and of training our future citizens in the principles of true Americanism is of outstanding prominence. Mooseheart, known throughout the length and breadth of our fair land as the City of Childhood, is located in the congressional district that I have the honor to represent, and it is of this remarkable character-building community that I wish today to express a few thoughts to my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

Mooseheart is the home and school financed by the fraternal society known as the Loyal Order of Moose and operated by this society for the benefit of the orphan children and their widowed mothers within the ranks of the organization. It nestles on the west bank of the beautiful Fox River just a few miles north of the thriving and progressive city of Aurora. From this picturesque setting, during the past quarter of a century, Mooseheart has each year been graduating and distributing into all parts of our Nation large classes of young men and women who are firmly grounded in the faith of their fathers, trained and equipped to their fingertips to succeed in the world without infringing upon the rights and opportunities of others, and imbued with a deep and abiding sense of responsibility to God and country. No further proof of this love of God and hatred of evil need be adduced than the fact that more than 600 recent graduates of Mooseheart, both young men and young women, are in the armed forces of our country, serving on the far-flung battle lines with distinction to themselves and honor to the community which produced them.

Children come originally to Mooseheart from homes all over the country that have been broken up by the death of the breadwinner. The widowed mother accompanies her children and resides with them until they graduate. The children are given an excellent home and individual attention. They are educated through the high school, nurtured in true religious and moral precepts, and grounded firmly in civic responsibility. They are taught a useful trade at which, when they graduate to take their places in the workaday world, they can earn an honest living and can look forward to that time when they can rear and educate families of their own.

Commencement exercises were held this year at Mooseheart on June 10, and the program of activities of that day prompts these observations of mine. A feature of the program was the commencement address delivered by the founder of Mooseheart and the man who has served as the chairman of its board of governors for 30 years, the Honorable JAMES J. DAVIS, Secretary of Labor in the Cabinets of three Presidents, and now serving his fourteenth year as United States Senator from the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Formal exercises for the young men and women of the class of 1944 were held in the forenoon in the Roosevelt Memorial Auditorium. This part of the commencement program differed from tens of thousands of other commencement programs throughout the country in only one respect. The difference lay in the fact that all of the class were without fathers, and most of them without mothers. They were graduating from the only home that most of them had ever known during the best part of their life, and they were plunging into the struggle of life without the comforting voice of a mother or the reassuring counsel of a father to guide and encourage them.

The class of 1944, I learned, had been in combined residence at Mooseheart for a total of 360 years and 10 months. The average time spent there was 9 years and 3 months. This ranged from a residence of 10 months for one graduate to a period of 16½ years for another. Half of the entire class had been residents for more than 8 years. The average age of these young men and women this year was 18 years and 2 months. They came to Mooseheart from Illinois, Indiana, Pennsylvania, Idaho, Ohio, Montana, Virginia, West Virginia, California, Colorado, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, and Wisconsin, a total of 16 States, with Illinois having the largest number of representatives.

The activities of the Mooseheart commencement took place in the open air that same afternoon. Every child on the grounds, graduate and undergraduate, took an active part. The scene was the large athletic field in front of the stadium plainly visible to all north- and south-bound traffic on the Lincoln Highway, which cuts through Mooseheart's borders at this point.

The program opened with folk dances by the tiny tots—infant boys and girls from the Pennsylvania Baby Village, a lilliputian city within the confines of Mooseheart itself, and one of the best-known features of the institution. The older girls in the grades and the high school followed in costumes representing various places and periods. They presented a magnificent exhibition of mass calisthenics, flag drills, gymnastics, tumbling, marching, folk dancing, and singing. The boys from the elementary grades and the high school in cadet uniforms participated on the athletic field in an exhibition drill staged by the Mooseheart Cadet Corps and in the Mooseheart Students' Band, which provides stirring music for these and other occasions.

One thing that fascinated the spectators was the harmonious blending of these young men and women, these boys and girls, these tiny tots and infants, with old Mother Nature herself. They were literally bursting with vitality and energy, graceful in their dances, precise in their drills, and noticeably blessed with sturdiness of body and naturalness of action that would be most difficult, if not impossible to surpass in any other community. It spoke eloquently of long and intimate association with the green fields and luxuriant farms—1,200 acres—to be found in abundance within the borders of Mooseheart.

Assiduous care has been taken in providing an adequate religious, academic, and vocational program for these young Americans. The responsible authorities early realized that a sturdy physical foundation is prerequisite to happy childhood, good morals, high scholarship, and lofty ambitions, hence concentration was directed to instructions and exercise in the gymnasium, on the athletic fields, in the summer pools, and on the frozen waters of the campus lake to assure Mooseheart boys and girls of healthy bodies to complete the triangle with mind and soul.

What has been accomplished at Mooseheart can be likewise achieved in other communities. Of course, those responsible for its success must devote the same care and the same attention to the problem as do those who have attained such gratifying results in the city of childhood. Constant supervision is, of course, necessary, but this of itself is insufficient. It has been a supervised program of constant activity that has really worked the wonders at Mooseheart. There no problem of juvenile delinquency exists. Why? Well, chiefly because Mooseheart boys and girls are all too busy in their various activities and have no idle time in which to entertain evil thoughts.

Programs such as are practiced at Mooseheart most assuredly cost money. Actually, however, they are the strictest of economies. An ounce of prevention is always worth a pound of cure. A hundred dollars spent for the purpose of training boys and girls for clean and useful careers is far less costly than the expenditure of a thousand dollars in an attempt to retrieve them after they have fallen into evil ways. Mooseheart has pointed the way to successful child training. It is a model that other communities might well emulate. Each year of its continued existence it has contributed to our Nation hundreds of the finest type of citizens whose influence in the communities into which they have gone has been for the preservation of American ideals and respect for the rights of their fellow man.

At the commencement exercises, the Honorable JAMES J. DAVIS, in speaking to the graduating class, climaxed their years at Mooseheart with a review of the many advantages those young people had enjoyed through the foresight and kindness of a great society of men and women devoted to ideals of peace and brotherhood, and coupled with it a patriotic plea for them to stand firm at all times in the defense of their ideals and those of their country. To them he said in part:

You who leave these halls today are graduating into a world at war, a world torn by strife and turmoil, a world in which freemen are laying down their lives to turn back the tides of treachery and tyranny which threaten to engulf the universe.

Today, many of your predecessors in these halls, more than 600 of them, are now serving with the American armed forces in all parts of the world. Today, certain of your predecessors are now engaged in that great cross-channel effort which shall lead to the ultimate liberation of France and the whole of Nazi-dominated Europe.

This war is being fought to preserve the rights of freemen and to sustain human decency throughout the world. It is a war designed to safeguard your generation and all generations who follow you from the forces of tyranny and oppression which have menaced the world in all ages.

This Nation will expend untold quantities of material wealth and untold numbers of human lives before this war is won. The road to victory will be long and hard and brutal, and much American blood will flow along the way. We, as free men and women, shall have to pay a heavy price to prove that we are worthy of the freedom which is ours.

You of this generation, like all other living Americans, have a solemn obligation to see to it that our sacrifices in this war shall not be in vain, and that the peace which follows this war shall be a just and enduring one.

You who leave here today are equipped to play your full part in that challenging work which lies before us, for when you leave this school, you will take with you the best of training, the best of character, and the best of culture that lies within our power here to offer you.

You have seen and known the community life of the city, the town, and the farm. You have performed almost every manner of productive work with hand and brain. You have known the friendship and the guidance of wise and helpful teachers.

You have learned many of the primary lessons of life—not only those that are written in books for all men to see—but those other lessons which come only to those who labor with their hands, either at the sowing and cultivation of crops, on our 1,200-acre farm here at Mooseheart, or at the learning and application of an honored trade, in one of our vocational shops. Those of you who leave here today have mastered both of these, and they will serve you well throughout all the years of your lives.

Here at Mooseheart your welfare and development have always been uppermost in the minds of those who were around you. You have had—as all young people should have—the essentials of good wholesome food, skillful and effective medical care and exercises to develop the body and the brain.

You have been taught self-respect and social responsibility. You have learned the honor and humility of honest toil—of a task well done. Each of you has been reared in the religious beliefs of your parents. You have learned reverence toward and sincerity in the words and teachings of Almighty God.

You are equipped to take up your station in life. You are equipped to go forward and make your contributions to society and the world.

Many there are who will tell you that the doors to opportunity and progress are closed. Many there are who will tell you that honest work brings with it no reward. They are the dissenters; they are the shiftless; they are the wreckers. I know that you will find no company in such a lot as that.

You are a part of a new American generation. You were born and reared in a free society. The freedom you have is yours to destroy or strengthen as you see fit. I cannot say how you might live. I can only say that if you live in accordance with the principles of God and Americanism your freedom will remain unsullied.

Though there are those who will tell you that the future is dark and foreboding, that all of life is but a struggle in a somber sea of futility, I say to you that you must turn your eyes upon the world of the future, and I say to you that the future of the world shall not be the dark and wearisome way.

For upon the ashes of this great wave of human error and destruction, there shall be built a world more fine, more perfect, and more inspiring than the minds and hands of humanity have ever before devised.

There shall be built upon the ashes of war an era of peace and human calm that surpasseth all understanding.

There shall be built upon the blood and suffering of death a way of life more full and more gentle than the bravest hopes of any man.

There shall be built upon the plunder and grief of fell destruction a progress more powerful, more sustained, and more enduring than the memory of man.

This world of the future shall be your world. You and your generation shall carry the banner of human progress to the highest pinnacle that civilization has ever known.

For all that flows from this war shall not be base and evil. Out of the harrowing experiences of this struggle will come discoveries, attainments, and methods which will rebuild our lives in a world of peace.

Already, in the field of medicine, men who would have died but a few short years ago from similar wounds, are now being snatched from the very jaws of death by the new wonder drugs, penicillin and the sulfa derivatives, by blood plasma, and by improved surgical methods.

No man can say what vast achievements lie before us in our eternal struggle against the ravages of time and disease. No man can foretell how many years of worth and comfort we can add to the lives of men.

The amazing mechanical, electronic, and scientific developments which have come in the wake of this war will, even as they have dealt death in the hour of battle, enrich life in the hour of peace.

In almost every field of human activity, in housing, education, transportation, in agriculture, radio, and in the thousands of other activities, both established and yet to be established, there will come great improvements in the lives of men and boundless opportunities for the attainment and advancement of all men with the courage and determination to labor and to serve.

Each generation has produced outstanding men. In my span of years I have seen the humble and rudimentary works of such courageous and determined men as Edison and Ford and Westinghouse ultimately lighten the burden of mankind and endear their names to the world.

It shall be so with you. You who labor to improve the lot of your fellow men will be met with the forces of doubt, derision, and skepticism. But those of you who are worthy will not falter.

The paths of progress will open up to you, and all men will be grateful for the labors you performed in their behalf.

If past generations have produced great men in America, if past generations have produced talented artists, able industrialists, profound scholars, sincere humanitarians, and masterful public servants, this generation and the generations to come will produce men of deeper courage, of greater ability, and of higher attainments than have been produced by any previous generation in the history of the world.

So, as one who has watched the development of civilization for more than half a century, I say to you, "Look to the future, for the past serves only to inspire you to the great accomplishments which you will realize in the days of your years."

But even the glorious past of this great Nation will pale in the light of your achievements; for upon the base of their effort you will erect the structure of life, and peace, and progress, which was envisioned by the God of our fathers when He placed His handiwork of men upon this earth.

"Weep not for the vanished ages,
With their great, heroic men,
Who live on history's pages
Or dwell in the poet's pen.

"For the grandest times are before us,
And the world is yet to see
The noblest worth of this great earth
In the men that are to be."

During the approaching week, we in America will commemorate the one hundred and sixty-seventh anniversary of the Stars and Stripes.

All of you have learned to honor our flag and to respect those enduring principles of justice, peace, and liberty, which it symbolizes. I know that you will keep faith with this Nation and its flag. I know that you will never permit this flag to be used as a symbol of conquest or as an instrument to dominate and control the world. For you know and I know that if we permit our flag to be used as an instrument of oppression, its honor and its glory will be forever lost.

You have been taught to cherish freedom. And if you would preserve the freedom, sovereignty and independence of this great Nation, you will hold true to this flag and its principles, and you will never abandon the Stars and Stripes for any other flag, no matter by what name or what description it may be called.

As you go forward into the progress of the future, hold this flag of America high and ever before you. And may it ever be, down through all the centuries of time, that when men inquire after our flag, they will always be met by this same stirring answer: "'Tis the Star Spangled Banner and long will it wave, o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Free Enterprise: What It Means to Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article by George Meany, secretary-treasurer of the American Federation of Labor:

[From the American Federationist of June 1943]

FREE ENTERPRISE—WHAT IT MEANS TO LABOR

(By George Meany)

In hundreds of advertisements, in speeches on the platform and over the radio, and through all the other instruments of twentieth century publicity, America's major industrial firms and the spokesmen for organized business have unceasingly exhorted the people of this country during the past few years to preserve free enterprise.

In view of all these clarion calls, it may be assumed that many of our leading businessmen entertain some fear that the continuance of free enterprise in the United States is seriously threatened and that public opinion must accordingly be mobilized for the defense of our economic system against those who wish to see it emasculated or abandoned.

To businessmen who have such apprehensions it will be comforting to learn that free enterprise—genuine free enterprise—enjoys the firm support of the American Federation of Labor and its millions of members. We are convinced beyond doubt that the American way of life holds more possibilities for the good of all the people than any other way.

As is the case with many other terms that are widely used in present-day discussion, free enterprise is variously understood and variously defined. Notably, the concept of free enterprise held by many businessmen does not coincide in all particulars with that of wage-earning people.

Thus, at least some businessmen still regard free enterprise as a system under which those who own a business must have the absolute and unquestioned right to do exactly as they please, with no concern or responsibility for the public interest or the well-being of their employees.

Under their feudalistic conception of free enterprise, it is not only proper but virtually mandatory to resist unionization and collective bargaining. As they see free enterprise, it means freedom to use industrial spies, tear gas and firearms to block the organization of workers.

Businessmen clinging to an outdated, unreconstructed idea of free enterprise regard as utter nonsense the suggestion that free enterprise, if it is to continue, must provide jobs for all after the end of the war.

We know, however, that there are large numbers of businessmen today to whom the old concept of free enterprise is repugnant, at least in part. Nevertheless, there can be no question that the old-school notion of what free enterprise means is still cherished by a very substantial body of employers.

Organized labor asserts its support of a system of free enterprise. This, it should be noted, is quite different from pledging adherence to the system of free enterprise.

SELF-SEEKING SYSTEM NOT BACKED

America's wage earners do not support any system of free enterprise; specifically, they do not support a blind and self-seeking system of free enterprise.

With the cry "Preserve free enterprise" filling the air, it is not inappropriate to examine recent economic history to see whether real free enterprise has been the prevailing condition. If we make even a casual review of the last 20 years we discover altogether too many businesses that have been neither free nor enterprising, in the best sense of those words.

During the boom years of the roaring twenties, American business rode rather high. Occasionally it rode wild, and when it rode wild it rode very handsome indeed.

And then, in 1929, the bubble burst. What happened? Was our so-called system of free enterprise equal to the challenge? Did it display any real enterprise? The answer is history. Instead of enterprise, business treated the Nation to a show of cowardice and shortsightedness. After 1929, with the unemployed numbered in the millions and misery ravaging the land, we came very near to the end of our system of free enterprise, and with it our entire system of private property and representative democracy. For that debacle, business must bear the brunt of the blame.

Aided by governmental shots in the arm, the free enterprise system did somewhat better by the American people between 1933 and 1939 than it had done in the preceding 3 years, when business was wholly on its own. Yet even with the help of governmental pump priming, our free-enterprise system did not end mass unemployment.

Today, with our country serving as the arsenal for the Allied Nations and American industry saturated with Government contracts, unemployment has finally been removed. But is there any warrant for claiming for the free enterprise system a major share of the credit or, for that matter, any credit at all for this belated attainment of full employment?

How much enterprise is a manufacturer called upon to manifest to keep his plant humming when the customer, the Government, obligingly comes to him and shoves a mass of million-dollar contracts at him?

Notwithstanding all the shouting of the full-page advertisements in magazines and newspapers, it seems clear that, in view of the tremendous role played by Government expenditures during these past few years of war, the provision of jobs for all cannot be accurately called an achievement of our free enterprise system. One cannot hide the plain fact that it was not until war came and our Government began to pour billions of dollars into our economy that widespread unemployment, which had persisted for a decade, was finally erased.

When American labor states that it endorses and supports a free economic system, it is expressing its preference for a system that is truly free as against one where the economic life is directed by an all-powerful state. Labor is opposed to State control of the economy. But let no one jump to the conclusion that, since labor opposes State control, it is willing to have private individuals and concerns twist, hobble and rig the economy in defiance of true free enterprise. Totalitarian governmental control is repugnant, but so, too, is private monopolistic control. Industrial combinations so mighty that they can compel the consumer to pay whatever prices they choose to set are not representative of free enterprise as labor understands the term.

What then does free enterprise mean to labor?

Free enterprise, as labor understands it, must be a system which, while based on the profit motive, recognizes and fulfills its responsibility to provide workers with jobs, and does this not out of any altruistic impulse but out of an appreciation that full employment is essential to prosperity.

A truly American system of free enterprise must be based on fair trade practices and upon honest dealing and fair value. As American labor understands it, free enterprise does not admit the use of sham advertising, tie-in sales and unfair combinations in restraint of trade.

The American worker believes that he has an important place in the system of free enterprise. He believes in capitalism and he believes in private property, and he wants to have some of it. He looks to free enterprise to enable him, through work, to secure the good things of life for himself and his family. He expects free enterprise to make it possible for him to accumulate a reserve sufficient to provide him and his dependents with reasonable security.

To labor, free enterprise means a system in which free labor and the workers' right to join together for their economic betterment are accepted without question, a system in which bona fide collective bargaining is recognized as an essential element, a system in which the oppressive practices exposed by the La Follette committee are beyond the pale.

To labor, free enterprise is a system that protects and improves the national wage structure, thereby protecting the national purchasing power. American industry's best customer in post-war days will be the American people. What they can afford to buy will depend on whether they, as producers, are paid a really fair share for their services.

More than this, free enterprise in the future must conserve its assets, including its human assets. No responsible corporation fails to provide for upkeep and replacement of machines. But, generally speaking, few corporations make any provision for maintenance and depreciation costs of manpower.

What is politely termed "an efficiency expert," we of labor learned, is usually the fellow who could get the most work out of the personnel in the shortest time—and then escape paying for the damage.

That is not free enterprise. Our Nation cannot afford to waste its resources, human or material. Genuine free enterprise would adopt a conservation policy for both.

It is time for labor and business to get together and work out the ways and means of keeping our tremendous economic machinery working at full capacity in post-war days. We know that production power and purchasing power sustain and revitalize each other. We can gear our economic machine to balance these two powers.

It is a tough job, but it is a job that has to be done. And we of the American Federation of Labor stand ready to help.

When the war is won our millions of ex-servicemen and demobilized war workers will need employment. Then will come the real test for the free-enterprise system.

If the end of the war is followed by any extended period of mass unemployment, then free enterprise will have failed. American labor, as represented by the American Federation of Labor, is ready and willing to cooperate to the fullest extent with business and Government to the end that this does not happen. The same type of cooperation that has made America really the arsenal of democracy during these days of war can make America a citadel of better living in the days of peace.

Platform Issues—Articles by Wendell Willkie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, without being captious, I have scanned through the RECORD, but have not found that the articles of Mr. Willkie have been inserted by anyone in the Appendix of the RECORD. I think they should be inserted, and therefore I request unanimous consent that the article by Mr. Willkie appearing on the 14th of June and the one appearing on the 15th of June be included in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOCIAL SECURITY

(In the third article of his series about national issues confronting the platform drafters of the Republican Party, Wendell Willkie discusses social security. On the eve of the G. O. P. national convention in Chicago, Mr. Willkie was asked by a number of newspapers to express his views about what he considers the major issues of the coming Presidential campaign. His articles were made available for general distribution to the American press.)

A free economy, by its nature, entails a certain amount of fluctuation and risk. As a matter of fact, much of its strength and its very freedoms are directly related to its risks. But one cannot enjoy the freedoms of such a society without a minimum of economic security. Therefore the risks must be spread sufficiently to guarantee that all members of society are protected against the final economic disaster of going without the bare necessities of life. This is the function of the social insurances.

We have too often been led to regard the social insurances as the opposite rather than the supplement of our enterprise system. We have been presented with them as alternatives. Do you want security or initiative? Do you want protection or adventure?

This is a factitious issue. We need both. Indeed we cannot have one without the other. We cannot have security in terms of an advancing standard of living without enterprise. We cannot have the initiative and energy we need for an expanding economy without preserving and increasing the vigor of our human resources.

Our present social-security laws are inadequate for this purpose. The proposed Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill contains some of the essentials of an inclusive social-security program. But unfortunately it is in many respects poorly conceived and perpetuates the inequities of the present law. Taxes still fall most heavily upon the lowest-paid workers, while benefits are largest to the most highly paid. Coverage is still incomplete and eligibility rules are complicated.

Need knows no rules of eligibility or coverage. Protection against old age, illness, and economic misfortune must be a right for everyone. Benefits must be adequate to provide a minimum sustenance in health and decency, regardless of a man's previous earnings. This is important not alone to the individual, but to assure the relative stability of our consumer industries and agricultural production and well-being of our whole society.

Complete medical care should be available to all. But any plan adopted today should be sufficiently flexible to allow for experimentation and growth, and in any program of public medicine the value of the practicing physician's relationship to his patient must be recognized. Adequate provision must be made for building facilities where none now exist, for developing health and diagnostic centers, and for funds for research and medical education.

Another form of insurance that is of outstanding importance for the relatively stable functioning of our free economy is an adequate and uniform system of Federal unemployment insurance. Today we have 51 separate laws governing unemployment compensation. Our economy is too interdependent to allow this division of responsibility to continue. The present tax-collection machinery, Federal for some insurances, State for others, with duplication of records, is wasteful, costly and time consuming. And benefit rates vary widely and are inadequate.

The post-war reconversion strain will fall unevenly on the States. In this crucial period we shall need the stabilizing influence of uniform standards and procedures, and of adequate benefits fixed not according to former wages but on the basis of a regional cost of living, to cover bare necessities.

For a long time our society left the education of children to the individual parent's ability to pay. Then it made a decision which changed civilization. It decided that all children should be educated, regardless of their parents' income.

We are now faced with another decision as logical and as necessary, about which we must begin to think. We have left the feeding, clothing, shelter, and medical care of our children to be determined by their parents' income alone. It hasn't worked and can never work, for a man whose skills may permit him to earn only the minimum wage may have five or six children to rear on that wage. No wage or income based upon the value of the economic contribution of the individual can ever be made to take into proper consideration the needs of his dependents.

The children of America are the future of America. The principles of self-preservation, no less than those of humanity, demand that we place squarely on society the responsibility of making the citizens of tomorrow healthy, energetic, and educated. We should begin the moment the war is over to see that every child in America grows up with the basic necessities of education, good food, adequate clothing, medical care, and a decent home.

We, whose faith is in a freely competitive society, have the special obligation of seeing that all start fair, physically and mentally, as well equipped for the race as their natural endowment permits.

There is nothing new in providing men with minimum protection. When our society was predominantly agricultural Abraham Lincoln's homestead laws offered to the people of the United States what was then necessary protection—land and a change to build a home. Today when our society is predominantly industrial, the formulas must change. And all the resolutions for the preservation of the enterprise system will not do one fraction as much to preserve it as the assurance to men and women of the protections which they are rightfully demanding, protections which are basic to their time.

The Republican Party should see to it that they get them.

POST-WAR ECONOMY

IV

The American people believe in a life of enterprise and expansion by individual initiative. But all the talk of a return to free enterprise and private initiative is merely an expression of feeling; not a solution of problems. We are not going to return to anything. We must never go backward. We must press on—on to the days of demobilization and the complex economic problems they will bring.

The profound nature of the changes we must face is evident in the trend of affairs in Europe, Russia, with whom we are destined to have progressively closer economic relations, is a completely state-controlled economy. The aftermath of war will see a tremendous rise in western Europe of state ownership of resources and industries, what we call state socialism. The problem is well illustrated in the question of what is to become of the big industries of France, which the Germans have taken from their former private owners. It is likely that a large portion of this French production will become state-owned.

The trend in Great Britain is becoming increasingly clear. Lord Woolton has just rendered an official report for the British Conservative Party which would take Great Britain far along the path of government control of industry.

The plain facts are that Europe and Great Britain are moving as they are in economic thinking because of an insistent demand on the part of those millions of men who labor but do not direct. They demand that they shall be protected against the hazards and unpredictable destruction of human values involved in the violent fluctuations of modern industrial life.

We are facing the same situation here in the United States. And the full employment which has been created by war will make the demand for protection against post-war unemployment increasingly insistent. Already, looking to the future, men are asking: Must we have war to have jobs?

There is no doubt that the pressure of State-controlled economies in all of the countries with which we must trade and live will in multiple, intricate, and subtle ways inevitably affect our own society. But because of our youth as a nation, our great geographical area, our natural resources, together with the enormous potency of our belief in the possibilities of the individual, our answer to the problems of demobilization will not be the complete controls of Russia or even the elaborate controls suggested for Great Britain. Despite the pressure from without and the demands from within, we have an opportunity for a different answer. But only if we recognize the basic causes of unemployment and act with boldness and imagination to overcome them.

Industry, labor, and government—local, State, Federal—should set up a cooperative mechanism which will act as a clearing house for information and constructive programs. Through such a mechanism capital goods expenditures, such as the building of roads, public works, industrial plants, so important a factor in the wide fluctuations of our economic cycle, can be spread and leveled over the years. Plant location and appropriate housing can be rationalized to the end that congestion and distortion in our economic system may be prevented.

But we must be realistic enough to acknowledge that the best efforts of private industry, even supplemented by such intelligent cooperation will not always be enough. In addition the Federal Government must exercise a countercyclical influence against depression in order to preserve a reasonably high level of employment.

Some of the obviously necessary measures to this end are: Direction of the capital market to encourage a flow of new capital when depression threatens and to discourage it in the face of a boom; the undertaking of legitimate Government projects at Government expense, but by private contract, the moment depression sets in, projects, for instance, that will improve the health and welfare of the people, create new markets, new purchasing power; broad social insurances which will both protect the individual and help to stabilize consumer industries and agriculture.

But our basic answer to the problems of a demobilization economy, and one for which we are peculiarly fitted by temperament and natural circumstances, lies in our great productive ability. Our industry has performed a miracle of production in the goods of war. It waits eagerly to perform the same miracle in the goods of peace. The new automobiles, the new houses, new planes, new plastics, television, new uses for farm corps, new discoveries born of war research, all clamor to be developed. And the markets of the world will be waiting for them—that is if we do our full part to help stabilize the world.

If our industry, however, is to develop its possibilities of post-war production to the best advantage of all, it must have certain releases and certain safeguards. Capital is necessary—risk capital that is ready to take a chance on the future. Because we have failed while we fight to pay for the war to the full extent of our abilitiy through an adequate tax program, it is going to be impossible to have any early general reduction of taxes when the war is over. But there should be a drastic revision of the tax laws to encourage risk capital for new investment and new ventures.

Also, in order that industry may function venturesomely, new and effective methods must be found for counteracting and controlling the tendency toward monopoly and monopolistic prices. They are the Trojan horse of the free enterprise system and in essence a protective device by men and industries who want to escape the hazards and penalties which are the counterpart of the opportunities the system offers.

Under such releases, under such safeguards, our genius for production will go a long way toward solving the problems of a demobilization economy. There will be employment; there will be good wages; there will be goods to buy. There will be better living for all.

Add to this Government's part in the picture and the sincere cooperation of industry, labor, and Government to distribute the strains, and you have the American answer to the problem of a demobilization economy.

The Republican Party cannot meet the need of the post-war period by merely passing resolutions in favor of "free enterprise." It must realize the inevitability and the justness of the people's demand for both protection and opportunity, and it must find the answers, answers which exist uniquely within a responsible enterprise system.

Congressional Power To Void Poll Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from Mr. Irving Brant, constitutional historian, to the New York Times. The letter demonstrates the impracticability of a constitutional amendment, but reinforces the constitutional basis for an act of Congress voiding the poll tax.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO AMENDMENT NEEDED—CONGRESS HELD TO POSSESS POWER TO VOID POLL TAX

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Your belief, expressed editorially, that the poll tax can easily be eliminated from Federal elections by a constitutional amendment, seems to me overoptimistic and based on needless uncertainty as to the power of Congress.

To act by legislation it is necessary to defeat the Senate filibuster by a two-thirds vote to limit debate and then pass the bill by a simple majority.

To act by constitutional amendment it is necessary to defeat a Senate filibuster by a two-thirds vote to limit debate, then obtain a two-thirds majority in both houses of Congress, and after that secure ratification by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

A filibuster against an amendment is just as certain as against a bill and as certain to succeed unless stopped by the same weapon—cloture. Aside from the red herring of unconstitutionality, every argument advanced against cloture during the poll-tax debate, and still more the secret reasons operating against it would be just as potent to prevent limitation of debate on a constitutional amendment. Republican Senators who sabotaged the anti-poll-tax bill by voting against cloture, and then made a bid for support of the anti-poll-tax people by offering a constitutional amendment, would have the same reason to sabotage the amendment by failing to end a filibuster against it—the partisan advantage of seeing northern and southern Democrats arrayed against each other and the latter rousing several million voters to anger by their conduct.

AN EXAMPLE CITED

Suppose it should be submitted. Before we assume that ratification of so salutary an amendment is certain, let us remember what happened to the child-labor amendment, doomed by a false invocation of religious prejudice. The theory that all except the eight poll-tax States would promptly ratify the amendment takes no account of the fictitious scare already raised in New Mexico and other States about the possible effect upon Indians not taxed, nor of the historic hostility of Vermont to all Federal controls, nor of the vested interest which Republican States have in prolonging a cause of turmoil in the Democratic Party, to say nothing of perpetuating a Southern Democratic appendage to the Republican Party in Congress.

But why an amendment? Why amend the Constitution to give Congress power which it almost certainly possesses now? Surely when such authorities on constitutional law as Professors Hamilton, Borchard, and McDougall of the Yale Law School; Dean Garrison of the University of Wisconsin Law School; Dean Katz of the Chicago University Law School; Dean Greene of Northwestern and Dean Wettach of North Carolina, all agree that the anti-poll-tax bill is constitutional, there need be little hesitancy in letting the Supreme Court decide whether it is or not.

ANTIS OBFUSCATED

I have followed the debate on the constitutionality of the anti-poll-tax bill rather closely, and was myself a witness on the subject before the Senate Judiciary Committee, chiefly on historical phases. It appears to me that the arguments of the antis in Congress have been largely obfuscation, while on the radio they have consisted of unfounded dogmatic assertions. But the defenders of its constitutionality have been no less at fault in failing to put their case clearly and understandingly before the public.

I would not ask for the space needed to cover this issue, with all its ramifications into the relationship of republican government to majority government, the power of the National Government to preserve itself from debauched elections, and the rights of citizens. Little space is needed, however, to clarify one important aspect of it—the indicated attitude of the Supreme Court.

The statement has been made over and over that the Supreme Court has denied the power of Congress to outlaw the poll-tax restriction. That is not true. The court in two cases (Breedlove v. Suttles, and, by refusing certiorari, Pirtle v. Brown) has declined to strike down the poll tax by judicial edict, without an act of Congress. It has never denied the power of Congress to do so.

CONGPESS POWER UPHELD

On the contrary, it has strongly and very recently suggested that Congress has this power—the Court's attitude in that regard representing a return to the general trend of decisions following the Civil War, affirming Federal power, after a movement in the contrary direction beginning with the Newberry case in 1921.

This suggestion of congressional power to deal with the poll tax is found in the 1941 case of United States v. Classic, a Louisiana election fraud case not involving the poll tax, but involving the clauses of the Constitution pertinent to it.

Writing the Court's opinion in that case, Chief Justice Stone warned against loose statements concerning the right to vote which he said were to be found in the Breedlove case, Minor v. Happersett, United States v. Reese, and McPherson v. Blacker—the four cases chiefly relied on by the anti-poll-tax forces. He then went on to knock out their whole position by saying that the power of the States under article I, section 2, could be restricted by the power of Congress under section 4 and other clauses. I quote the words of the Chief Justice:

"While in a loose sense the right to vote for Representative in Congress is sometimes spoken of as a right derived from the States, see Minor v. Happersett (21 Wall. 162, 170); United States v. Reese (92 U. S. 214, 217–8); McPherson v. Blacker (146 U. S. 1, 38–39); Breedlove v. Sutties (302 U. S. 277, 283), this statement is true only in the sense that the States are authorized by the Constitution to legislate on the subject as provided by section 2 of article I, to the extent that Congress has not restricted State action by the exercise of its powers to regulate elections under section 4 and its more general power under article I, section 8, clause 18 of the Constitution, 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.'"

Accept the plain meaning of those words, and the argument that the anti-poll-tax bill is unconstitutional vanishes into thin air. That argument is based entirely on the supposition that section 2 is not limited by section 4 or other clauses, but stands by itself, unaffected by the general power of Congress over elections. The Supreme Court has declared to the contrary.

How is that statement by the Supreme Court answered by those who continue to claim that Congress has no such power? They say that the Chief Justice did not know what he was saying. The usual remark, made by the poll-tax minority of the Judiciary Committee, is that his language was "unfortunate." One Senator told me he had heard that word a dozen times in executive session. It is based on an attempt by the chief anti-poll-tax witness, Attorney General Staples of Virginia, to prove that the Chief Justice did not intend to say what he said.

Quoting the words I have cited from the Classic case, the Virginia attorney general testified (p. 367 of the 1942 hearings): "In using the language italicized, it is obvious that the Chief Justice was not being precise." He then stated that section 4 of article I allows the States to make election regulations which, under the same section, can be altered by Congress.

ARGUMENT CALLED EXTRAORDINARY

He concluded that Chief Justice Stone did not intend to say that section 2 could be restricted by section 4, but that the State powers in section 4 could be restricted by the Federal powers in section 4. This must be the meaning, he said, because the four cases cited by the Chief Justice to support his statement did not refer to section 2, but to section 4.

This is certainly one of the most extraordinary arguments for the unconstitutionality of a bill that has ever been offered to Congress—the argument that the Chief Justice of the United States did not know what he was saying when he wrote one of his most important opinions.

But it is less extraordinary than the evidence offered to support the charge. For in presenting the quotation from the Classic case, Attorney General Staples omitted the four cases cited by Justice Stone in the middle of the sentence—omitted them without even an asterisk—and used instead four other cases (ex parte Yarbrough and others) which followed the quotation. The four cases thus omitted—the four the Chief Justice was talking about—all bore on section 2, not on section 4.

It is by such methods that the fiction has been built up that Congress has no power to legislate on the subject of the poll.

Timid Planning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Timid Planning Can Botch the Job," from the Chicago Sun of May 24, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TIMID PLANNING CAN BOTCH THE JOB

It is time for America to recognize that the job of post-war planning is being botched. In our preoccupation with the coming invasion we cannot forget that this military action, when it comes, will have behind it months of intricate planning. No less important is it to plan now for the shift from war to peace that will begin when Hitler has been conquered.

Ninety days after the Baruch report, and months after agreement had been reached on the necessity for speedy winding up of war contracts, the Senate has just passed a bill establishing procedures for that purpose. The bill is vital. It should have been passed long ago. But it deals with only one segment of the problem: At this rate, how long will it be before the country has a complete program for avoiding post-war depression and making full employment possible?

We are botching the job. Congress is botching it and the administration is botching it. Ever since reaction triumphantly killed off the National Resources Planning Board, we have lacked a dynamic agency devoting full time to over-all economic planning. By default the planning function has devolved upon James F. Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization, and Bernard Baruch for the administration; and upon various congressional committees.

The common denominator of these planners is their conservatism. In general, they are men whose bias runs against the kind of bold and unprecedented action that we need. Bewitched by the ancient and discredited trickledown theory of prosperity, their inclination is to aid industrial reconversion through contract termination, loans, etc., and to think that the job is done.

Nothing could be further from the truth. We need not only planning for business, but planning for the people. The post-war job is twofold: First, to bridge the gap in the flow of purchasing power during the transition period; second, to maintain that flow at full flood thereafter. Timid and piecemeal efforts cannot succeed. The situation demands a strong planning agency to establish goals of employment, production and national income, and to advise Congress and the administration on the steps necessary to attain them.

We cannot put 15,000,000 men to work solely by giving business the green light. The industrial machine must have gas in the tank and oil in the crankcase. It is Government's responsibility to see that it runs on all cylinders in peacetime as in war.

Congress Should Receive Airport Survey Information — Development Program Advocated in H. R. 5024

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced H. R. 5024, which proposes to provide for Federal aid to States and public bodies in the development of public airports. The bill authorizes annual appropriations to be apportioned to the States on the basis of population, registered aircraft, and area. The bill authorizes an appropriation of $100,000,000 for 10 consecutive years. It has for its objectives the development of an adequate national system of public airports to serve aviation in the United States. In addition, it provides for the disposal of surplus war airport properties, so that such airports will be available for use in civil aviation in the post-war period.

The grants of funds would be made to the States on the basis of a formula of the allocation of such funds, and moneys would be matched by the States. The actual construction work will be accomplished through the State construction services under its direction and jurisdiction. Projects selected for development under this program will be in accordance with the national airport development plan.

It is necessary for Congress now to formulate a workable plan for the fullest development of facilities for the operation of aircraft. It is certain that we shall have an unprecedented growth in all types of air travel, especially in the field of private flying. A coordinated program, embracing upwards of 10,000 airports of varying size and utility, will be vital in keeping America the No. 1 transportation nation of the world.

The measure which I have proposed can properly be a pattern from which Congress can direct its study. There may be changes, or improvements, which can be written into legislation before it becomes law.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention also to the necessity for an airport survey to be completed for the United States, with a report of the findings made to the Congress. I have been deeply interested in legislation to effect such a result, and on May 10, 1943, I introduced the first measure for this purpose. My bill, H. R. 4250, reintroduced February 23, 1944, is before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and I am pleased to know that the Secretary of Commerce and the Civil Aeronautics Administration favor its passage. It is my hope that the committee will bring to the House legislation for a survey of the need for a system of airports, and I trust this may be accomplished before the anticipated recess or adjournment next week.

New Tricks for an Old Dog

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL K. HOCH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by James Morgan, from the Boston Sunday Globe of June 4, 1944:

NEW TRICKS FOR AN OLD DOG—REPUBLICANS WILL DECIDE AT THE CHICAGO CONVENTION IN 3 WEEKS WHETHER THEIR PARTY CAN RENEW ITS BOLD YOUTH AND FACE FORWARD OR WILL INSIST ON GOING BACK TO THE "GOOD OLD TIMES"

(By James Morgan)

On the guess that the question of who will be the Republican nominee for President is foreclosed except for the last-minute rush to the Dewey band wagon, there is a brave effort to relieve the monotony by starting a fight for the second place on the ticket. But the customers are not interested. They know full well that a contest for the minor title cannot be magnified into a major bout.

Be reassured that this article is not about the Vice Presidency. Rather it is a warning against our being switched off from the main line onto that sidetrack. If Governor Dewey is to be nominated, and the time for stopping him grows short, the nomination for Vice President will make no difference in the campaign or election. By the record, the odds are 33 to 6 that it will make no difference afterward. The real fight at Chicago 3 weeks hence will not come over the Governor's running mate. It will come, if both sides really mean business, over the platform on which he shall run.

The nationalists, as the pre-Pearl Harbor isolationists have rechristened themselves, will seek solace for their disappointment in Governor Dewey by thrusting under him a foreign policy plank that will throw a monkey wrench into the internationalism he has lately espoused, or by slipping into the plank a few of what Theodore Roosevelt called weasel words. By infiltrating the Committee on Resolutions and the delegations, they will bore from within to undermine the position the Governor took in his New York speech in April, which nipped in the bud their premature ardor for him as a man after their own heart.

G. O. P.'S ECONOMIC AND POLITICAL NATIONALISM

Without a violent convulsion, the Republican Party cannot unequivocally endorse the views Governor Dewey lately has been expressing. It has been the party of conservatism ever since the Civil War disposed of the radical free soil issue that gave it birth. Naturally, the conservative in this country, as in England, is a nationalist, like Mr. Churchill, for instance. Republicans did not oppose the League of Nations because it was sponsored by the Democratic Woodrow Wilson, although that contributed a partisan bitterness to their opposition. Instinctively, they were against it as a challenge to nationalism.

The Republican policy of tariff protection is the economic expression of political nationalism. Following the defeat of the League in 1920, the party all but closed the gate on foreign immigrants, and twice in 10 years it raised higher the walls against foreign imports.

The Smoot-Hawley tariff of 1930 set an example which was quickly adopted by other nations. The next year England definitely abandoned free trade, and Canada enacted a higher tariff. The British Empire in its Ottawa agreement of 1932 established an imperial preferential tariff. The strangulation of international trade was nearly complete when the least self-sufficing big nations—Japan, Germany, and Italy—took up arms in a war to wipe out national frontiers and create a new order in Europe and a coprosperity sphere in Asia.

TRYING TO TEACH AN OLD DOG NEW TRICKS

To take an affirmative stand on the overshadowing question of 1944, the Republican Party would have to break with its past as radically as it broke with its antecedent Whiggery, Federalism, and conservatism in 1854, when it was born to challenge the further spread of slavery. For 60 of those 90 years of the party's existence, a struggle has gone on unavailingly to moderate the isolationism of its trade or tariff policy.

Mr. Willkie is the latest leader to attempt a modernization of the party, with results that are fresh in the public memory.

Blaine was the first of the Republicans to raise the banner of reciprocity, and in his table-pounding denunciation of the McKinley bill in a committee room of Congress his plug hat suffered a historic blow from his fist. In due course McKinley himself attempted to call a halt, and in his last speech, the day before he was shot, he said that the time had come for a readjustment of the tariff that would modify our exclusion of certain foreign products from our home market in exchange for the opening of foreign markets to American products. President Taft next sought in vain to turn the party in that direction. Speaking on Lincoln's birthday last year in Lincoln's home town of Springfield, the late Frank Knox asked, "Have we not learned that there can be no enduring political security (from war) without economic cooperation, that trade barriers and economic nationalism spread poverty, not prosperity, that we cannot maintain our standard of living in a world of want?"

The price of international cooperation for peace is international cooperation in commerce. That does not mean free trade. It means no more and no less than the reciprocal removal or lowering of unnecessary barriers and an end to discriminatory tariffs and restrictions that favor some nations at the cost of others. Still far off would be the goal set by Mr. Henry Ford in his recent remark that "The world ought to have a universal currency for a universal economy, with a universal market." But obviously, nations cannot really unite against armed warfare while waging trade wars against one another and leaving the devil to take the hindmost.

EASTPORT FISH, AROOSTOOK POTATOES

Two of our Republican Governors here in New England see the question that imperatively confronts their party. At the Lincoln birthday dinner in Boston of the Middlesex Club last winter, Governor Baldwin, of Connecticut, gave up as dead as a door nail what he said had been the party's greatest issue for many years, the protective tariff. But the Governor lamented that the far-reaching and progressive pronouncements adopted by the Republican conference at Mackinac Island in September seem to have been lost somewhere. Impliedly they were lost by Republicans who still sigh for the good old days, which Mr. Baldwin warned would not return. The party, he insisted must put forth now a program of sound liberalism.

In a New York speech lately, Governor Sewall, of Maine, confessed that the applause which greeted him when he came home from the Mackinac conference quieted down as his constituents got to thinking about lowering tariff barriers on the fish of Eastport and the seed potatoes of Aroostook. This admonished the Governor that it is going to be harder to win the peace than to win the war, and that in the process many politicians are going to risk their necks unless they sell their beliefs to the grass-roots folks. Notwithstanding this international venture is going to be fraught with danger and we may have to do some blind flying, Mr. Sewall's watchwords were "Let's get going."

WILL G. O. P. WALK BACKWARD OR FORWARD?

The need of the hour is for an opposition that will not merely negative whatever the foreign policy of the Roosevelt administration may be, thereby confusing the country with a partisanship full of sound and fury, signifying nothing. Mr. Baruch, our elder statesman, tells us that "when the war is over, no country will be able to improve the well-being of its people without our help," and that we can make the future "what we will it to be."

We can obtain an expression of that will, which the world will heed, if we have an opposition that will champion an affirmative policy. Such a challenge to the administration would force the problem of post-war settlements out of the secret conclaves of diplomacy and bring it into the forum of a Nation-wide debate this summer. That would give an informed public opinion the opportunity to decide the issue and put its mighty power behind the decision.

To do that timely and great service for the country, the Republican Party would have to be reoriented and turned toward the direction in which it started 90 years ago. That would take a stand-up fight at the Chicago convention. * * * and not over the Vice Presidency. Let us keep our eye on that ball and not permit the thimble riggers to distract us from it, or the compromisers fool us with a line of double talk.

"I walk slowly," said Lincoln, "but I never walk backward." Shall his one-time party walk backward in this gravest crisis since its tragic period? If it should, it will not get far, even though its time-servers rode back into power on another Harding landslide of reaction to normalcy.

Address by Hon. Homer Cummings Before Connecticut State Democratic Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address delivered by former United States Attorney General Homer S. Cummings at the Democratic State convention held at New Haven, Conn., on May 26, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Chairman Dowe, Senator TRUMAN, ladies, and gentlemen of the convention, I assume with gratitude and, indeed, with pleasure the not unfamiliar task of presiding over a Democratic convention. Never, in the long years of my political activity, have I felt a deeper sense of pride in the achievements of our party than at the present moment. Its long record of devotion to the public interest I shall not pause to review. History will devote many glorious pages to that stirring story.

It is enough to say that I am willing to match the Democratic record under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt, with the Republican record during the incumbency of Warren Harding, Calvin Coolidge, and Herbert Hoover—and abide the result.

But now we are confronted by immediate things that cut to the very heart of our life and living. All too long we, as a people, refused to read the handwriting on the wall.

Hitler achieved full power in Germany almost precisely on the day that Franklin D. Roosevelt entered the White House. From that moment these men have been relentless enemies. Their natures were as wide apart as the poles and they represented systems of Government predestined to clash.

During my tenure of office as Attorney General I had occasion to appraise, at first hand, the persistent efforts made by our President, through diplomatic channels and otherwise, to avert the tragedy that ultimately engulfed the world. No one more clearly than Roosevelt grasped the significance of the events that were being put in motion by the psychopaths and criminals of Berlin and Tokyo who had set out to destroy free government and enslave mankind.

No one more often or more earnestly warned the people of the dangers that beset them or took timelier action to prepare for the ghastly drama that was about to be enacted.

In this program he was constantly hampered by the unthinking and the unwise. He was called a warmonger and an alarmist and was charged with seeking to establish a dictatorship.

He took his political life in his hands when, on the eve of election, he made his declaration for conscription of our sons for military training when war seemed to the average person neither imminent nor threatening.

He constantly struggled against that torpid indifference which had brought us to the verge of disaster.

Patiently he built up the good-neighbor policy which has brought rich dividends in our hour of trial.

The Lend-Lease Act was his brain child and was signed when Great Britain stood alone against a triumphant Germany.

The smaller countries had been swallowed up and France lay helpless at the feet of Hitler.

The Lend-Lease Act was a master stroke of statesmanship. Had Germany crushed Great Britain and completed its mastery of Europe we would inevitably have felt the bite of war here on our own soil.

But Britain held on grimly—and we got ready. We let England have the materials of war. How well I remember the outcry in September 1940 when the 50 destroyers were transferred to Great Britain in exchange for 99-year leases on naval and aircraft bases. But Roosevelt was right. He was engaged in the mighty business of saving America.

It was not until Pearl Harbor that our people became fully aware of the true nature of the world struggle and realized that the days of doubt and debate were over at last.

A vast army was built up. Our Navy is now the largest and most powerful in the history of the world. Our factories were keyed to war production and our Government supplied the funds for new factories. Arms, planes, ships, tanks, munitions, supplies of all kinds, food, clothing, medical equipment, training schools, hospitals—all these things came into being as if my magic.

Never in the history of war have the men who actually wage it been better looked after, better supplied, better officered, better fed, or better led. Someone—someone—someone—has been doing a superb over-all job, that America will be proud of as long as there is a grateful heart to remember. Could it by any possibility be Roosevelt? I leave your own hearts to answer. How stirring have been the events since the mind of America was awakened and the soul of America was on the march. Casablanca, the meetings of Roosevelt, Churchill, Stalin, and Chiang Kai-shek; the growing unity among the Allies and the steady push from El Alamein to Cassino. We have driven the enemy back 2,000 miles—from the shadows of the Pyramids, across the desert, across the sea, across Sicily to the heart of Italy. The great paws of the Russian bear are clawing at the backs of the retreating Germans and the monster of all time has been caught in a vise which is squeezing out his life. On the other side of the world the Jap is upon the run everywhere we get in touch with him.

Yes; the war is going well. The soldiers and the sailors and the men of the air are doing their part and will continue to do so through the greatest ordeal that man may know. Are we, safe here at home under untroubled skies, doing our part to support the armed forces and our chosen leaders? Are we striving to secure and promote the unity of our people? Yes and no. There are millions who are doing their duty to the utmost; but there are all too many who seek to breed discord at home and create enmity and distrust amongst our allies.

I hear men bitterly and with intense emotion complaining about taxes, gas and food rationing, price control, priorities, the inconvenience of railroad travel, and other minor discomforts and petty annoyances when, as a matter of fact, we are the most secure, the best fed, the best clothed, and the most comfortable people on earth. I see those who wish to profit unfairly from war conditions. I see those who wish to capitalize discontent and racial prejudice. I see those who never in their hearts wanted to win the war.

This, I say, is not the America I love. There is a greater and better America, fitted for high adventure, endowed with great courage, and moved by the finer things of the spirit.

That is the America that must finish the war we are in and make certain of enduring peace.

We must highly resolve that never again shall a Hitler or a Hirohito "get the start of the majestic world" or have the power to force our youth to risk their lives and torture their bodies in the ghastly business of war in order that liberty may not perish from the earth.

The difficulties, of course, are enormous. The danger lies in a loss of faith or the sheer lassitude following victory or the bedevilments of politics or a thousand disorganizing factors that tend to destroy the inner unity of our people.

After the present conflict comes to an end, we shall secure international peace, supported without flinching by all free, peace-loving people—or we shall revert to chaos and, after a period of drifting, slip once more into the abyss.

A third world war is both unthinkable and possible, and that is not a contradiction of terms.

Nor can we have settled peace, based upon the principles of freedom and good faith, unless we prepare for it, think about it, work for it, get ready for it, struggle for it and, as a united Nation, demand it.

We here in America must take no chances with this serious business.

This is no time for amateurs.

Who is to represent us at the peace table? Churchill will be there and Stalin and Chiang Kai-shek—all strong, skillful, and able. Who will be the fourth? It would be madness for our Nation to choose any man except the one most fully qualified.

He should possess intimate knowledge of world affairs; he should have the respect of world opinion; he should know personally the leading statesmen and diplomats of the principal countries; he should possess high qualities of courage; he should know America and what is due to America; he should have wide experience in public life; he should have the power to persuade; he should possess wisdom and infinite patience, and he should be a lover of peace and justice and humanity.

Who shall fill the fourth place, or perhaps I better say, the first place at the international council table? I know your answer. The same answer comes from the hearts of a vast majority of the people of our country.

We do not ask Roosevelt to accept a renomination on his own account, or on our account, or on account of our party. We do not ask it for any ulterior purpose whatsoever. We ask it because of the desperate needs of the hour which override all lesser considerations.

Two Junes—1940, 1944

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by James Morgan, from the Boston Sunday Globe of June 11, 1944:

TWO JUNES, 1940–1944—ALTHOUGH 4 YEARS HAVE SEEN THE TURNING OF THE TIDE OF WAR, WE ARE ONLY BEGINNING, WITH THE OPENING OF A WESTERN FRONT, THE MOST DIFFICULT OPERATION IN THE RECORD OF WARFARE

(By James Morgan)

Shall we take our bearings today from two Junes 4 years apart and survey the change that has taken place in the tide of war? At the opening of this month in 1940, a routed British Army of more than 335,000 men had just made a headlong flight across the Channel from Dunkirk, leaving behind them nearly all the military equipment their country possessed. The heaviest weapon remaining to the United Kingdom was the voice of Prime Minister Winston Churchill. But his was the voice of 45,000,000 free people. Their one stronghold was in their bare but indomitable breasts when he spoke their determination to carry on the fight from beyond the seas, if their island should be subjugated, and "until in God's good time the new world, with all its power and might, sets forth to the liberation and rescue of the old." Two days after the fourth anniversary of Mr. Churchill's prophecy of the event, the Channel was recrossed, at last, by the navies and armies and airfleets of two worlds under the supreme command of the American General Eisenhower.

BACKDROP OF THE NORMANDY STAGE

History is repeating in reverse a Channel crossing almost nine centuries ago. From the same gentle Normandy coast, whose long beaches the Allies seized last Tuesday, William the Conqueror sailed forth. Near the point of his embarkation, in the village of Dives, is one of the quaintest of inns, bearing his name, and once upon a time its landlord told me that the fire on its great kitchen hearth was kindled before the Conqueror sailed.

On that peninsula, also, our own troops are at a scene where American history was made long before they themselves began making it. The decisive naval engagement of our Civil War was fought off the port of Cherbourg 80 years ago this June when the U. S. S. Kearsarge sank the Confederate raider Alabama. After the Allied forces shall have taken Cherbourg, some of our boys out for a stroll may chance upon the little cemetery on a hill where some of the dead of the Kearsarge lie buried.

Here is a footnote: The last cannon shot from the sinking Alabama was fired by a great-uncle of Mrs. Roosevelt, Irvine Stephens Bullock, of Georgia, brother of the mother of President Theodore Roosevelt.

A FLASH BACK

Already, 48 hours before the delivery of Europe from its long nightmare had begun in the north, Rome had been delivered. Her deliverance befell 4 years, lacking a week, from the June day when, in the words of President Roosevelt, the dagger of Italy was stuck into the back of a neighbor. The announcement of that declaration of war on France was made by Count Ciano who, in the unfolding of the tragedy, was to desert the sinking ship of his father-in-law and to crumple before a firing squad by the command of Germany. The King-Emperor, Victor Emmanuel III, in whose name and by whose authority Ciano spoke, was to see his empire swept away, and he, in turn, was to leap from the pirate craft in an ignominious effort to save his kingdom.

Ciano's father-in-law himself is now but a pale shade, "so abject, yet alive," as Byron exclaimed over a truly great man, the fallen Napoleon. I, for one, hope the Allies will have the good sense to restrain their natural impulse to overturn the lofty column on which Mussolini carved his name in the forum which this pinchbeck Caesar erected by the Tiber. Let it be a spared monument to stand as a warning to the Italian people against surrendering to another demogogic adventurer the liberties which their valiant ancestors won in the glorious Risorgemento.

AVE ROMA IMMORTALIS

In the swift movement of great events, no time was left us to mark the significance of the freeing of Rome only a week ago today. We may be sure that the city was not spared by its latest barbarian invader out of what the Declaration of Independence termed "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind." Hitler lost Rome in the battles before its gates, where his generals were so outmaneuvered and outfought that his battered armies had no time to lose in fleeing the first Axis capital to fall.

That was one of the best political breaks the Allies have had. For months the allied peoples had watched with dread the tide of this most devastating warfare as it rolled toward the Eternal City, and any share of theirs in its destruction would have weighed heavily on their spirits. When the news flashed through the Sunday air that American and Canadian soldiers had arrived at the Forum virtually unopposed, a wave of infinite relief swept over the Western World. Ave Roma immortalis.

Berlin is only German, as Moscow is Russian and New York American. If London is more than British, she yet belongs only to the English-speaking peoples. Although Paris no longer is the place where all good Americans hope to go when they die, as a Boston wit said in the glittering days of the second empire, and her gayety has become a commercial synthetic, she remains the favorite international playground.

Few are the truly great cities. One is the greatest among them, as she has been through most of the 27 centuries since her shepherds began to expand their sheepfold from the Seven Hills until their flocks were the peoples of many lands. Our civilization still turns in homage to the source from which it received law, government, and church, and hails, "O Rome, my country, city of my soul!"

June 4 years ago the beasts of the Apocalypse were loose, taking peace from the earth and riding forth conquering and to conquer while they trampled nations under their hooves. It was the English Channel that saved the world, Hitler not daring to cross it in pursuit of the unweaponed British Army fleeing from Dunkerque. With unconquered Britain at his back, and back of her the overwhelming production of America flowing across the Atlantic on lend-lease, he committed the mad folly of attacking Russia 3 years ago this June.

Russia broke the evil spell of the superstition that the Prussian Army was as invincible as it boasted itself. It has not been able to win and hold an objective since the capture of the island of Crete in May 1941. Its every subsequent campaign has failed of its goal. What prestige remains to German generalship is from its skill in getting out of traps and running away. Germany's most renowned field marshal is the world's champion long-distance runner. Generals who know their business keep out of traps, and no army, even though it be led by Rommel, can retreat to victory.

In a moment of weakness, the Nazis stooped to conquer France by the seduction of her faint-hearted and black-hearted, like the aged, bewildered Petain, on the one hand, and the cold-blooded Laval on the other hand. For the collaboration of Vichy, Hitler paid the ruinous price of leaving unoccupied the southern half of the country and also the empire. This was to lose him the great French Fleet at Toulon, which was sunk as, too late, he reached out to take it. Worse still for him, French North Africa was delivered to the Allies for a base from which they freed the Mediterranean and invaded Italy.

A HARD CAMPAIGN ONLY BEGUN

While German military commanders have shown an unexpected lack of imagination and resourcefulness, and their political boss has proved to be more fatuous than we dared to expect, German soldiers are not yet the quitters we expected them to become. Their Nazi fanaticism has changed them from the hands-up, kamerad, kamerad chaps, who surrendered in herds when they found the other war going against them. Their leaders, moreover, in fear of the penalty for their crimes, have reason to be more desperate than the Kaiser's generals were, and they are goading their troops to desperation. The latest evidence of this was the threat of death which the high command made last week for mere infractions of discipline or a sign of cowardice in the ranks.

For whatever reason, the German Army, in its long succession of retreats from lost battles, and the German civilian population, under a rain of fire from the sky, have surprised us with their capacity for taking what has been coming to them. We are about to confront an enemy who, by all appearances thus far, is still tough after three years of rough going in a war he long ago lost the hope of winning.

Our home front must brace itself for some grim news from the battlefront which we are only struggling to establish while we yet have but a foothold on the shores of France. Separated by the most unruly of seas from its bases of supply and reinforcements, and with a great port adequate for receiving and handling them still to be captured, the most difficult campaign in the history of warfare has begun well, but it has no more than begun when this is written.

Veterinarians and Lay Inspectors in the Bureau of Animal Industry

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I shall not at this time dwell at great length on the amendment to the Agriculture appropriation bill providing for the upgrading of veterinarians and lay inspectors in the Bureau of Animal Industry. There are, however, a few evident misconceptions about this proposal which I should like to clear up.

In the first place, the provision does not call for increases in salaries—it calls for a just and proper classification of veterinarians and lay assistants in this Federal agency. The Budget Bureau has already approved this reclassification and has requested the additional funds necessary to make the reclassification. The Civil Service Commission has recognized the training of veterinarians and their lay assistants for inspection service in controlling animal diseases and providing healthful meat and meat products for the people of this country. Congress has provided the Classification Act to take care of this group of employees along with others under civil service. But unfairly and unjustly the personnel of the Bureau of Animal Industry and the Meat Inspection Service have not received their proper classification because no appropriation to take care of it has been made. This amendment merely implements action already taken and makes it possible to carry out the reclassification which has already been approved.

In the second place, this unfair treatment of these employees has resulted in a loss of personnel in the Meat Inspection Service at a time when our national health and welfare is making increased demands on the Service. Men have left the Bureau and it has not been possible to recruit new employees at a time when the health of the Nation is dependent upon an efficient Bureau. More millions of food animals are being slaughtered today than ever before in our history. The Army, the Navy, and Federal purchasing agencies are demanding more and more meat. And yet, in the face of such increased demands for the services of these employees, we find that their ranks are being decimated because such employees are not receiving salaries commensurate with the training and ability necessary.

or equal to the salaries and opportunities for advancement to other professional groups in the Federal service. In the third place, 90 percent of the doctors of veterinary medicine now employed in the Bureau are in grade 1, from $2,000 to $2,600, and grade 2, from $2,600 to $3,200. Surely that is not adequate compensation for men who have studied for 5 or 6 years and spent several thousand dollars on their education, and who are engaged in exacting and difficult tasks which require abilities of the highest type. And many of these men in these low classifications have been there for years with no opportunities for advancement. Educational requirements for veterinarians have continued to rise, but there is certainly no inducement for good veterinarians to make civil service in this important agency their life work.

I should like to add that we are speaking now of a Government agency doing work which is vital to the health of the Nation, and I earnestly urge the Members of this House to approve this amendment which means so much to the efficient functioning of an agency charged with controlling disease and inspecting our food.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, just what Americans hope to gain by the incidents commented upon in an editorial from a Philadelphia paper is difficult to understand.

Do not the people know that the repetition of incidents such as those disclosed below but make it more probable that our fighting men, when captured, will be treated with greater cruelty?

STOP THIS SOUVENIR TRADE IN HUMAN BODIES

A few weeks ago ago many Americans were shocked to find in a national magazine a picture of a young woman with the skull of a Japanese soldier, sent to her as a memento of the South Pacific campaign.

That bit of ghoulishness has its sequel in the reported gift to President Roosevelt, from a Pennsylvania Congressman, of a letter opener made from the forearm of a Jap soldier killed in the Pacific theater. The President is said to have remarked, "There'll be plenty more such gifts."

We hope not.

To treat human bodies as souvenirs, to rob the graves of soldiers killed in battle, and make trophies of their bones is a barbaric practice that cannot be condoned.

We turn in disgust from the debased head hunters, who adorn their bodies with the shrunken skulls of their slain enemies and make ornaments of their bones and teeth.

Are we to imitate that savage desecration of human bodies, just because they happen to have been those of our enemies?

It is not difficult to imagine the outcry in this country if the bones of an American boy killed in Bataan or New Guinea were to be made into toys for Hirohito's children, or if the skulls of our soldier dead were to be exploited as souvenirs exhibited in the streets of Tokyo.

This grisly stuff is made-to-order propaganda for the Japs. It can only horrify people everywhere who give to the bodies of the dead the honor of decent sepulture.

The sending to this country of Japanese bones as war trophies is atrocious. It should be halted at once.

I doubt that any Congressman made any such gift to the President, or that the President made such a reply, and I doubt, too, the story of the young woman and the skull.

I intend to believe that such things just do not happen here in civilized America. The Japs are cruel and savage, but that is no reason why we should imitate them in unnatural desecration of the dead.

Peace Under God

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH E. TALBOT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to insert an article by the Reverend Dr. John C. Walker, pastor of the Second Congregational Church, Waterbury, Conn., on the subject of Peace Under God.

In the modern world we have had one crisis after another for many years past, but the evidence accumulates that we are rapidly approaching the most decisive of all these crises. There is every confidence that victory will be won on the field of battle, but there is by no means the same expectation that we shall be wise enough to make the just and lasting peace all peoples everywhere so ardently desire.

There is a really surprising measure of agreement with regard to the necessity for building this peace on moral and spiritual foundations. Leaders of all the Christian denominations have spoken for a Christian peace. The Jews ask for a peace in conformity with the laws of God. The six pillars of peace sponsored by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America won widespread approval and the seven principles set forth in the joint statement of Jewish, Roman Catholic, and Protestant leaders likewise met with almost unanimous acceptance. Hundreds of thousands of Methodist, Baptist, Congregational, and other laymen are engaged in writing to the State Department and Members of the Congress calling for peace based on moral and religious principles and a world-wide organization of nations to enforce peace.

In the face of all these definite pronouncements, it is very difficult to understand the timidity and hesitation with which some react to the concrete proposal for bringing spiritual influence directly to bear on peace-making through a religious advisory council composed of acknowledged leaders, lay and clerical, of the recognized faiths of the world, which would have official status and act in a consultative capacity at the peace table and during the discussions and agreements which lead up to the final peace.

So many seem to think that once pronouncements have been made and resolutions passed we can safely leave everything to diplomats and politicians. Can such confidence in the unselfish motives of the gentlemen in question be justified? We wonder why it is accepted in some quarters that there will be experts of all sorts and descriptions at the peace discussions now in process and the final treaty making but that religion and religious leaders must be relegated to the background. If people contend that religious influences should properly be left to the delegates themselves, we wonder if they remember how such spiritually animated men as Woodrow Wilson and Lord Cecil could get nowhere when confronted with the selfish realism of the other delegates at Versailles?

The fear is growing that the third world war is in the making. The most desperate efforts must be made if we are to avert the occurrence of world catastrophe. If God-fearing men and women actually believe what they say about their faith, they must certainly insist that humane, moral, and spiritual ethics prevail at the time of the peace settlement. Is there any hope that, by some shadowy kind of remote control and by bowing out of the picture, they can make their influence felt? Is it not reasonable to suppose that if sound, practical, religious insights are needed to undergird peace settlements, outstanding religious leaders should be available for advice and counsel?

The large and growing number of lay and clerical leaders of all faiths who stand behind the plan for such a religious advisory council or commission as advanced by William Montgomery Bennett, of Woodbury, are determined that this subject shall be kept very much to the fore. It is believed that the people of the churches and men of good will everywhere will support the plan with enthusiasm and see to it that it is put into effect—if only a greater number of responsible leaders in the churches can be brought to the point where they will take a courageous stand demanding implementation of the plan by our Government.

Some people seem to feel that a religious advisory council would get no where as an effective force in peacemaking. To resolve their fears and reassure themselves that the plan is workable, they have only to read the article released by Religious News Service setting forth the startling accomplishments of the legislative committee of the New York State Council of Churches, which for 7 years has been functioning at Albany. Composed of six clergymen, or as many denominations, and four laymen, the committee works closely with the Governor, State officials, and the lawmakers, seeking to influence legislation solely by education and moral suasion, on bills affecting the life of the church in the State, social problems, child welfare, child labor, gambling, liquor, and the general social well-being of all citizens. The Albany committee has successfully done on a State-wide basis what the proposed religious advisory commission would accomplish with equal success on an international basis.

The Protestant Episcopal Church has officially called on the President of the United States and the State Department to make effective arrangements for bringing Christian principles into the peace through representation by leaders of the recognized churches of America; that church has also certified the proposal to the World Council of Churches by means of a resolution at its general convention "requesting the World Council to take such steps as may be necessary to insure that Christian principles are brought to bear upon any peace settlement." It is hoped that other religious organizations will soon take like action.

Unlike conditions on previous occasions, peace plans arrangements are now being talked over by representatives of governments and are being gradually evolved and negotiated so that pretty concrete decisions will have been reached when hostilities cease. For that reason it is imperative that, to be effective, a special religious, advisory council should be set up now—not at war's end. Let all speak out boldly demanding a voice for religion in seeking the basis for a righteous, just, and lasting world peace. Should not the church of God speak bravely and clearly in these days? Is not the church the ambassador of peace, the representative of the Prince of Peace?

What Next?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, how far we have traveled along the road toward tyranny is disclosed by Westbrook Pegler in the following editorial. Read it and ponder.

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK, June 15.—This is mid-June. Two weeks from now, the nominally free male civilians of the United States above the age of 17 will face the proposition of surrendering their freedom for involuntary servitude to private employers and slavery to the unions and the New Deal political party, or going on strike against an absolutely lawless decree issued by Paul McNutt.

After July 1, McNutt has said, any male civilian over 17 who leaves a nonessential job must go into essential work. He can't take another nonessential job. If that job is to be filled at all, it must be taken by a women.

McNutt also has attempted to direct all such workers into the United States Employment Service for placement in essential industries. This U. S. E. S. is an evil growth with which the general public is little acquainted. From its very beginning, it has been as a dragooning service to heard unwilling civilians into the unions. In many places, union agents have occupied chairs in U. S. E. S. offices, supported by the taxpayers, or adjoining premises.

Applicants for war jobs have been required to pay cash on the line to the unioneers for the privilege of helping to win the war on the home front. The U. S. E. S. refers applicants to the unions for clearance with the understanding that if they don't clear by paying initiation fees and dues, or signing promises to pay out of their immediate wages sometimes through the check-off, they won't be hired. In no case is there a guaranty that the applicant will hold his job after he has earned the amount of the shake-down plus an equal amount for himself. There are always more saps coming in and the temptation is strong to lay off those who have been clipped for the union treasury and trim the new suckers.

The U. S. E. S. also has assumed the power to order independent employers to hire whomsoever it sends them, regardless of the applicant's competence or character or the employer's judgment of his or her personal fitness. The individual is not a person but a unit, or number, a case on file.

A dirty person, even a prostitute may be referred to a company engaged in packing food for package lunches in a war plant, and must be accepted. The U. S. E. S. is especially stern if the dirty person or prostitute is a member of a "minority group." If a business has a practice of employing Negroes to run its elevators and asks for a Negro to fill a vacancy, the U. S. E. S. will charge the management with racial discrimination against white men and make him accept a white man. Then, if the applicant himself, being a white man, refuses to accept the job, he, in turn, may be condemned for racial prejudice against Negroes, marked "unavailable" on his card and denied all further opportunities to earn his living. For nonessential work is closed to him, and the U. S. E. S. which controls essential hiring has put him on its blacklist.

If a worker, leaving a nonessential job, refuses to take a job deemed to be essential, however inferior the work may be to his intelligence and skill, and however inferior the pay to his usual standards and his unavoidable commitments, he doesn't go to jail, of course; he just goes idle, a man wasted, and broke and hungry until necessity breaks him down or enough other men like him get sore enough to tell McNutt and the unions and the U. S. E. S. to go to hell in a voice loud enough to be heard by President Roosevelt and Congress.

Fair Employment Practice Act

OF

HON. CHARLES M. LaFOLLETTE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am extending a statement made by me before the Labor Committee of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, June 14, 1944, in support of the bill sponsored by me, H. R. 4005, the bill sponsored by Representative DAWSON, of Illinois, H. R. 4004, and the bill sponsored by Representative SCANLON, of Pennsylvania, H. R. 3986, to establish a permanent Fair Employment Practice Commission:

Chairman NORTON and members of the committee, I appear here as the sponsor of H. R. 4005, a bill to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry, and in behalf of that bill and H. R. 3986, introduced by Representative SCANLON, of Pennsylvania, which the committee is presently considering, and H. R. 4004, previously introduced by Representative DAWSON, of Illinois. These bills are, for all practical purposes, similar in their language and similar in their purposes.

The committee has previously had the benefit of much legal, technical, and factual testimony in support of this legislation designed to establish a permanent Fair Employment Practice Commission by act of Congress to supplant and give congressional sanction to the principles and purposes which led to the establishment of the present Committee on Fair Employment Practice, heretofore established by Executive Order No. 9346 on May 27, 1943.

I hope that I may be able to bring to the committee certain points of view in connection with this legislation which have not been heretofore presented to the committee, or which, in any event, may constitute an expansion of or a supplementing of ideas and points of view heretofore presented. To my mind, so many arguments could be advanced and elaborated upon in support of this legislation that, considering the necessity for brevity in my present approach to this question, I should like to preface my statement by saying that I am offering at this time the most meager sketch or outline of certain approaches to the questions involved in this legislation, which by no means exhaust my thinking upon the question, but which are primarily offered for the purpose of stimulating thought and discussion by the members of the committee, and possibly by the Members of the House when, as, and if the committee reports any of the bills now pending before it.

I shall, therefore, treat upon but three subdivisions of my fundamental thinking on the questions involved in this legislation: First, the fundamental ethic behind the legislation; second, constitutional approaches to the legislation; and, third, suggested improvements or amendments to the legislation.

I. THE FUNDAMENTAL ETHIC BEHIND THE LEGISLATION

I believe that intellectual honesty and moral courage demand the passage of this legislation and its support by all of the Members of the Congress who profess their belief in the fundamental democratic ethic which underlies the thinking of the citizens of this country and which is the same ethic for the preservation and advancement of which we claim to be fighting this war.

Because in the balance of my remarks on this subject I shall often use the word "democracy" in referring to the ethic, I wish to distinguish my use of the term "democracy" in the ethical sense from the limited use of the term which we customarily use, viz: as descriptive of a form of government. A democracy or a democratic form of government, used in its political sense, I think, has reference only to a form of government in which the people to be governed directly vote and participate in the decisions which are to be made for the purpose of governing their conduct. In other words, the old New England town meetings were pure democracies in a political sense; and used in the political sense, our Government, of course, is not a democracy, but is a republican or representative form of government. Nevertheless, the ethic under which this representative government is to work, and must work, is the democratic ethic, if it is to permit us to develop in America the sort of civilization to which all people of good will in this country inherently aspire.

Democracy then, in this broad sense, is an ethic and a philosophy arising out of Hebraic-Christian thinking and centered upon the belief that man is spiritual and the most dignified being on earth. Democracy in this sense is not capable of being divided or stratified. There is but one democracy, which is a philosophy based upon a complete application of the injunction of Christ, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," which He called the second commandment. And, this commandment and this ethic must be practiced by man exclusively in all fields of man's efforts and endeavors and operations on earth. Thus conceived, it is true that democracy operates and has rules which we must still unfold, discover, and develop in the field of economics and in the field of racial relationships, as well as in the field of political science; but, it is self-evident to me, nevertheless, that there is but one democracy. It is a faith, a hope and an ethic, which requires our unswerving devotion to and practice of a set of principles in every field in which man comes in contact with his fellow man.

If we accept the above concept of democracy as sound, then it follows that the application of this philosophy and ethic in the field of economics demands of us that we believe that nothing shall interfere with a man's opportunity to occupy any position or hold any job, except his own lack of ability to hold the job or lack of emotional balance or character qualities which permit him to work in conjunction with others harmoniously and without disrupting the work of those with whom he is working and associating himself.

But, it is fundamental that this question of the development of abilities and skills and the development of self-discipline and character qualities is an individual characteristic and that the individual's capacity is neither biologically nor psychologically based upon the color of a man's skin or his racial origin.

It follows, therefore, that any limitations upon any individual's opportunity to hold a job or to make economic advancements which are based upon racial considerations or so-called racial qualities are false limitations which are inconsistent with the democratic ethic as I have defined it, and consequently have no right to exist in a democratic society and civilization.

And, it finally follows that if such limitations exist in a republic, which is operating as a government for the purpose of advancing the democratic ethic, then they are not only contrary to the principles upon which that government is founded and operated, but they are antisocial limitations which it is not only the right, but the obligation and the duty of such a government, operating under such a philosophy, to remove through the enactment of positive and definitive legislation at any time when it clearly appears that these limitations have existed for such a long time and are so firmly entrenched that they cannot be removed except by positive legislative action.

Therefore, since I believe that such limitations exist in our society; that they are false limitations, as measured by the ethic and philosophy in which we, as a people, profess a belief, I must conclude, if I am to be logical, intellectually honest, and morally courageous, that I must support such legislation as is calculated to remove these impediments against full economic opportunity to any member of that society. It is for these reasons that I not only support this legislation, but that I also find it impossible to oppose it.

II. CONSTITUTIONAL APPROACHES TO THE LEGISLATION

In discussing the question of constitutional approaches I shall again divide it into a very broad discussion of inherent constitutional power of the Congress as such and, secondly, present a discussion of my personal thinking upon the obligations which a Member of Congress' oath of office places upon him in casting his vote upon legislation in which it is asserted that constitutional questions are involved.

The many decisions which have been handed down by the Supreme Court in discussing the constitutionality of the Wagner Act, in my opinion, have clearly established the constitutionality of this legislation. In a sense also, the opinions of the Federal Courts, in construing the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Walsh-Healey Act have clearly established that this legislation is drawn to operate in a field in which the Congress clearly has the power to act.

But more than that, the Supreme Court, in upholding the provisions of the Wagner Act, which permits an employee wrongfully discharged for union activities to recover from his employer the difference between the wage which he was receiving at the time he was discharged and the wage which he received or might have received in reasonably similar employment during the time that he was unemployed, establishes a measure of damages which the English common law had previously established as the method of measuring damages for the loss of a comparable property right. For instance, if a tenant breaks his lease before the end of the term, the landlord, under proper pleadings under proper provisions in the lease, is entitled to recover the difference between the rent fixed in the lease and the rent which he actually received or which he might reasonably have received from the same property from another tenant during the unexpired term. This right was given to the landlord because his ownership of real estate was recognized as a form of property. Is it not logical to infer that the measure of damages used in the Wagner Act and the method of measuring damages establishes the proposition that a job is a form of property?

By the same token, the provisions of the Wagner Act which, under certain circumstances, entitle the employee to be reinstated in his job over the protest of the employer is rather analogous to the right of a person in possession of real property to resist wrongful removal by the owner, and likewise, somewhat analogous to the right of replevin by the person entitled to possession in the case of personal property. From which, I think it is again proper to infer that a job or the right of employment in industry or the right to work, if you choose to use that expression, under the rulings of the Supreme Court in construing the Wagner Act has clearly advanced from the concept of a commodity and has reached the dignity of at least a quasi property right in the eyes of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is true that this job cannot yet be sold and transferred and it is not capable of being inherited, which are attributes of things which we have always understood to be property, but nevertheless, it is certainly proper to say that the right to work and the right to hold a job is at least a quasi property right.

If this is true, does it not follow that the Congress fundamentally has the same right to adopt this legislation for the purpose of regulating this quasi property, at least the right to acquire and to hold a job, as fully as it has the right to regulate with reference to those things which we have always recognized as property and which we have always recognized the power of Congress to regulate and control by Federal legislation?

What I am trying to point out is this: That whether many of us realize it or not, the effect of the rulings of the Supreme Court, particularly in upholding the provisions of the Wagner Act, is to take a step forward to the creation of a new concept of property, which is the right to work at a gainful employment; and if the fundamental effects of the Supreme Court decisions are what I believe they are, it must clearly follow that we are proposing, in effect, legislation with reference to property in the bills now under consideration by this commitee.

Again I can only speak for myself with reference to my understanding of my obligations under my own oath of office in voting for legislation in which a constitutional question is involved. I do not believe, particularly with reference to those questions as to which the law of the land is at present in a state of flux, that a man need have a conviction, beyond a reasonable doubt, that legislation is constitutional in order to support such legislation and at the same time not violate his oath of office. I think that he must conclude for himself that there are reasonable grounds to believe that legislation comes within the provisions of the Constitution. In order to reach his reasonable conclusion as to the constitutionality of legislation, he is, of course, not entitled to engage in speculation or wishful thinking, but his conclusions must be based upon and his thinking must be measured by standards which require the exercise of correct and common modes of reasoning in fitting the law into or under the Constitution. However, if a Member of the Congress of the United States concludes by reasoning processes which are neither specious nor speculative, that there is a reasonable ground to believe that legislation is constitutional, then he is entitled to vote for it, upon constitutional grounds, because, under our system of Government, the final determination of that question is left to the Judiciary.

Perhaps I can best explain my thinking by illustrations. I am a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America. Under my oath of office as a Member of the Congress, I clearly could not vote for legislation which proposed to establish the Protestant Episcopal Church of America as the compulsory faith to be adhered to by every citizen of the United States. This is true because I could not by any common or accepted modes of reasoning rationalize the constitutionality of such legislation.

On the other hand, I cannot only vote for, but propose legislation such as that now under consideration because I have reason to believe, by the exercise of common and accepted modes of reasoning, that if the Wagner Act is constitutional and the Fair Labor Standards Act is constitutional, that this legislation, in its purposes and its language so clearly parallels those acts, whose constitutionality has already been upheld, that I have reasonable grounds to believe that this legislation is constitutional, even though its constitutionality has not been presented to a court for review—until which time, of course, I can have no positive conviction as to its constitutionality.

I have laid bare my own mental processes with reference to my understanding of the limitations placed upon me by my oath, not gratuitously for the purpose of binding any other member of this committee or of the Congress, but with the thought that perhaps it might establish a standard to which other members of this committee or of the Congress might choose to adhere to. I have no thought of setting out a standard by which anyone else but myself might be judged.

III. SUGGESTED IMPROVEMENTS OR AMENDMENTS TO THE LEGISLATION

In discussing the third subdivision I shall not point out specific amendments or specific language. However, I think it is proper to point out that the legislation needs tightening, particularly with reference to bringing the Federal Government and its agencies clearly within the provisions of the act so that the Federal Government will be honest with its citizens and clearly demonstrate that it intends to apply the same standards to its own employment practices as it fixes for other employers and labor unions and employee associations.

It also occurs to me that the sanction with reference to Government contracts in Section 13 (b) on page 12 in lines 9 and 10 should certainly be modified to conform with the standards for offenses and penalties fixed in Section 14; namely, that the prohibition against a Government contract should in any event be made to read "not to exceed 5 years" so as to make the sanction flexible and permit the Commission to exercise discretion in imposing these sanctions.

I also want to point out that Section 12 contains a very commendable provision, which is included for the first time in any Federal legislation dealing with the power of commissions to adopt rules and regulations, namely, that the requirement that these regulations be transmitted to the Congress for their consideration and with the right of the Congress to amend or nullify them by appropriate legislation, if it considers them not within the scope of the act or within the powers delegated to the Commission. The language in its present form is probably not as carefully drawn as it might be in order to guarantee to the Congress this power. However, the act does propose a method by which the Congress can exercise continuing control over the regulations promulgated by commissions and it is clearly a step in the right direction.

The inclusion of this section in this bill of itself is evidence of the good faith of the proponents in advancing it.

Farm Security Administration

OF

HON. ROBERT L. F. SIKES

OF FLORIDA

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, F. S. A. is best measured by the fruit of its own work. I have followed its work in my district for many years. I know its value. Let me cite proof. The following histories are typical examples of the families in Florida who are buying farms with loans from the Farm Security Administration and who are borrowing money to carry on farm operations. These families are repaying their loans, with interest, establishing themselves on the land and helping to swell the Nation's basket of vitally needed war foods.

GEORGE E. HAGLER, JACKSON COUNTY, FLA.

After 1 year on the Farm Security program, George E. Hagler, 46-year-old farmer, route 1, Bascom, Jackson County, Fla., exactly doubled his net worth, was up to date on his F. S. A. operating loan payments, and had made two payments on his F. S. A. farm-ownership loan.

He sold $294 worth of cotton, $601 worth of peanuts, some cows, poultry, butter, and eggs that first season.

Hagler came to the Farm Security office in 1941, asking for operating funds and also applying for a loan to buy a farm in accordance with the terms of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act. His net worth was $639. He owned a mule, 4 cows, 4 hogs, and 50 chickens. The family was living in an old log house, only one room of which had a ceiling and glass windows. There were no screens. The other buildings were in very poor condition. Hagler had been farming the same place for 12 years.

As 1942 began, the picture was much different. The current payment on the operating loan had been paid. The equivalent of two annual payments on the farm-ownership loan had been paid. There was capital on hand for the 1942 season. Hagler's net worth had increased to $1,276, and he had 2 mules, 6 cows, 30 hogs, 150 chickens, and machinery valued at $133. He was buying a farm of his own. His land, house, and chattels were worth $5,888, with $3,800 owed on the land and buildings. The family had canned meat, vegetables, and fruit laid by, and a year-round garden in production.

MR. AND MRS. WILLIAM T. MING, JACKSON COUNTY, FLA.

This statement is from the Jackson County Floridian, Marianna, Fla., Friday morning, December 24, 1943:

JACKSON FARMER AND WIFE HONORED BY MARIANNA LIONS—CIVIC LEADERS PAY TRIBUTE TO COUPLE FOR OUTSTANDING ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Honoring the first F. S. A. borrowers in Florida to pay their loan in full, a special program was given at the regular weekly meeting of the Marianna Lions Club at Hotel Chipola Tuesday evening. Honor guests were Mr. and Mrs. William T. Ming, of Union community of Jackson County, who have the distinction of being the first recorded beneficiaries of the F. S. A. tenant purchase loan plan in Florida to pay off their loan in its entirety.

With President Jack Donald presiding, the meeting opened with an almost 100 percent attendance of Marianna Lions, together with a number of distinguished visitors. The principal speaker was R. A. Willis, president of the Bank of Greenwood, who, in commending Mr. and Mrs. Ming for their outstanding accomplishment, said that this was the first meeting of its kind ever held in Florida. During the course of his remarks, it was brought out that Mr. and Mrs. Ming made the purchase of their farm, 180 acres, in September 1938, for which they agreed to pay $3,600. The loan, however, was for $5,900, which included a number of improvements which they contemplated at that time. The financial position of the Ming family at the time of making the loan, was placed at $2,100—today, with all obligations discharged, the farm is estimated to be worth $10,000, and all obligations have been discharged in full. A check with the office of George E. Simmons, county F. S. A. supervisor, verifies these figures.

Distinguished visitors attending the meeting at Hotel Chipola Tuesday evening included W. H. Nobles, president of the Citizens State bank and first State chairman of the tenant purchase committee; W. B. Anderson, member of the first county committee; R. W. Blackshear, State tenant-purchase specialist, Crestview; D. H. Yawn, district F. S. A. supervisor, Marianna; Miss Gertrude McArthur, associate district supervisor, F. S. A.; Jesse P. Day, Jr., assistant county F. S. A. supervisor for Jackson County; Mrs. Edith H. Middlebrooks, associate county F. S. A. supervisor; S. L. Morrow, supervisor, Chipola River soil conservation district; Mrs. Alyne C. Heath, county home demonstration agent; John E. Lambe, former member of the tenant purchase committee; F. M. Golson, chairman, county school board; E. T. Denmark, county school superintendent; and a number of other visitors.

Mr. and Mrs. Ming were warmly commended by all present for their outstanding accomplishment, and local agricultural and civic club leaders expressed their satisfaction that the first and most outstanding accomplishment under the F. S. A. program occurred in Jackson County.

JAMES A. ALLEN, OKALOOSA COUNTY, FLA.

James A. Allen and his family, of Okaloosa County, Fla., owned exactly $1.09 worth of belongings when they applied for help from the Farm Security Administration in 1939. Literally they were "down and out." They had been sharecropping for a number of years. They had no workstock, no cows, no chickens, no tools. Mrs. Allen had been ill for several months and the children were forced to stay out of school to help with the work.

In 1939 the Allens moved to a better farm and got an F. S. A. loan of $776 to buy poultry, a cow, some seed, a brood sow and some feed. They seemed to take a new lease on life. They followed the suggestions of the county F. S. A. supervisor and carried out a diversified farming program, and worked hard. The addition of milk to their diet resulted in better health for the whole family. Mrs. Allen's health improved to the point where the children were able to return to school.

The supervisor brought Mr. Allen and his landlord together and helped them work out a long-term leasing arrangement. The landlord furnished material for repairing the house and barn and for fencing necessary to divide the farm acreage into four fields. Mr. Allen did the work.

In the spring of 1942, the Allens got an additional F. S. A. loan of $291 to increase food-for-freedom production. By the end of 1941, they had repaid $446.89. Whereas they had no hogs at all in 1937, the Allens in 1942 raised 54 head. In addition to cotton, they produce cane and potatoes, raise a big garden each year and market eggs and milk every week. In 1942 they had $385 worth of food in their cellar and had on hand $480 worth of feed.

There are many others like those I have named. We cannot look upon this type of progress and service with indifference. We must continue to provide an opportunity for those thousands of American farm families who are yet reached and encouraged only through the Farm Security Administration.

Fair Employment Practice Committee

OF

HON. WILLIAM L. DAWSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the House Committee on Labor:

Mr. DAWSON. Madam Chairman and members of the committee, for one to understand clearly the necessity for such a bill I do think we should have something of the background that caused the appointment of the present Fair Employment Practice Committee. Prior to the war, when business was just beginning to speed up, and when the manpower shortage was first felt and labor became scarce in various industries, efforts were made by advertisements in the papers and by radio and public rallies to cure this situation. But Negroes were not called to work. They went to factories advertising for help and were turned down because they were Negroes.

After Pearl Harbor the situation became even graver. War production went into high gear. Labor was at a scarcity. Women were being called for jobs that women had never done before, even children of school age were urged to work part time because of this manpower shortage. And yet Negroes who were laborers, Negroes with skill, were turned down—because they were Negroes.

The labor situation got so acute that the war industries and the war movement were being retarded. The President, in his judgment, in order to meet a war situation, in order to cure or seek to cure a glaring wrong, appointed this Committee. Mr. Scanlon has told you that the Committee had no power of subpena; they had no power to compel witnesses to come before them; they had no power to enforce their directives by any action against employers, against unions, or others. Their only powers were those of persuasion. If you could understand and have knowledge of the great work that has been done by this Committee, armed only with the power of persuasion; if you could appreciate how they have gone to the management of various industries and laid the situation before them—the necessities of the country, the fairness and squareness of giving employment to all Americans—if you could see the results that they have gotten in thousands of cases, causing many thousands of men and women to be called into war plants, you would appreciate the great work that has been done in the war effort by this Committee.

But that has not been all—the speeding up of the war work by the committee. I wish I could convey to you something of the psychological attitude of millions of people, citizens of a country, who were denied the right to work simply because of the color of their skin; how they felt in the land of the free; what their attitude would be toward the Government of the country in which they were born, when they saw their boys were being called to the colors, and yet, the mothers and fathers and brothers and sisters of those same boys were denied the right to work, at a time when every industry was advertising for men and women. In some instances industries went so far as to pay bonuses to employees who induced other people to come to work and stay as long as 30 days on the job. A bonus was given to that employee who obtained a new employee, so grave was the situation.

There was great bitterness in this country among 13,000,000 Negro people. We might as well face this situation. Thirteen million people compose one-tenth of the population of this great Nation of ours. What shall be the attitude of America toward those 13,000,000? Are you going to deny to them the opportunities that you proclaim to the world should be given to all men? No. There is not a fair-minded man or woman in this Nation who would not say that such a condition should not obtain. But we do need a lot of education in this country to bring sane, sensible people around to the knowledge that, after all, this question of race is not a thing to be afraid of. This question of difference of color is not a thing to be afraid of. If our Christianity be right; if we believe in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; if our democracy means what it claims, the embracing of all human beings within its scope; then, for the sake of the Christianity that we claim, we have got to look the matter fairly and squarely in the face and do all we can to alleviate the unjust conditions and unfair problems of any people, regardless of race or origin or creed or religion. Sooner or later, here in this country, we have got to face the question and settle it right for all times in the minds of the people. And there is no better way to begin to face that problem than to assure to every people that they will have the opportunity to work, along with all other peoples in this Nation of ours. The right to work is synonymous with the right to live. Take from me my opportunity to work; deny to me the opportunity to work because of my color, and you deny to me the opportunity to raise a family, you deny to me the opportunity to educate my children, and you deny to me the opportunity to build a home and to acquire those things which, according to all human standards, should be the minimum which any individual should have.

Certainly, in a land as rich and powerful as ours, there is plenty for everyone. The F. E. P. C. is a step to assure to the American public the consummation of a right, not the infliction of a wrong. There is no wrong to be done to any human being within this country by assuring to any other human being the right to work if he or she has the skill and ability. That is not taking anything from any other man—to give to me the thing that I am entitled to as a man—and certainly within the confines of this great Nation of ours, there is enough for everybody, of work, of money, and of opportunity, if we will but lay the foundation for it.

And the F. E. P. C. is seeking to lay the foundation for something that is of vital importance to the ideals of this Nation. You say, "What do we care about it?" I will tell you. If our Nation is to assume its rightful place among the nations of the world as the champion of democracy, if we are to gain their confidence and obtain trade to keep our industries going, we have got to care.

Just the other day I talked to natives from Puerto Rico. One walked into my office. He was surprised to see a Negro sitting in the Congress of the United States, because he had been in a certain section of our country where Negroes are not even permitted the ordinary opportunities that would come to the poorest of human beings in some other countries. He could not understand why white people and colored people could not work together, and live together, and build a great nation together without all this friction and racial bickering among one another. Certainly he could not understand how we could claim that we had a democracy. He said, "You do not have a democracy. You may have a republican form of government, but that is not a democracy. You do not have as much democracy here as we have in our own country."

Then take the countries of South America. If we are going to maintain our friendly relations with them; if we are going to maintain our neighborly policies with them, how can we do that and continue within our own country some of the habits and customs that we have been indulging in in the past? We will be but the laughing stock of the members of those nations when after the war they come to this Nation in ever-increasing numbers and find that even the fundamental human right of the opportunity to work and earn a livelihood is denied to American citizens because of race or national origin. It will destroy the faith and confidence of other nations in the sincerity of the American people. Loss of faith and confidence in us is bound to retard our trade with those nations and thus destroy markets for our industries.

So when we come before you with this bill for a permanent F. E. P. C., we are asking for permission to do a job for national unity. We are asking for a committee to be charged with the responsibility of seeing that every American, regardless of race, creed or color, gets an opportunity to work regardless of what his nationality, origin, race, creed or color may be. That is no more than what our Constitution guarantees us.

If the Constitution guarantees us that in words, and we say in practice we are not getting that result, is it not then the fit and proper thing for the law-making body to do the thing which it thinks and believes will help make that Constitution a living reality?

It is all right to speak of the Constitution as a great document, but a document not based upon human service cannot survive. It will be a short-lived document and not the document that the forefathers intended the Constitution to be, and time has proven that it can be what our forefathers wished it to be, if we but do the thing as lawmakers to shut up the gap, to pass those laws which will put in operation movements that will support the underlying principle of the Constitution.

I have listened to arguments against this committee, most of which were very unreasonable. For instance, some say it is dictatorial. How can any committee be dictatorial that does not have the power of punishment or arbitrary enforcement? How can any committee be dictatorial when the members of that committee must depend upon persuasion in order to achieve objectives?

I have heard others say that the working activities of the President's Fair Employment Practice Committee breed disunity within the Nation. Those who make that claim are the authors of or adherents to the philosophies which make the existence of a Fair Employment Practice Committee a necessity. Men and women who are denied the right to work within the country and who see their sons called to die for the country may have a just cause to be disgruntled, and when the class of those who are so rightfully disgruntled reaches the size of one-tenth of the population of the Nation, then you do have a situation which is bound to engender low morale, which makes for national disunity in time of war. But those who would deny to other citizens the right to work when their Nation is at war, and when manpower is short, and when the very war effort itself is being hindered by lack of workers, and who would resist the efforts of the Government to use every bit of available manpower among its citizens, regardless of race, color, or national origin, are the breeders of national disunity.

I have also heard some say that the majority of those who worked for the F. E. P. C. were Negroes. Yes; the Negroes of America are the largest minority group. They constitute the biggest problem of unemployment, and we must face that. Then, if you are going to endeavor to obtain someone to go out and do this job, what better person could you find than a member of that very group itself? If a Negro can by the powers of persuasion get other Americans to conform to the directives of the F. E. P. C., is there anything dictatorial about it, or is there anything unfair about it?

I am sure that there can never be any fear of anyone armed only with the power of persuasion and who is better fitted to speak for any people than a member of those people? Nobody knows except a Negro what it means to be segregated and discriminated against because of race; what it means to be turned down on a job when you have seen their advertisements for men and women, and then you walk up and ask for a job, and you know how much depends upon a job—you have a family—and then they turn you down because of color.

So, take this problem from any angle you wish and it appears to be a necessary thing, both in wartime, as a member of the War Department said, and also in time of peace, in order to assure fair play to other nations, in order to guarantee to other nations that the "four freedoms" for which we fight will not be empty words, but something that we will live up to. It will be an empty promise to them as long as we deny to those within the confines of our own country the "four freedoms" that we are claiming to be fighting for for other countries.

Therefore, it seems to me that, any way we look at it, this F. E. P. C., both in time of war and in time of peace, is a matter that the Congress of the United States ought to do something about.

The President has set the pace. The results that have been obtained by this present committee, if looked at fairly and seen without bias, will be regarded as one of the greatest war efforts put forth by any committee during this entire emergency.

Mrs. Chairman and members of the committee, I do hope that this matter will be reported favorably to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. DAWSON. You have made a very fine and clear presentation of your case, and I take it from what you said your interest lies particularly in economic equality; is that right?

Mr. DAWSON. That is right.

Mr. KLEIN. I would like to add this one comment. I agree with the chairman, and we all commend you, Mr. DAWSON, on the fine statement you have made. I agree that the Negroes are today the outstanding victims of economic persecution, but you will admit, I am sure, there are other minorities as well who are also subjected to the same sort of thing.

Mr. DAWSON. I do, sir, but I feel that when the day comes that we are broad enough to encompass the Negro within the confines of the Constitution all other minority problems will be solved.

Mr. KLEIN. I agree with you wholeheartedly. I simply wanted to point out that all other minorities would probably gain from an act such as this. Democracy is just a hollow word if we are going to enforce discrimination such as we have been doing in all parts of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Again, I want to thank you, Mr. DAWSON, for that very clear and fine statement that you have presented to the committee. I think that you have stated your case remarkably well, and we are very grateful to you for it.

Mr. DAWSON. Thank you.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Evening Star of yesterday carried, under large headlines, an Associated Press dispatch from "Aboard a hospital ship off England" detailing the heroic exploits of a young friend of mine, James O. Mullins, of Grundy, Va. Believing that a record of his heroic acts should be preserved among the records of this Republic, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein the Associated Press dispatch to which I have referred.

I extend to the father and mother of James my congratulations on having raised such a cool-headed, fearless, patriotic son, and assure them that the Nation deeply appreciates the valuable service he rendered our country under such hazardous and dangerous circumstances.

The last sentence in the dispatch, "Gosh, I hope my mother doesn't worry," is expressive of the feeling that is deep-seated in all of our soldier boys. They realize, as all thinking people do, that the mothers of America are the ones upon whom war visits the greatest grief and worry. May it please a merciful God, Mrs. Mullins, that worry be not your portion; and under His protecting care may James' life be spared, so that in the not too distant future he may come marching back home in triumph to the hills we all so devoutly love.

EISENHOWER'S LETTER INSPIRES VIRGINIAN TO HEROIC ACTION

ABOARD A HOSPITAL SHIP OFF ENGLAND, June 14.—Pvt. James O. Mullins, of Grundy, Va., has distinguished himself under fire as an acting sergeant to deliver an important message on the beach-head front.

Now wounded—not seriously—Private Mullins said yesterday he was sustained by a phrase from a general letter sent to the armed forces recently by General Eisenhower: "I have confidence in your courage and devotion to duty and skill in battle."

He said he was sorry only because he had lost his own copy of the letter. Here is his story:

"I went in with the first wave of our ground force units. We established a command post and I was assigned to the communications section. We had difficulty maintaining contact with our advance units and finally the line went dead.

DIDN'T BELIEVE HE'D SURVIVE

"I was made an acting sergeant and sent on an important mission 5 miles to the front. I never expected to live through it. At the end of an hour I had reached a small village and slipped into a French shop where I bought sandwiches.

"An old lady refused money, but I left 50 francs on the counter.

"It was after leaving this village that I ran into trouble.

"I remembered General Eisenhower's words in his letter and knew then I just had to keep on moving. I tricked a sniper into disclosing his position by throwing rocks to draw his fire. One shot silenced him."

Private Mullins said that after what seemed hours he finally reached his destination. On his way back he lost his original route and was stopped by machine-gun fire. He went in close and tossed a hand grenade. It silenced the enemy.

The young Virginian said he saw a German shoot at crew members of an American tank. He shot the German and took a pad he had in his hand.

PAD HAD VALUABLE DATA

"The next instant," Private Mullins related, "a shell exploded in front of me. I don't know when, but it must have been hours later I was at the command post. I had lost my watch, billfold, and Eisenhower's letter. I felt pretty bad. A chaplain later told me the pad I had taken from the German had valuable information.

"I went to the beach for medical aid. There a soldier told me that after I left the command post it was hit by a shell and the chaplain was killed. I want another crack at the Germans now. They are not so tough.

"Gosh, I hope my mother doesn't worry."

Valedictory Address

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER

OF MISSISSIPPI

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit herewith a very able and timely valedictory address. The address was delivered by Mr. James Carter, of New Orleans, La., the valedictorian of the class of 1944 of the St. Stanislaus Academy of Bay St. Louis, Miss. Due to the favorable light in which the efforts of this splendid young man were received, and at the request of some interested parties, I submit it for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Mr. Carter's address follows:

Reverend fathers, kind teachers, honored parents, gracious friends, and fellow classmates, it has been customary to limit the substance of a valedictory to the more strict sense of the word, that is, a farewell address. Although it is the sincere wish of class 1944 to bid you, our honored teachers and dear friends, a fond adieu, the profound hope that you will hear from us again abides deep in our hearts. Our earnest desire is that our names will not fade into obscurity, but that we shall be able to assume positions in the great world of the future which are worthy of our background and education.

The establishment of peace and the formation of a world capable of retaining that peace are projects which call for many Catholic leaders, men of Christian ideals who are willing to assume the responsibilities entailed in these undertakings. We know that such leadership must come from our ranks, from among the graduates of our Catholic institutions. No one else has been indoctrinated with true Christian ethics and ideals as we have. Consequently, we stand ready to shoulder the burden which lies before us. May God guide our footsteps.

There is no need to elaborate upon the fact that a large number of us will soon be involved in a conflict which none of us had even the smallest share in bringing about. Rather, the duty has fallen upon us to share in the making of a durable peace the like of which the world has not known since the twelfth century. We must face that duty manfully. With modern warfare ever growing more ruinous and terrifying, we can readily understand what disaster would befall civilization, and possibly all mankind, if a third world struggle among nations should ensue. Therefore, our generation must see to it that there will be no third world war. We must set the world on a genuine basis for lasting peace and friendship, or we shall perish with civilization. To realize success in the gigantic task which confronts us we shall need the advice and guidance of all who have seen the present hostilities develop. We have the ideas and the energy but we need your wisdom gained by the experiences of the past 20 years to direct our purposes toward the goal. With these thoughts in mind, we ask you, the present generation of leaders, to give us your help and understanding when our time will come to take over.

Youth has always been noted for its idealism. We have great ideals and visions as to how the world of today might be made into a veritable utopia. Only through your tolerant cooperation and help can we hold any hope for the materialization of these ideals in a practicable way. If we are thwarted and hampered at every turn; if we are told that our dreams are nonsensical fantasies, full of imagination but lacking practicality, we shall soon lose faith and be forced to stand by while civilization prepares another attempt at its own destruction. Ideals of themselves can do nothing. Their fulfillment requires a tremendous amount of effort on the part of both the idealist and his beneficiary. In order to bring about any type of improvement, be it moral, social, economic, or political, full cooperation is needed between groups and individuals, who, though striving toward the same end, have dissenting views as to the methods to be employed. Therefore, we request that you inspire us with the conviction and courage that we shall need to fulfill our pattern for a permanent victory.

Our chosen fields of endeavor are varied indeed. For the present, many of us will have no voice in the selection of a profession and will have to postpone our dreams and ambitions for an indefinite period of time.

But whatever we do, wherever we go, each one of us will always have foremost in his mind the thought that his primary vocation upon earth is the salvation of his own soul. Whether he enter college, the higher life, or the services, he will always remember that no matter what may befall him, his first duty is to obey the commandments of his Creator. Just as the American soldier is about the best trained fighting man in the world, so, too a St. Stanislaus graduate is one of the best-trained fighters to battle the powers of evil. Whether or not he makes use of his training once he enters the battlefields of life with its temptations is a matter which rests entirely in his own hands.

We are proud of our Catholic education because we know that it is our best guaranty of happiness and our most reliable insurance against spiritual harm—the only evil we have any cause to fear. We know that in the indistinct future there will be a multitude of occasions when we will have no other foundation upon which to stand except our Catholic faith. We take joy in the realization that we have been taught to love and cherish that faith so well during our years at St. Stanislaus. Numerous tales have found their way from the battlefronts telling of miraculous conversions on the field of action. Atheists, pagans, and men who had been grossly indifferent to their religious duties, in the face of death suddenly through prayer and the Grace of God came to realize that the only sound philosophy of life upon this earth was that of Jesus Christ. How fortunate we are today prepared for any eventuality by the parents, brothers, and priests who have instructed us in our Catholic faith. We thank God for our faith.

The St. Stanislaus graduating class of 1944 does not sit before you in its entirety. Some of our fellow students did not get the chance to receive their diplomas here today. They knew that their country needed their services, and they left with a smile on their lips but with sorrow in their hearts, to fight that we, and millions like ourselves, might be able to continue our education in peace and security. We pay tribute to our classmates who have gone before us and who are now face to face with the enemy whom we may never be called upon to fight. And so, good friends, class '44, both at home and abroad, bids you au revoir.

C. I. O. Political Action Committee

OF

HON. HOWARD W. SMITH

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, under leave heretofore granted, I submit copy of a letter written by me to the Attorney General and a copy of his reply:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 12, 1944.

Hon. FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: You will, of course, recall previous correspondence I have had with you concerning the violations of the Corrupt Practices Act by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, and you will doubtless recall that after your letter to me of April 6, in which you stated that you had discovered no violation of the law by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, I wrote you under date of April 7. In reply to that letter, you wrote me under date of April 10, stating that you had directed Mr. G. Maynard Smith of your staff to obtain from me the evidence in my files. Your Mr. Smith called on me on April 11, and I turned the files over to him with the understanding that they would be examined, and further investigation conducted.

A period of 2 months has now elapsed, during which I have received no further communication from you nor any indication that it is the purpose of the Department of Justice to prosecute violators of the Corrupt Practices Act.

As there are rumors that other well-financed minority groups may adopt a similar subterfuge to violate the Corrupt Practices Act on the strength of your previous opinion, it seems to me imperative that an early and decisive opinion in the C. I. O. Political Action Committee case should be had. Otherwise, any group such, for example, as corporations, could adopt a similar subterfuge by setting up a political action committee to which they could contribute large sums of money that would ultimately be used to influence the coming elections. Such a situation would seem to me to be the equivalent of a repeal of the Corrupt Practices Act.

May I earnestly request an immediate answer.

With kind personal regards,
Sincerely yours.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 14, 1944.

Hon. HOWARD W. SMITH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN SMITH: I have your letter of June 12 with respect to violations of the Corrupt Practices Act by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

The files that you turned over to Mr. G. Maynard Smith, to which you refer, were examined but did not give us any additional information.

For some time Mr. Tom Clark, head of the Criminal Division of the Department, has been engaged in a further investigation not only of this committee but of other organizations engaged in political activities. If any violations of the Federal statutes are shown, prosecutions will follow.

With personal regards, believe me,
Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General.

Bill To Amend the Constitution To Abolish the Electoral College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have this day offered a bill proposing an amendment to the Constitution which has for its purpose the abolition of the outworn, useless, cumbersome electoral college.

This contrivance for the indirect election of the President and Vice President must be discarded. Too few people in this country realize that they do not vote directly for President and Vice President and that at the polls in their various States they elect mere automatons, called electors, who are supposed to cast their votes in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the voters in such States.

However, it is possible for these electors to refuse to be mere robots. Under the Constitution, they are not compelled to vote as "instructed" by the popular vote.

Under the practice now obtaining, the voters on election day cast their ballots for Democratic, Republican, or other party electors. They vote for these electors en bloc. There is no voting for individual electors. When a voter goes into a booth, he votes for the entire list of Republican electors or Democratic electors. However, it is possible for Republican or Democratic electors not to carry out the mandate of the voters.

A revolt is brewing in some of the Southern States. Some of the Democratic leaders, notably in Texas, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Louisiana have threatened to have their electors "uninstructed." They want certain planks inserted in the Democratic platform, all providing for so-called white supremacy in the South. They want the restoration of the two-thirds voting rule in the Democratic National Convention. They demand the elimination of WALLACE as the Vice Presidential candidate. They demand the abolition of the President's Fair Employment Practice Committee. They want no more discussion of anti-poll-tax legislation. Unless they obtain these objectives, they threaten to have the Presidential electors from these States—who ordinarily would be pledged to vote for Roosevelt—disregard the choice of the Chicago Democratic National Convention, and force them to vote either for Dewey or for some Democrat like the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Senator BYRD.

If such tactics are successful and the vote for the Presidency and Vice Presidency is otherwise close, these electoral votes of these Southern States might be sufficient to prevent the election of Roosevelt or might prevent a majority from going to either Democratic or Republican candidate, in which event, the election for President would be thrown into the House of Representatives and the election of Vice President into the Senate. If the election is thrown into the House, then each State has only 1 vote, regardless of the number of Representatives any State has in that Chamber. Such a contingency in the midst of a war would be no less than catastrophic. Twice before in our history, the election was thrown into the House of Representatives and as a result of political log-rolling, turmoil, and self-serving interests, the candidates receiving the largest popular vote were not chosen. In both instances, processes, the very antithesis of democracy, prevailed.

Certain forces in both parties are bent upon putting a broomstick between Roosevelt's legs, and in any event, to prevent his reelection. The unnecessary, awkward, mischief-breeding electoral college lends itself beautifully to this purpose.

The amendment to the Constitution abolishing the electoral college, which I have offered today, of course, cannot be acted upon before the ensuing election, but the attention of the Nation must again be drawn to the dangers lurking within the mechanism known as the electoral college. I liken it to the appendix, unnecessary, but subject to festering and inflammatory ills.

Its most patent defects may be briefly summarized:

First. The electoral college is an unnecessary go-between between the will of the people and the final choice for President and Vice President.

Second. It is undemocratic in that it disenfranchises a large segment of the popular vote by ignoring the minority vote.

Third. It encourages nonvoting by minorities in States that are known to be definitely one party or the other.

Fourth. It can thwart the will of the people as it did several times in our past history. John Quincy Adams became President although Andrew Jackson received the majority of popular votes as did Rutherford Hayes when Samuel J. Tilden had the majority vote, and as did Benjamin Harrison, although President Cleveland received the larger majority popular vote.

Major Step for Boston

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Daily Globe:

MAJOR STEP FOR BOSTON

The Civil Aeronautics Board decision handed down yesterday authorizing for additional airlines to begin flights connecting Boston with points to the south and west marks an extremely important phase in the commercial, cultural, and economic life of the city, and the entire New England area. It is a major step toward making the city a key skyport on the airlanes of the post-war world.

Granting certificates of necessity and convenience to Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc., United Airlines, and Eastern Airlines, in addition to American Airlines, which has long served New England, gives the area the benefit of the Nation's greatest air carriers.

The ruling closely integrates the highly important New England section with the air transport pattern of the Nation. Through present operating and connecting services the city will now be within a few hours, or a few days, of any principal point in the Western Hemisphere. The city is now definitely in a strategic position as an important base for routes that will girdle the world in the coming "age of flight."

With the authorization of service by Northeast Airlines on the New York-Boston route the two major cities will be brought still closer together by more frequent service, while the establishment of this carrier as an all-New England airline will integrate the air travel of the entire area. With the extension of Eastern's northern terminal to Boston, and in conjunction with Northeast's service to Montreal and the Maritime Provinces, complete air service has been established along the entire seaboard of North America.

One outstanding lesson has been learned by Boston and New England in its long battle to bring in the major air lines, and that is, organized public opinion plus strenuous and consistent effort can achieve the desired results.

Youth Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, on June 5, 1944, it was my high privilege to speak to the graduating class during the commencement exercises of the Spartanburg Junior College at Spartanburg, S. C., of which Dr. R. B. Burgess is the president.

During the ceremonies Miss Jewel Schofield, one of my fine young constituents of Gray Court, S. C., delivered a most impressive speech entitled "Youth Today."

Under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a copy of Miss Schofield's address:

As I approach the topic on which I speak to you—youth today—I do not approach it pessimistically. I do not approach it as a question of problems, but rather as a question of unprecedented opportunities. I cannot deny the fact that youth today do have problems unparalleled by those of any other age. On the other hand, was there ever an era in the history of our Nation when so many doors swung open before the leaders of the future? I should like to call to your attention opportunities before the youth of America—opportunities in the fields of social work, religion, politics, general improvements, and education.

Will you look with me into the field of social needs? At a meeting of the social workers of South Carolina, which took place recently in this city, one of the speakers informed the group that there is a minimum need of 12,000 case workers. In preparation for this work the student is trained to cope with problems of child labor, delinquency, slums, unemployment, war, and the race, migrant and other social evils. The field of social work presents a wide scope of varied problems for the young people interested in this work.

No less urgent is the need for workers in the field of religion. The church has its doors open to youth. From an institution in which only men were allowed to speak in worship services, to the church led by both sexes, though only in the adult age, we now have the church whose main emphasis seems to be centered on youth—youth movements, youth crusades, youth camps, clubs, and organizations. The church of today is depending on its youth as leaders of tomorrow.

As an example of what lies ahead for the voice of youth in politics, let me paint a scene that took place in the marble chambers of the State house in Trenton, N. J., last April. These chambers housed, not gray beards and rough voices, but beardless chins and voices that often cracked into a shrill soprano. The New Jersey Boy's Model Legislature was in session. They were high-school boys serving as senators and representatives from their own home counties. Each year for 5 years this legislature, organized by the youth and government committee of the New Jersey Y. M. C. A. and actively sponsored by Princeton University, has given intensive training in the principles of democratic government to 180 boys. This doubling of the number of regular representatives was for the purpose of spreading the training as far as possible. Then these young elder statesmen go home to their own communities and apply what they have learned in organizing model city councils operating on the same basis. This particular example is followed by many other cities over our country. The door of politics has swung many degrees in the interest of youth in the last decade.

Youth has advantages in the world today because of improvements to be made. Lincoln Steffens has clearly expressed the unlimited opportunities for youth in these words:

"There is everything for youth to take over, and it is an inspiration for them to learn:

"That we have not now and never have had in the history of the world a good Government.

"That there is not now and never has been a perfectly run railroad, school, newspaper, bank, theater, factory, grocery store; that no business is or ever has been built, managed, financed as it should be, must be, and will be some day—possibly in their day.

"That what is true of business and politics is gloriously true of the professions, the arts and crafts, the sciences, and sports. That the best picture has not yet been painted; the greatest poem is still unsung; the mightiest novel remains to be written; the divinest music has not been conceived even by Bach. In science, probably 90 percent has yet to be discovered. We know only a few streaks about astronomy; chemistry and physics are little more than a sparkling mass of questions." [1]

After considering these open doors, you may say, "Yes, we agree that the opportunities for service are varied, but such service as this calls for intensive preparation." Indeed it does—but wait—another door swings open. Let me illustrate what it has to offer by using an example with which I am most familiar. In the field of preparation for just such service as we have been reviewing, this is what the Methodist Church alone has to offer. She has nine universities with graduate courses leading to a master's or doctor's degree. Most of them maintain professional schools in administration, law, business, dentistry, engineering, and medicine. For young persons interested in full-time Christian service the Methodist Church offers, in addition to her graduate schools of the universities and theological schools, training schools for professional, social, and religious work. Distinctive schools or departments of music, fine arts, or dramatics also have their place along with courses in business, journalism, science, teacher training, social service, and religious education. There is also the junior college of general education with or without vocational emphasis.

Thus, if a young person desires to attend a college for women, a college for men, a coeducational school, a junior college, a liberal arts college in a university, or a college where he may earn his expenses, he has only to seek and he shall find.

This is an example of what the Methodist Church has to offer, not to mention the splendid opportunities given by other institutions and the country at large. You might take especial note of the scholarship plans and work programs offered in many of these schools.

[1] Lincoln Steffens, Unlimited Opportunities for Youth, Reader's Digest (twenty-first publication, December 1942).

To American youth all doors are open—social, religious, political, and educational. Improvements need to be made in all these groups. The future challenges youth to investigate the needs and possibilities of each field, to equip themselves with adequate preparation in their chosen field for rendering maximum service to their fellow men. Youth must not, they dare not, stand with idle or hesitant head, heart, or hands. They must press forward on eager feet through the open doors of opportunity to the new world of tomorrow.

Mr. Farley's Resignation

OF

HON. FRANCIS MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Mr. Farley's Resignation," published in the Hartford Daily Courant of June 9, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. FARLEY'S RESIGNATION

If one less sincere and truthful than James A. Farley had announced that "business duties and obligations" required him to resign the chairmanship of the New York Democratic State Committee, a position Mr. Farley has held for 14 years, one might question the genuineness of the reason advanced. As it is, those of a suspicious mind may be so unkind as to insinuate that since Mr. Farley vigorously opposed a third term for President Roosevelt, the looming prospect of a fourth nomination is rather too much for his indulgent nature.

Despite his attitude on the previous occasion, Mr. Farley conducted the Democratic campaign in New York with his customary efficiency. His intense loyalty to the party would not permit him to do otherwise, even if he had little personal enthusiasm for the task. But it would be asking rather too much of him to go through the experience again, and it probably comes to him as a not unpleasant realization that as chairman of the board of the Coca-Cola Export Sales Co., he has duties and obligations to discharge that are just now of transcendent importance. Our boys overseas demand their "coke," and big-hearted Jim Farley, full of patriotism as he is, is in a strategic position to see that they get it. Compared with that, what else matters?

Mr. Farley will take time out to attend as a delegate the national convention of his party. How he will comport himself in that capacity remains to be seen. That his conduct will be exemplary from the Jeffersonian point of view cannot for a moment be doubted; but should he insist on the convention's adopting his own viewpoint, and be defeated in the attempt, he very likely would do what he has always done—support the nominee of the party. He holds to the political philosophy that if one participates in a party convention, wages a fight for what he thinks is right but loses, one is still under a moral obligation to abide by the decision of the majority.

Jim Farley's devotion to what is still called the Democratic Party is almost sublime; and, come hell or high water, he will remain a Democrat to the last, which does not mean that he cannot have mental reservations against any President's having more than two terms. He would rather, in certain circumstances, confine himself exclusively to exporting Coca-Cola.

New York Soldiers May Be Disfranchised

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting editorial entitled "New York Soldiers May Be Disfranchised," published in the Buffalo Star.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK SOLDIERS MAY BE DISFRANCHISED

Governor Dewey of New York having refused to call a special session of the legislature to loosen up the restrictions on voting by New Yorkers in the armed services, it becomes evident that a large proportion of the citizens of the Empire State will be disfranchised.

Under the existing law in order to get in his ballot the soldier or sailor, WAC or WAVE must write to the secretary of state (the State official, not Mr. Hull), his application will, theoretically, at least, be transmitted to his local election board, which will assay his title to vote in that district. If the local board accepts him, it is supposed to mail a ballot to the soldier, who will then have an opportunity of voting for everybody, including sheriff and coroner, swear to it before an officer and mail it back to the New York War Ballot Commission, which would transmit it to the local election board to be counted.

Under last year's law, which was simpler, less than 3 percent of the fighting folks got in their votes. There being about a million one hundred thousand New Yorkers in the armed services, what chance is there of approximately one-fifth of the State's citizenry having anything to say about their Government?

The only change sought from the proposed extra session was to cut out some of the red tape, by permitting friends or relatives of the absentees to make their application for a ballot for them.

The Government rejected the proposal without giving any direct reason. Of course, the circumstance that the Governor feared that a majority of the men in the camps or at the front would vote Democratic had no bearing on the matter. Mr. Dewey is, according to his own declaration, not a candidate for the Presidency, but does not disregard that he might be drafted. In the whole history of conscription there never was a draftee more willing to be coaxed or coerced than the Governor of New York.

He has expressed his sole interest in his Governorship, which makes his arraignment of the national administration and his vehement but hardly lucid entrance into the controversy of post-war diplomacy as logical as fitting an elephant's foot into a lady's dancing slipper.

His passionate concern lest a fellow in a fox hole in Italy ducking enemy machine-gun fire, or 5 miles over New Guinea picking the spot on which to drop a half-ton bomb, should not have the opportunity to scan and mark a yard-long ballot is only equalled by his dismay that the soldier might be deprived of the privilege of voting for pound-keeper in his home town.

The answer to all this is that the folks at home—the mothers, wives, and sisters, and sweethearts—should take over. Just as they have gone into uniform to replace the man who is overseas, they should vote as a sacred duty as they believe their soldier boy would vote—if political strategy had not made it as difficult and impractical as possible for him to do his part in the determination of our national destiny.

OF

HON. PAUL BROWN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. HENRY BASCOM STEAGALL, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, my steadfast friend and colleague, HENRY BASCOM STEAGALL, was serving his fifteenth term in Congress at the time of his sudden passing on November 22, 1943. As chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, for which he was so eminently qualified, he distinguished himself and maintained the high regard and ready cooperation of every member of the committee by his quiet strength combined with gentility. His unwavering zeal and industry, and consistent efforts in behalf of the little man, won for him his life battle. Many important laws are now on the statute books of the Nation as living memorials to HENRY STEAGALL, the leader, the statesman and great American. Alabama and the whole country have lost a true patriot, and the farmer has lost his best friend.

He was born at Clopton, Dale County, Ala., and received his early schooling in the common schools of Alabama, having graduated in law at the university of his State. He practiced law a number of years, was a member of the State Legislature of Alabama, and was State district prosecuting attorney several years before he was elected, without opposition, to the Sixty-fourth Congress on June 29, 1914. He was elected to each succeeding Congress until the time of his death.

He was a man of fine intellect and keen perception, and thoroughly understood all proposed legislation that was brought before the Banking and Currency Committee during his more than a decade of outstanding service as its able chairman and leader.

It was my privilege to know HENRY STEAGALL intimately and to love him dearly, and I submit these brief remarks as a final tribute to him whose sincerity of purpose and greatness of character enriched the lives of all who were fortunate enough to be touched by his ennobling influence, which seemed to radiate around him like warm sunshine.

Where Constitutional Power Truly Rests

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. DANAHER
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a well-thought-out letter entitled "Where Constitutional Power Truly Rests," which appeared in the New York Sun Saturday, June 3, 1944. I commend the letter to the attention of my colleagues.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHERE CONSTITUTIONAL POWER TRULY RESTS—DIVIDED BETWEEN CONGRESS AND PRESIDENT BUT WITH VAST RESERVOIR ENTRUSTED TO CONGRESS

To the EDITOR OF THE SUN:

SIR: Attorney General Biddle's recent assumption in the Montgomery Ward case that Mr. Roosevelt, as Chief Executive, possesses extraordinary constitutional war powers, is, I think, without substantial legal basis. Such powers are vested in the Congress and in it alone.

One of the main purposes for which our National Government was established is to provide for the common defense. Under the Constitution that task, with all its attendant problems, is entrusted to the Congress. It alone is authorized to raise and support armies, provide and maintain a navy, and see to it that the militia is organized, armed, and disciplined. It alone may make rules for the government and regulation of these armed forces. Obviously, countless unnamed legislative powers must necessarily be implied in order to perform these essential yet complex duties. By "legislative powers" I mean powers of the Congress to decide what shall be done, how it shall be done, and who shall do it.

Justification for such implication is found in the closing paragraph of article I, section 8 of the Constitution. The Congress is there authorized "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof."

Here then, in the Congress, is a vast reservoir of express and implied war powers, with emphasis on those implied, for no one could foretell all the things which might be required to preserve and defend the Nation.

By contrast the President's constitutional powers in respect of war are very limited indeed. "The President," says the Constitution, "shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States * * *." This is all there is to it, except that with the advice and consent of the Senate the President appoints the commissioned officers of the armed forces.

THE CIVIL POWER

As head of our Military and Naval Establishments, the President is as completely subject to the rules and regulations prescribed by the Congress as is any one of his subordinates. But, as Chief Executive he has an additional obligation; namely, "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed" (art. II, sec. 3).

The eminent jurist, Benjamin R. Curtis, said: "The military power of the President is derived solely from the Constitution. He is the General in Chief; and as such, in prosecuting a war, may do what generals in the field are allowed to do within the sphere of their actual operations, in subordination to the laws of their country, from which alone they derive their authority." But he added this warning: When a General in Chief disregards those laws "he super-adds to his rights as Commander the powers of a usurper; and this is military despotism."

In time of war, the Congress may very properly vest in the President such unusual powers, consistent with the Constitution, as the efficient prosecution of the war may seem to demand. Where these powers affect civilian life they must be given to the President as civil magistrate, not as military commander. In no other way can the military be kept subordinate to the civil power.

The duty of the legislative and judicial branches of government to support and defend the Constitution should make them especially vigilant to check any tendency on the part of a President to exercise powers not traceable directly to clear and explicit legislation. This is particularly true these days, when personal government is in the air everywhere and its consequences visible in the charred and blackened ruins of Europe and Asia.

There are those among us, of whom Attorney General Biddle seems to be one, who act as though they believe that war suspends the Constitution for its duration. If written constitutions mean anything, such a view is untenable. The Constitution of West Virginia makes this quite clear.

"The provisions of the Constitution of the United States and of this State," it says, "are operative alike in a period of war as in time of peace, and any departure therefrom, or violation thereof, under plea of necessity, or any other plea, is subversive of good government and tends to anarchy and despotism" (art. I, sec. 3).

ON BEING TOO CLEVER

This declaration is of especial significance, because West Virginia was born during the Civil War. Its Constitution was drafted by a citizenry loyal to the Union; it was approved at the time by the Congress, whose Members presumably knew and understood the principles for which that war was being fought.

But, say the molders of our "new social order," the war will not wait for the decisions of the Congress. It requires immediate executive action. Those who take this view have no faith in the American people. They must doubt both our patriotism and our ability to govern ourselves. They underestimate the capacity of a President to get quick action, provided he has shown that he knows his proper place, and that he intends to stay in it.

In the midst of a war for our survival as a nation any forthright Chief Executive can count upon the wholehearted cooperation of every Member of the Congress. Our Representatives will never refuse him any legitimate request. But debate will be prolonged, and action delayed, when Executive proposals are just too "clever," when they suggest the presence of ulterior purposes, or when experience has shown a disposition in the executive department to give meanings to statutes quite opposite to the legislative intent.

These are the things which make the democratic process seem inefficient. The system is not to blame. The blame should fall upon those unprincipled politicians who use the war or any emergency for their own selfish ends—men who believe it is easier to manage a single individual, though he be a President, than to control a Congress, who, for that reason, ignore the Constitution and claim for the Chief Executive unlimited war powers.

As an American, I abhor personal power in the hands of any man. As an American, I believe the Constitution of the United States is our only effective shield against dictatorship. And as a Republican, I hope the candidates and workers of my party will, in the coming campaign, keep that Constitution constantly before the voters as the living symbol of their liberty, and convince them that it, and it alone, is the supreme law of our land.

Newton D. Baker General Hospital Is Dedicated at Martinsburg, W. Va.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege last Friday afternoon to participate in the dedication exercises of the Newton D. Baker General Hospital, near Martinsburg, W. Va. This splendid Army institution, which will accommodate upward of 2,000 patients, is named in honor of a distinguished native son of that community, who later became Secretary of War under President Woodrow Wilson.

More than 3,000 persons listened to the appropriate program and hundreds personally inspected the buildings, equipment, and grounds. Many of the boys now being hospitalized there have seen service in the European theater of war. More than 160 have been flown to the hospital for treatment and rest.

Mrs. Newton D. Baker, widow of the distinguished American, was present for the program, which was featured by talks by Col. Gilbert Van B. Wilkes, Corps of Engineers; Col. Everett L. Cook, hospital commander in charge of Newton D. Baker Hospital; Maj. Gen. Norman T. Kirk, The Surgeon General of the United States Army; Maj. Gen. James L. Collins, commanding general, Fifth Service Command, and several others.

The dedicatory address, delivered by the Honorable John J. Cornwell, former Governor of West Virginia, made a deep impression on the audience, and I include it herewith, because of its genuine worth:

In this crucial hour of the greatest armed conflict in the history of the world; at the very moment when countless numbers of our American soldiers are being maimed on far-flung battle fronts, we have assembled formally to dedicate an institution devoted to the work of rehabilitating and restoring to health men who have suffered the shock and strain of battle.

Of the millions of men in our armed services, the job and the duty of the vast majority is to kill and to wound the enemy, for only in that way can the war be won. There are so many horrible phases of war that it hardly is prudent to pause and contemplate them while we are engaged in it. The struggle is so titanic, so fierce, and so scientifically conducted, it is necessary that the thoughts of civilians as well as those in the armed forces be concentrated upon the successful prosecution of the war in order that victory may be achieved and peace restored at the earliest possible moment.

But the more diligently it is prosecuted the more casualties there are, of necessity; the more of our boys are killed or wounded.

MEDICS BRIGHT SPOT

In all this conflict raging around the world; in all this destruction of human and material resources, there is but one bright spot; but one pleasant picture; but one cheerful thought, and that is the marvelous work being done by the medical and surgical branches of the armed forces and their aides and services. Never in any previous war were sick and wounded men evacuated from the fighting fronts so promptly, cared for so tenderly, or treated so effectively. Never before was the percentage of deaths so low, the percentage of recovery from wounds so high. All this illustrates not only the tremendous strides that have been made in medical and in surgical science; the marvelous use of the airplane in the evacuation and transportation of sick and wounded servicemen, but it illustrates the high value set on human life by the American service forces and officers and by the American people.

A wounded Japanese, like a captured Japanese, is written off just as though he were a dead Japanese. Those yellow rodents have no time to be burdened with their wounded. It makes them a more difficult foe to fight but it marks the difference between people whose civilization is a mere veneer over oriental savagery and a people who possess hearts of love and of tenderness and of mercy.

SPIRIT OF NATION

And so, as the care and consideration of our sick and wounded servicemen are the brightest phase of this cruel war, hospitals such as the one you are formally dedicating here today are the personification of the spirit that is responsible for that brighter phase. All over the country these hospitals have been erected or structures already standing have been converted into hospitals. All of them are equipped with every modern gadget and instrument. They are staffed with competent doctors, technicians, and nurses. The work of the doctors and technicians is well understood and thoroughly appreciated. Thousands of wounded men, who, in former times and past wars, would have come out hopeless human derelicts, through modern surgical skill are restored to useful, self-supporting, and happy citizens. Sometimes, however, I wonder whether the general public has a full appreciation of the work being done by the nurses. Those of us who have undergone serious operations know the value of skillful, tender touch of a nurse; know how she bolstered our morale as she sat by our bedside when we endured long, painful, sleepless nights. We can appreciate what that professional skill and personal charm means to a wounded soldier after fighting for days, weeks, and even months in snow, sleet, and storm on the Italian front or in the feverish jungles of the South Pacific. These nurses go to the very front lines, accompany the wounded as they are flown through the skies, and they are here at home in the hospitals to help the man back to full and final recovery. They are truly angels of mercy. May their number increase and their work be more generally appreciated.

PROUD OF PART

For all these reasons I am proud to be a humble participant in the formal dedication of this marvelous institution of mercy and of rehabilitation. But there still is another reason for my presence. This hospital is named for Martinsburg's distinguished son who was my close, personal friend—Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War during the First World War. I do not know who is responsible for designating this the Newton D. Baker Hospital, but it not only was a gracious thing to do, it was a fitting thing.

While Newton D. Baker was a great Secretary of War, having directed the prosecution of the First World War to a successful conclusion even though the country was less prepared for it than it was for the present war, he was a pacifist at heart. He loved mercy; he was gentleness personified, and he walked humbly with his God. He was, indeed, one of the humblest, most unpretentious, and kindliest men I have ever known. He was a great man, great in intellect, great in soul, and great in spirit.

I saw him many times during that war when he was burdened with grave responsibilities. His vision never was clouded. His objective was to win the war. He bent all his energies to that end. He selected competent commanders, in whom he had confidence and permitted no interference.

SOUL OF HONOR

I knew Baker even more intimately after the war. We were members of the same board of directors, and his firm was our counsel at Cleveland. He was the very soul of honor and honesty in business. It was my privilege to stand by his side and to try to aid him in his last great fight for a political and governmental principle.

A disciple of the immortal Woodrow Wilson, he firmly believed the future peace of the world depended on our cooperating with other countries, through the League of Nations, to effect disarmament and to settle international disputes. That was the firm position of the Democratic Party in its platform adopted at the national convention at San Francisco in 1920.

At the famous Madison Square Garden convention 4 years later, Baker represented Ohio on the platform committee. I represented West Virginia. We knew the leading candidates for President and their followers, who constituted a majority on the committee, had reached the conclusion that the League of Nations should be dropped as a vote-getting proposition. They thought it had become unpopular. Baker and I prepared a minority report on that particular point to be submitted to the convention in case the committee rejected the League endorsement. The committee did reject it after a memorable struggle behind closed doors. Comparatively few men are living today who participated in or witnessed that fight which never was reported in the press.

The meeting lasted all night, much of the time being consumed in a wrangle over the Ku Klux Klan.

Finally, the great League of Nations issue came up, and while only a few of us supported Baker against an array of United States Senators, the debate was furious and bitter.

"Night's candles were burnt out" and the first rays of a July sun were peeping through the window when Baker concluded his great speech for his League of Nations plank.

He believed the hope of world peace and the lives of countless thousands of our citizens depended upon our joining the League and cooperating with other nations to preserve world peace.

He predicted that without our support the League would fail, that if it failed, the world would soon be engulfed in another—the worst of all wars. His final challenge was that if from fear of defeat the Democratic Party deserted the ideal of world peace through world cooperation, it no longer would be a party of principle but it would become a party of expediency. He repeated that statement before the convention later in the day in support of our minority report. As history records, the party did desert that ideal.

Well, the world has traveled a long and tortuous road since Newton D. Baker, like his dead chieftain, went down to defeat in a courageous effort to commit his political party and his country to a practical plan for the maintenance of world peace. We are now treading its bloody end in sorrow and sacrifice.

It has taken this war and all its tragedies to bring us back to the ground Woodrow Wilson and Newton Baker occupied in their quest for world peace a quarter of a century ago for there appears to be a general conclusion that if the human race is not to be exterminated there must be cooperation among countries in dealing with international questions; that cooperation can come only through some such organization as the League of Nations, for which Woodrow Wilson gave his life and for which the man for whom this hospital is named continued the fight gallantly until the principle was deserted by the political party for which he had done so much.

But it is too late for the millions who occupy unmarked graves and so late that the whole question is complicated by new international issues, some of which may be difficult of solution.

To Make Sure Our Servicemen Can Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH M. PRATT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. JOSEPH M. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer of June 12, 1944:

TO MAKE SURE OUR SERVICEMEN CAN VOTE

Pennsylvania's machinery for assuring its service men and women the vote in next fall's election will be set in motion today.

A house-to-house canvass will be started in Philadelphia today—and begun in the rest of the State on Wednesday—to list all soldier and sailor eligibles. Two hundred thousand volunteer workers of local defense councils will conduct the poll, which will close July 7, when the names and military addresses will be officially recorded.

This is a gigantic undertaking, intended to make possible the dispatch of ballots, without any bother whatever on the part of those in service, to the 500,000 to 800,000 eligible Pennsylvanians in the armed forces and related agencies.

Soldier voting could have been wrapped up in all sorts of red tape regulations, requiring the men overseas to take time off from the war to fill out many forms, and then run the risk of never having their vote counted.

It is to the credit of Governor Martin and the leaders of both parties that this State has adopted a soldier-vote law marked by complete simplicity. The absentee servicemen don't have to take any prior steps at all. Once their names are listed they will be sent the ballots for marking, without registration or application and with plenty of time allowed to get the votes back for counting.

The canvass beginning today is an essential part of the vote set-up, and it is imperative that the information required be collected. The canvassers are warned, of course, to seek no information of military nature and to leave politics outside the door.

The wardens have shown great efficiency in civilian-defense activities and they may be relied upon surely to do a good job here.

It should mean a great deal to them, as to all of us, to make sure that nothing is left undone to facilitate voting by those away from home in the serious business of war.

Unhonored and Unsung

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY SAUTHOFF

OF WISCONSIN

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, much has been said, and rightfully so, in praise of the amazing production for our national defense. It has been the wonder of the modern world, and no country in the world could have done it except the United States of America. This is due to the intelligence of American industry, and the high standard of the American worker.

Yet all this great flood of production would have been useless if there had been no means of transporting it. The railroads of our country brought the production from the place of manufacture to the port of embarkation. Here again was an example of splendid achievement, for the railroads were badly handicapped. Lack of workers, lack of material, lack of replacements, lack of new rolling stock, lack of nearly everything essential to meet the problems of transportation was enough to dismay the most optimistic. Yet the railroads met the issue to an extent that challenges one's imagination.

During 1939 there were 338,000 ton-miles transported on the railroads per every man employed, while in 1942 there was a 502,000 ton-mile transportation per everyone employed. That is an increase of 48 percent. In 1943 it was still greater, so that the railroads must be given credit for transporting this tremendous amount of freight and also passengers across the country.

THE TRUCK HAULER

However, that is not all the story, for there is one more person who should not be overlooked—and that is the truck hauler. Stop all the Nation's trucks today and we would begin to go hungry in less than a week. Trucks get perishable foods and livestock to market before they spoil. On top of all the food that was hauled to the consumer, the trucks also hauled for the armed services eleven and one-half billion pounds of lend-lease food; they rushed 78,000 pounds of food daily to each armored division at the front.

Just look at these figures—60 percent of the meat is carried to stockyards by trucks, 100 percent of the milk for 34 large cities is hauled and delivered by truck, 89 percent of the poultry received alive at Chicago, 79 percent received in New York arrives by truck, 51 percent of the fruits and vegetables for our largest cities come by truck, 45 percent of the butter comes by truck, as also does cream, eggs, and cheese. All vital foods, even condensed and packaged foods, come all or part way by truck. This is an amazing achievement in the face of various serious obstacles.

There are and have been shortages of truck equipment, restrictions in rubber, poor quality gasoline, and manpower difficulties, and these have had to be met. The truck driver gets up before daylight, he collects his fresh fruit and vegetables, or milk products, and hauls them to a concentration point where either the railroad or the long-distance truck haulers carry on, but his day's work is not over when he has delivered his load at the concentration point, and he must go to the junk yard, the second-hand dealer, or wherever he can get what he needs in order to find replacements for worn-out parts. This takes time and is done at the sacrifice of the trucker's sleep.

In spite of these handicaps and in spite of the fact that highways have not been properly maintained, the trucker has smashed bottlenecks on food and war production by cutting delivery time in half. So let us give a hand to the truck hauler whose remarkable achievements have been unhonored and unsung.

We Will Not Neglect the War in the Pacific

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the news that American B–29's are bombing Japan proper is heartening. It is a sign that in conjunction with our attacks on the Marianas and the landing of American troops on Saipan we are approaching full offensive strength and that we consider the Pacific and Asiatic areas fully as important as the European theater. We are engaged in a world-wide struggle and we must bend all our efforts to bring Hitler and Hirohito to their knees. We must spare no effort either at home or abroad to bring this barbaric war to an end just as quickly as it is humanly possible.

We must also remember the part that China has played in this struggle and see to it that she receives every available bit of assistance we can send her. With China using her manpower, ingenuity, and skill plus the matériel we send to her we can shorten the Pacific war and thereby the whole struggle. It is to our best interests to see that the major efforts now being exerted by Japan in central China be defeated at the earliest possible moment. Every set-back of Japan by China means the saving of American lives and the shortening of the war.

We can depend on our gallant soldiers, sailors, and marines doing their part under Chennault, Stilwell, MacArthur, and Nimitz in defeating our Japanese enemy. We pledge to them out there that they can depend on us at home to back them to the limit.

We will not neglect the war in the Pacific and this bombing of Japan is evidence that we are now developing our offensive against the "beat China first" campaign now being carried out by the Japanese.

Mr. Speaker, I am including an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor of June 6, 1944, which is worth the consideration of all Members of the Congress:

CHINA AND THE INVASION—AN INTIMATE MESSAGE FROM WASHINGTON

(By Roscoe Drummond)

However formidable the struggle on the invasion coasts of France, there will be no neglecting the war in the Pacific.

One reason is that Japan isn't going to permit the United States to let up one instant at any point along the whole Asiatic front, and the evidence now developing is that the Japanese are launching a formidable "Beat China First" campaign.

This is Japan's reply to the Anglo-American plan to beat Hitler first, and it is giving the gravest concern to the Chinese military mission recently arrived in Washington.

General Shang Chen, director of China's National Military Council and one of Chiang Kai-shek's most trusted military advisers who accompanied him to the Cairo meeting with President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill, sees Japan already embarked on a now-or-never offensive calculated to knock China entirely out of the fighting.

As obtained from both Chinese and American sources in Washington, the significant facts behind—and the possible consequences of—this new operation are these:

Since March 1 of this year the Japanese have moved 500,000 of their fresh, best, well-armed troops from Manchuria into China—part to be used against the Americans and Australians in the South Pacific and the remainder to be thrown against the hard-pressed Chinese.

In consequence the Japanese are turning against General Chiang a bigger offensive than they have heretofore brought to bear.

The purposes of this campaign are to cut China in two, establish a Japanese west wall from Peiping to Hankow to Canton as a last-barrier protection to the Japanese islands themselves, and so to deprive inner areas of unoccupied China of food supplies as would completely cripple its ability and will to fight.

There are at least five major consequences, damaging to the Allies, which could result from this operation:

1. It will take vital segments of now unoccupied China in the south out of the hands of the Chungking Government, and will drive the Chinese forces 700 to 800 miles farther inland.

2. General Chennault will lose present and potential airfields which would ultimately—when the air power is available—be within long-range bombing distance of Japan itself. New airfields would have to be built hundreds of miles farther inland.

3. Japan would come into full and effective possession of the entire southern coast of China where its present hold is only tenuous and maintained primarily by its ability to control the coastal seas.

4. An Allied landing on the coast of China would be rendered doubly difficult—perhaps as hazardous as the landings in France last week. Admiral Nimitz himself has publicly stated that the Allies intend to bring the war to the Chinese coast, and we must, therefore, have a major port from which to operate. If the Japanese succeed in establishing the Peiping-Hankow-Canton wall in the early future they will deny to the Allies the opportunity of making a coastal landing in the midst of a friendly Chinese population and to which supporting Chinese troops could soon effect a junction.

5. General Chennault was quoted by the Associated Press this week as declaring that the creation by the Japanese of this projected "west wall," dividing and crippling China, would prolong the Asiatic war by years. The prospect may not be quite as omnious as that, but there is no easy assurance that the new Japanese offensive will not succeed and the most conservative judgment among the military here is that it would not fail to put off the defeat of Japan at least a year longer than it otherwise would be and cost the lives of many Chinese and American and British men.

The American-British Chiefs of Staff, now meeting in London, are, it can be said with assurance, not unalert to the gravity of the developing situation in the Far East.

Why Waste $273,355,225 of Our Taxpayers' Money and Spend Another $100,000,000 To Train Personnel for the Same Jobs?—Something That the WASPS Can't Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, this great country of ours was founded on the principle of justice for all. We are now fighting a war to preserve the principle. Yet, in the armed forces of this Nation there is a group of men who are being treated unjustly, victims of indifference and apathy. These unfortunate loyal Americans are the War Training Service trainees, and instructors under the direction of the Civil Aeronautics Administration prior to abandonment of that program. Through association with a number of these men I have become familiarized with the vital facts concerning their plight, and in the name of justice I am compelled to wholeheartedly support the motion to commission these men. There are approximately 9,000 of these forgotten men.

These men entered this program with the thought of serving their country in the air; some did not meet requirements for combat flying because of age or minor physical disability, but they were given the explicit promise of being ferry pilots, transport pilots, air line pilots and copilots, liaison pilots, glider pilots, towtarget pilots, and flight instructors and commissioned as second lieutenants or flight officers upon completion of a certain number of courses. Many of these men had established themselves in the business world and some had families, but they eagerly accepted the opportunity to support the war effort in the air because they could fly. A cry far and wide begging these men to enlist and train and instruct cadets so we could have a great air force was heard the length and breadth of the United States.

First they willingly gave up their jobs, and enrolled in the program without any remuneration. They purchased their own flying khakis, their own goggles, their own helmets; then there was laundry, haircuts, cigarette money; small items, but looming large to a man getting only the bare essentials of room and board. Their wives worked, fathers and mothers sacrificed, some borrowed money, mortgaged property, and they all depleted whatever savings they had, believing that they were contributing to the war cause.

There were interminable delays between courses, and during these times room and board were summarily cut off and the men were on their families. Few employers were willing to hire the men because they did not know from one day to the next when they might be available. When the men were assigned to fields for the next course, there were further delays, lack of instructors, insufficient planes, poor preparation for students, and additional courses were added until the men who had entered the program thinking they could manage on family savings for 6 to 8 months, found themselves in debt and their families in dire need. Finally a bill was passed to give these men $50 a month retroactive to December 1942, giving the men a lump sum of around $250. Some of these men requested a release which was denied. Others stuck it out with the grim hope that the promise of a commission and a job as instructor or other type of flying would make it worth while.

The program was abandoned on January 15, 1944, and these men found that their 12 to 18 months of arduous efforts to fly had been in vain, and the majority of them were assigned to technical schools to start the long grind over again as buck privates.

These trainees are excellent officer material. They have completed successfully the courses prescribed in the regulations issued jointly by the Civil Aeronautics Administration and the Army Air Forces. They have kept faith with the Government and are entitled to commissions in the Army Air Forces. At a time when the distribution of manpower is a vital issue, can we afford to fail to make use of these trained men? Shall we waste the Government's funds already spent to make their training useful? At the present time much of the ferrying work in this country is being done by women, and I say "hats off to them," but there is now a proposal before the Congress that women be trained as cadets and commissioned in the Air Forces. Needless to say, whatever will shorten the war is what we want, but shall we spend more money and time in training noncombat pilots when we have already spent, according to figures of former Executive Director of Training R. McLean Stewart at the hearings before a Senate subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce, February 2 and 3, 1944, $273,355,255 training our great Air Force and for this purpose, and then spend another $100,000,000 to train women pilots for the same specific jobs these men were trained for?

Not only in fairness and justice but from the standpoint of good old-fashioned horse sense, I say that the men we have already trained should be commissioned and given the jobs for which they were trained.

Fair Practices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARY T. NORTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of June 13, 1944:

FAIR PRACTICES

There is a simple yet very vital issue involved in the current fight over funds for the Fair Employment Practice Committee. The issue is: Shall economic opportunity in America be limited on grounds of race, creed, color, or national origin? There can be no doubt as to how the American people, or their Representatives in Congress, would settle this issue if it were stated in these real terms. Unfortunately, however, the issue has been distorted and obscured—imbued with wholly irrelevant emotional overtones and linked with complex questions of interracial relations. Some of this confusion has stemmed from misunderstanding. Some of it has been intentionally obscurantist in purpose.

The F. E. P. C. has as its sole function the elimination of unwarranted discriminatory practices in the employment of American workers. It is not concerned with abstract questions of social equality between races. It is not attempting—and has never attempted—suddenly to make over the mores of any section of the United States. It is not trying to do away with segregation or any of the manifestations of Jim Crowism—however repugnant these may be to democratic principles. As the committee chairman, Malcolm Ross, phrased it in testimony before the House Labor Committee the other day, "The mass of the American people can do as they please in their private lives but when it comes to earning a living, someone else with the hire-and-fire power offers the terms and conditions under which a man can earn his bread."

Race prejudice is an ugly factor in American life. Nevertheless it is a real factor and needs to be faced. The F. E. P. C. did not create race prejudice—as some of its critics have irresponsibly suggested. It is simply a mechanism for counteracting the effects of race prejudice in the economic sphere. As such, it performs a service which is indispensable to the freedom of minority groups and invaluable to the welfare of the American economy as a whole.

During the progress of the war, the F. E. P. C. has done much to integrate the skills and energies of minority elements into our production program. We should have had fewer tanks and planes and landing ships for D-day if workers had been barred from industry through discrimination. In the course of the past 10 months the F. E. P. C. has ended 26 work stoppages in vital production fields which had their origin in unfair employment practices; three of them were serious strikes in the steel industry. Its orderly, understanding approach to labor problems of this nature will be needed more than ever when we encounter the problems of demobilization and reconversion. For in this period discrimination can create chaos. If whole classes of men are denied an opportunity to earn a living because of the color of their skin, they will become desperate and dangerous.

The House has voted an appropriation of half a million dollars to carry on the F. E. P. C.'s work. The Senate Appropriations Committee, despite an unfavorable subcommittee report, has recommended the approval of this sum. Today the Senate as a whole will begin discussion of it. We hope that the discussion will be concerned with the real issue—not with bugbears conjured up to obfuscate it. We cannot deny to citizens of the United States equality of economic opportunity.

Haven for Europe's Refugees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following editorials:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of June 11, 1944]

HAVEN FOR EUROPE'S REFUGEES

The President's press conference statement on the rescue of refugees from Nazi Europe brings some encouraging news. The arrangements for the transfer to a temporary haven at Fort Ontario, N. Y., of a thousand refugees from overcrowded camps in southern Italy means that this country is undertaking at once its share of responsibility for refugees' care. The fact that camps in Italy are overcrowded means that tens of thousands are escaping. The United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration supplementing the President's news, reports that since May 1 six refugee centers in the Middle East have been housing 40,500 Greeks and Yugoslavs, mostly women and children, and that the number is expected to swell to 54,000 soon. These centers are to be expanded and new ones built.

The President indicated that a workable escape route is that through Yugoslavia to Italy—1,800 came out of Yugoslavia last week. This influx taxes facilities in southern Italy and threatens to hamper military activities. Other Mediterranean havens take some, but the overflow, apparently, is great enough to warrant the transfer of a thousand immediately to this country.

The thousand will be admitted outside the regular immigration procedure and given haven here for the duration. "It is contemplated that at the end of the war they will be returned to their homelands," the President wrote. The War Department is to equip Fort Ontario, near Oswego, to receive them, to arrange their transportation from port to camp and take the necessary precautions to see that they remain in camp. The camp will be administered by the War Relocation Board; it will be financed with funds pooled from various Government agencies dealing with foreign relief, supplemented, if necessary, from the President's emergency funds.

This news of the escape of driven and persecuted peoples, with its import of new hope and new heart for thousands, is a poignant preface to the coming liberation of millions like them as the armies of freedom batter through the walls around fortress Europe.

PORT OF REFUGE

We believe that there will be prompt and generous approval of the President's plan to establish at Fort Ontario, near Oswego, a temporary haven for refugees who may escape from the European nations which are still under Hitler's domination. There is nothing in this proposal that seeks to evade the immigration laws or to disturb existing quotas. It is planned to provide food and shelter for approximately a thousand persons. This is only a tiny fraction of the great mass of homeless and helpless people of many faiths and many races who have been victims of the Nazi terror. We hope, ourselves, that more than a mere thousand can be sheltered under an expansion of the present program. But neither those who come now nor the others who may be enabled to come later will come as permanent residents of this country, in excess of the immigration quotas. They will come merely on a temporary basis—as war prisoners come, in fact, or as goods in crates are permitted to enter our free ports, without payment of customs, if they are simply in transit from one foreign country to another. All that the plan involves is an overnight shelter, so to speak, until it becomes possible either to return these distressed people to their native lands or to find permanent homes for them elsewhere.

This is all that the plan involves, but it is enough to be helpful. For it will encourage other nations to take similar steps and, to the extent that it is generally adopted, it will remove one of the great barriers—a lack of places of even temporary refuge—which have been blocking the escape of Hitler's victims. This is a work of mercy. The President believes it important that the United States should share in it, not through words but through deeds. Every warm-hearted American will agree with him and approve his action.

The plan has nothing to do with unrestricted and uncontrolled immigration. It is simply a proposal to save the lives of innocent people.

FREE PORTS

That the President has adopted the idea, first bruited by Mr. Samuel Grafton, of free ports for the detention and care of refugees from war-torn Europe is cause for gratification. The purpose of the plan is to make it possible to grant asylum to refugees without admitting them to the country under the immigration regulations. The analogy for this procedure is the arrangement whereby goods in international trade, not intended for import to this country, can be held in storage, duty-free, until they can be transshipped to their ultimate destination. But the opening of our doors to only 1,000, to be put into a single camp, is a drop in the bucket compared with the needs. Senator GILLETTE and several like-minded Senators feel that we can do more. Of course we can, and the resolution bearing the name of the humanitarian Iowan, which will come before the Senate Wednesday, will give the Senators a chance to say so. The resolution wouldn't involve the assumption of any responsibility that could be called a burden. In authorizing the setting up of rescue camps where entries, selected by the War Refugee Board, would be given temporary sanctuary, it merely enables us to do our part, along with other nations, in shielding a sizable segment of humanity from the defeat-crazed excesses of Nazi butchers.

The proudest tradition any country can boast is that it is a haven for the oppressed and the persecuted. Half a dozen countries are still jealous of that honor. France was a notable example till she was seized by the barbarians to whose victims she used to give such sympathetic sanctuary. Sweden and Switzerland have construed their neutrality as a mandate to succor the hunted from other nations. Hungary, till she was overrun, was hospitable to the Jews fleeing from Germany. Our country, which has been enriched by the persecuted of other lands, has done what it could within the restrictions of the immigration statutes and has a right to a top place among the world's asylums.

Perhaps we have not been as selective as we should. Stories come to one's ears from time to time of troublemakers in our midst, and one wonders how in the world they got their visas. Then there is a horde of rich foreign parasites in New York who are intent only on keeping out of harm's way. In their place one would have liked to see in this country many worthy folk of professional and other attainments who would have been useful additions to the American population. Many of them sought but couldn't get admission. Some of them perforce have had to work for collaborationist governments. It is strange that we use so much talent in the preclusive buying of materials and so little on the preclusive acquirement of people.

The Gillette resolution is a belated attempt to recognize the responsibilities and acknowledge the sympathies of a great people for the victims of furor teutonicus. The policy it seeks to promote is national. But the opportunity is continental, and the attempt should be made to get the other republics of this hemisphere to join in establishing a system of free ports for the people who, after suffering dreadful tribulations, are now in peril of massacre at the hands of our bestial enemy.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, the fifth bond drive opens with two real bangs.

All know that every unnecessary expenditure hinders the war effort.

Out in the country, people do not all have running water or furnaces, but they are free from C. I. O. leaders and Communists yet, thank goodness.

A mockingbird in the giant shrubbery by the House entrance, sings thrillingly each morning since the invasion, as the Members enter—a messenger of victory and cheer.

Greater care by women and children to protect themselves from danger while helping out with farm machinery is imperative. The weekly papers indicate numerous accidents.

Lawrence Cox, 6 foot 4, superintendent of Lake Shawnee, Topeka, resigns to become again a Baptist preacher, in Missouri. We wish you, Larry, the continuous overflow there you have been experiencing.

On Flag Day a Member said before the House, "This is United Nations Day." It used to be the birthday of the Stars and Stripes—the Red, White, and Blue—Old Glory, and it is yet. He just does not know.

Men and women are most interesting. The unfolding of the activities and the abilities of colleagues, especially the newer Members, is a fascinating experience to observe. Wish I dared to particularize.

An editorial here this morning praised Lindbergh for recent research in stratosphere flying and on imparting it to Nimitz's men. This afternoon Japan is bombed from 30,000 feet. Could it be that Charley leads again?

Mr. Brownlee, Deputy Administrator for price in O. P. A., admits he was drawing a salary of $125,000 when he assumed his present duties of holding everybody down. At Harvard he was a coxswain, the little man who steered the shell and shouted the ceilings to the crew.

Our Foreign Policy

OF

HON. FRED J. DOUGLAS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to concur with Governor Dewey in his remarks made before the National Conference of Governors on May 29. He said in part:

> We must not again sit on the side lines as mere observers or commentators while future kaisers and fuehrers and war lords grow stronger and perfect their plans for aggression.

Enlarging upon that expression, it is my own opinion on the future policy of foreign affairs that we must concede that if there is one lesson which the American people have learned from this war, it is that isolationism, or to use the current term, nationalism, breeds world wars. America can no more escape involvement in a world-wide war than she can escape being involved in a world-wide economic depression. The time has passed when nations can live in and by themselves. Like an epidemic of disease, war and economic depression know no boundary lines.

In the process of winning the war, we must not neglect the means to make the dearly won victory a permanent one. This can only be done through American participation with other nations in the field of international relations. Only through such international cooperation can incipient aggression be crushed.

Out of this war is coming some sort of a council of nations. Such a council will be formed for the double purpose of being able to use force, if necessary, to prevent future wars and also to do away with the barriers which prevent trade as between nations and to establish sound monetary standards.

I firmly believe that this can be the war to end all wars if the American people appreciate that the only guaranty against future war is to cooperate freely with other liberty-loving nations to prevent the arising of conditions which promote war. I earnestly favor such cooperation and will lend my support in the House of Representatives to any movement looking toward a cooperative role for the United States in the post-war world.

H. R. 5019 Is a Bill To Create Post-War Opportunity for Small Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD BUFFETT

OF NEBRASKA

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a bill designed to create and expand post-war opportunity by encouraging the establishment of small businesses. This objective must challenge the attention of this Congress.

In contrast to many proposals which provide supervision and governmental wet-nursing, this bill would help the ambitious American who wants to start a small business by eliminating the initial Federal hobbles. This bill would give him a period of freedom from Federal taxes and social-security payments to get his enterprise firmly established.

There are two great benefits of this proposal. The first is that its passage would result in many more small concerns being started because of the encouragement afforded by the provisions of this act. Secondly, the infant-mortality rate among these new small businesses would be much lower because of the tax advantages and lessened overhead resulting from this freedom from expensive governmental red tape and tax burdens.

Perhaps the merit of this proposal can best be demonstrated by an illustration. Two G. I. Joes are discharged from the Army. They want to start an electrical service and repair shop. They have considerable ability along this line, gained from their Army training.

With their discharge pay and a G. I. bill of rights loan—which, incidentally, they could obtain more readily because of the tax exemptions this bill would provide, they decide to open up an electrical shop. This bill would provide that their fledgling business would have approximately 3 years to get on a profitable and paying basis before the tax collector could get in their cash box.

This bill would enable the two G. I. Joes to get started without hiring an expensive accountant to keep track of social security and other payments to the Government. Likewise, it eliminates from the initial burdens of the shop the hiring of expensive legal advice to avoid conflict with tax collectors.

The problems of starting a business are always difficult. During the first few months of any enterprise the cash outgo is large and the cash income is usually small. This bill would give the new business a fair chance to get under way and perhaps accumulate a small reserve before it is subject to Federal collections.

The bill as introduced contains a number of safety provisions to prevent its abuse. Among the protective clauses are the following:

The act shall not apply—

(a) When the invested capital exceeds $100,000; or

(b) When salaries, bonuses, or other remuneration are paid to officers or employees not legitimately engaged in the affairs of the enterprise; or

(c) When the control of the enterprise is held, directly or indirectly, by another enterprise; or

(d) When the enterprise claiming exemption is the outgrowth of, or takes over the assets or business of, an existing business; or

(e) When the company pays over 6 percent return in cash or stock on capital or borrowed funds.

It is possible that other clauses limiting the application of this act should be added to prevent the abuse of its advantages. As introduced, however, the bill provides genuine help for the individual or group of businessmen who would like to start a new enterprise in this difficult period. Legislation of this kind is vitally necessary if the birth rate of new small business, now at the vanishing point, is to be increased, and a healthy economic situation restored.

The small businessman, making up the bulk of the middle classes of America, is an indispensable man in the preservation of the Republic. This legislation or legislation with similar provisions must be passed if this Congress is to give substance to its announced intention of restoring opportunity for small business in America.

Legislation of this nature can well result in the creation of thousands of small businesses, employing hundreds of thousands of workers. Likewise, such legislation will tend to offset the trend toward centralization of economic power, as new small business finds an opportunity to compete on something approaching equal terms with large existing economic units.

All the veterans' legislation passed by this Congress will have little permanent value unless economic opportunity is restored. If present G. I. legislation is to be of long-term benefit, private enterprise must be revitalized. The people of America and the boys on the battlefield recognize this vital fact. It is up to this Congress to face the problem forthrightly and constructively—now.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BROOKS HAYS

OF ARKANSAS

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, last week the tragedy of war came home to my alma mater and that of three of my colleagues from Arkansas, Mr. CRAVENS, Mr. GATHINGS, and Mr. FULBRIGHT. On the University of Arkansas campus, the Congressional Medal of Honor was presented to one whose heroic exploits in Italy a few months ago were heralded throughout the world, and who returns now to his mother, his wife, his friends, handicapped in body but just as stalwart in spirit as when he sparked the Razorback football teams from his position at end.

My reference is to Capt. Maurice Britt. At the University of Arkansas, his journalism teacher was W. J. Lemke, for whom all students who come in contact with him develop an attachment which extends far beyond the campus boundaries and their classroom years.

It was Mr. Lemke's idea that the Congressional Medal of Honor should be presented to Captain Britt at the commencement exercises. He maintains contact with his erstwhile students through what he calls the Journalism News Letter, the sixty-first issue of which, dated June 9, gives a poignant account of the ceremonies—an account which I confess filled my eyes with tears and my heart with resolve to contribute my bit, small though it may be, toward saving future generations of our youth from such terrible sacrifice.

I quote from Mr. Lemke's News Letter to the University journalism alumni:

DEAR GANG: Purpose of today's letter is to give you a report on commencement. The big event, of course, was the presentation of the Congressional Medal of Honor to Capt. Maurice "Footsie" Britt, U. A. journalism grad. * * *

The Britt party arrived by Army plane Sunday afternoon. "Footsie" was accompanied by his wife, Nancy, his mother, medical attendants, and public relations officers. They stayed in Fayetteville until Tuesday morning, when they went to Fort Smith for a reception there in Britt's honor. From Fort Smith "Footsie" returned to Atlanta, where he is a patient in Lawson General Hospital. My first glimpse of Maurice was at an informal reception Sunday night at the home of Johnnie Porter. The last time I had seen him was when he got his journalism A. B. in June 1941.

My first impression Sunday night was "Footsie" hadn't changed a bit. He had the same shy smile and quiet manner of speaking that I remembered from his classroom days. Although his right sleeve is empty and his broken foot encased in a cast and his body covered with shrapnel scars, his morale is excellent and his spirits high. He looks swell. The enemy maimed him but they never dented the courageous good nature that is characteristic not only of Britt but of all American youth both on the gridiron and on the battlefield.

I was hoping I'd get a chance to talk with "Footsie" alone but they kept him on the go constantly and I never got the opportunity. Anyway, that conversation can wait. He did tell me that he got a kick out of the News Letter in which I told about his making a D grade in one of the journalism courses. He rattled off some of the big words we had in that class (critical writing) and said he still didn't know what they mean. The university had asked me to get some "Britt day" pictures, so I and the Speed Graphic were trailing "Footsie" all day. I shot him early in the morning at the Delta Gamma breakfast and noticed that he didn't have any trouble handling the food with his left hand. He gets his artificial arm next week and will spend several months learning to use it.

At noon I shot pictures of the alumni luncheon where "Footsie" sat at the head of the speaker's table flanked by several generals, the Governor of the State, a number of "big shot" financiers, and other celebrities. Britt's wife and mother were seated directly across the table from him. And speaking of his mother—she explains a lot of things about why and how this lad from Lonoke fought through to the top. She's a real American mother. At the luncheon, Britt's former high-school principal and coach introduced him and in his introduction paid a grand tribute to Britt's mother.

At 5:30 that evening I still had the camera pointed at "Footsie." This time it was at a dinner at his fraternity house. The Sigma Chis had rounded up a distinguished gathering of alumni, including Captain Britt, Brig. Gen. Charles G. Hillman, Congressman Bill Fulbright and many others. I noticed several men in uniform whom I knew: Capt. James Woods, of Rogers, just back from 65 missions over Europe (his brother was killed recently on his first mission); Capt. Paul Chambers, returned after 2 years in the Aleutians; Lieutenant Oliver, with ribbons indicating service in both Alaska and Italy; Lt. Herbert L. Thomas Jr., just back from the Pacific; and others.

At 3 p. m. there were close to 8,000 people in Razorback Stadium to see the ceremony in which Captain Britt received the Nation's highest award, the Medal of Honor. I've talked to many people who were there and the consensus is that it was the most impressive ceremony ever held here. It was a stirring sight to see the several hundred men of the Rainbow Division standing in formation on the football field, with their colors of the 48 States forming a semicircle behind the troops. Captain Britt, General Collins of the Rainbow Division, other high ranking officers, State and university officials occupied seats on a reviewing stand built in front of the west stand. At 3:30 Captain Britt left the stand and walked to a position directly in front of the stand. The band played the "Star Spangled Banner." Lieutenant Colonel Tanner of the Forty-second Division read the War Department order and official citation, telling of the action which won the award for Captain Britt. While the Rainbow Division's band played the University's Alma Mater, General Collins and Colonel Tanner left the stand and took their places directly in front of Captain Britt. The general paid high tribute to Captain Britt's bravery and placed the blue ribbon with the Medal of Honor around the Captain's collar. Britt responded in a clear voice and said just exacty the right thing—that he was accepting the honor on behalf of all the men at war today. He said that the real heroes are those who have given their lives in the war and those who are on the battlefronts today. After the presentation Captain Britt and General Collins 'trooped the line' in front of the contingent from the Rainbow Division and then returned to the stand. The troops passed in review.

The ceremony was covered by newsreel, radio, and press. There must have been a hundred photographers out there. I've been in some photo jams in my day but nothing like the mob that shot every feature of the ceremony. Britt was very accommodating and after the ceremony he posed for the cameramen for quite a while. They shot him kissing his wife, hugging his mother, grouped with Coach Rose and Razorback football players, and so on. I didn't stick around to get any posed shots. I'd gotten a lump in my throat when the band played the alma mater. Henry Tovey's great hymn has never been played with the feeling and finesse that the Rainbow Division's band put into it.

It was a ceremony that no one who witnessed it will ever forget. It was a big day for Footsie and he deserved it. And just for the record, I'd like to say that it was my idea that the medal of honor be presented to Footsie on his own college campus and before his home folks. When I read that the medal would be given to Britt in the hospital at Atlanta, I wrote to President Harding that it might be possible to have the ceremony here, where folks from his native Carlisle, from Lonoke where he went to high school, from Fort Smith where Nancy's folks live, and the alumni, students, and townspeople of Fayetteville could join in paying tribute to him. Dr. Harding wrote to Washington and got the ceremony transferred here. Maybe it's immodest for me to claim any credit, but I never was known for my modesty. Anyway, I want a share of Britt. I like to think that there's a bit of me in every student who was in my classes. If I didn't believe that, there wouldn't be any sense to teaching school.

Guess I'm funny. I heard the commencement address, not much of it, but I caught the phrase "private enterprise" occasionally. But I wasn't really listening. I was sitting up there near the back of the Greek Theater, on the grass, and I thought of Tom Lincoln, Bill Russell, and Ned Butler, three U. A. journalists who went out in flaming crashes. Behind me stood a mother whose youngest son had just died the same way. I turned around and looked at her.

At the alumni luncheon I was just as absent-minded. They were introducing the distinguished visitors, but their achievements didn't register with me. Because I was watching the rootin' rubes who waited on table, with their white silk blouses with a razorback on back and their red skirts. In particular, I was watching one rootin' rube, a small dark-haired girl, pretty and smart. Her name is Lou Alice Wright. She was in one of my classes. She's a junior. She wears a wedding ring, but her husband isn't here. She doesn't know where he is. Two years ago last month Sgt. Mack Wright bailed out of a stricken bomber over Lae, New Guinea. His parachute was seen to open. They could recognize him because he always wore a strip of parachute silk around his neck for a scarf. But nobody has seen him since. When he had been missing a year the War Department continued to carry him on the rolls as "missing in action." Last week it was 2 years. And Lou Alice still has her chin out, makes A grades in her studies, carries on.

I don't know why I feel this way. Guess it was Britt saluting with his left hand.

Information for Servicemen, Veterans, and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARION T. BENNETT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee of the House of Representatives, the committee charged with preparation of laws for veterans of World Wars Nos. 1 and 2, it has often come to my attention that many of those now in the service, as well as veterans and their dependents, frequently do not get all the benefits to which they are entitled simply because they do not know about them. This is understandable because there is so much legislation on veterans benefits it is too much to ask the busy average citizen to keep abreast of it.

I have had many inquiries from my district for an outline of the benefits we in Congress have made available to the servicemen, veterans, and their dependents. The Government of the United States is liberal with those who have worn the uniform of their country. Our soldiers, sailors, and marines are the best paid and best equipped in the world. Our veterans and their dependents receive more adequate care than any others in the world. This is a field in which our Government has taken the lead. Much needed to be done remains undone. We cannot anticipate at this time all the requirements which will have to be met. We do not know at this time what our country can afford to pay in full settlement of its obligation to veterans. These are questions for the future. I am proud that I have had an active part and a special responsibility as a member of the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee in promoting much of the progressive legislation now on the lawbooks and of benefit to veterans and their dependents. The country owes a special duty to help readjust the veteran to civilian life and, as President Abraham Lincoln said, "To care for his widow and orphans." That is historic American policy.

I have prepared, in cooperation with the Veterans' Administration, an outline of information indicating the kind and amount of benefits currently available under Federal law, the qualifications therefor, and how to proceed to get them. In this outline monetary benefits based upon service-connected disability or death are referred to as compensation and pension. The reason for use of both terms is that, under existing laws, the service-connected monetary benefits for World War No. 1 veterans and their dependents are termed compensation, while World War No. 2 service-connected benefits are termed pension.

I repeat, this is only an outline. Any citizen can get more detailed information from the Veterans' Administration or from his Congressman about these benefits. The citizens of the Sixth Missouri Congressional District, which I represent, can continue to get help on their problems by addressing their inquiries to me as follows: Congressman MARION T. BENNETT, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I want to make it clear that while this legislation is helpful, the greatest benefit Congress can assure the serviceman, veteran, and his dependents, is to preserve the Constitution of the United States which assures freedom of enterprise and opportunity. Under our form of government we need only to help the veteran to help himself. A free and prosperous people at peace is the American way. The greatest issue before the American people today is the answer to the question, What will the boys find over here when it is over over there?

OUTLINE OF BENEFITS FOR SERVICEMEN, VETERANS, AND THEIR DEPENDENTS UNDER EXISTING LAW—COMPENSATION AND PENSION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH

Service-connected disability: Under the veterans regulations promulgated under the act of March 20, 1933, as amended, honorably discharged veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 are entitled to compensation or pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by such service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10 percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month. While the World War No. 2 veterans were entitled to these rates following the act of December 19, 1941, they were placed on complete parity under the veterans regulations by the act of July 13, 1943, Public Law No. 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, with reference to the requirements governing proof of service connection of disability. The latter act also liberalized the regulation concerning the presumption of soundness upon entry into service. Under Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the monthly rates of compensation or pension payable to veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2, including veterans entitled to wartime rates based upon service on or after September 16, 1940, for service-incurred disability, not including special awards and allowances fixed by law, were increased by 15 percent.

In lieu of such pension or compensation, reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States, meeting the requirements of the Army regulations pertaining to retirement of officers of the Regular Establishment, are retired by the War Department, certified to the Veterans' Administration, and their retired pay equal to 75 percent of their base pay is paid by the Veterans' Administration out of the pension appropriation.

Nonservice-connected disability: Under Public Law No. 313, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the rate of pension for permanent and total nonservice-connected disability, applicable to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion, the Philippine Insurrection and World War No. 1, was increased from $40 to $50 per month with an increase to $60 per month where such veterans have been rated permanent and total and in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years, or reach the age of 65 and are permanently and totally disabled. This act also provides that the above pension for non-service-connected disability shall apply to veterans of both World War No. 1 and World War No. 2.

Service-connected death: The rates of compensation or pension for widows, children, and dependent parents of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 veterans based upon death in service, or service-connected death, are as follows:

Widow, no child	$50
Widow, 1 child (with $13 for each additional child)	65
No widow, but 1 child	25
No widow, but 2 children (with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100)	38
Dependent father and mother:
Each	25
Or 1 only	45

The above rates are contained in Public Law No. 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, July 13, 1943, and constitute a material liberalization of the prior rates.

Non-service-connected death: The widow, child, or children, of any deceased veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 are entitled to the following rates of compensation if the veteran at the time of death from a non-service-connected cause had a disability incurred in or aggravated by such war service.

Widow but no child	$35
Widow and 1 child (with $5 for each additional child)	45
No widow but 1 child	18
No widow but 2 children (equally divided)	27
No widow but 3 children (equally divided)	36
With $4 for each additional child (the total amount to be equally divided).

Payments are limited to an aggregate of $64 in any one case.

Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, act of May 27, 1944, increased the rates to the above amounts and also included widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans, the law previously having applied only to World War No. 1 veterans.

Claims and effective date of awards: Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred to a Veterans' Administration facility, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area offices for adjudication, the applicant should file claim on proper form which will be supplied upon inquiry addressed to any Veterans' Administration facility or regional office, or to the local representative of the American Red Cross or of a veterans' service organization.

Under interagency agreement a person who is to be discharged from military or naval service is in need of further hospital care, prior arrangements are made by the commanding officer to afford him opportunity to file all necessary claims, supply necessary clinical and service data and to send the veteran to the Veterans' Administration facility designated to receive him. (Cf. A. R. 615-360, change No. 4, April 16, 1943.) If the disabled person is insane or incompetent, the manager of the Veterans' Administration facility will file all necessary claims for him.

Upon death in service, the service department notifies the Veterans' Administration, and claims forms are sent immediately to all known dependents.

Groups potentially eligible for pensions: All members of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, members of the Public Health Service or of the Coast and Geodetic Survey when ordered to active service with the Army or Navy or as to United States Public Health Service while serving outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska, and as to Coast and Geodetic Survey when assigned during present war to duty on business of War or Navy Departments in areas outside continental United States or in Alaska or coastal areas of the United States as determined by the War and Navy Departments to be of immediate military hazard, are potentially eligible for pensions.

The Women's Auxiliary Army Corps was not in the active service; and, while the several Women's Reserve Corps of the Navy, Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard originally were in the active service, they were by statute precluded from pension eligibility; in lieu thereof, being subject to laws pertaining to employees' compensation. Legislation was subsequently enacted making the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard components eligible potentially for pension benefits—Public Law 110, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved July 1, 1943; Public Law 183, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved November 8, 1943; and Public Law 214, approved December 23, 1943.

Awards to date: Pension payments to veterans of World War No. 2 and their dependents total $37,760,572.78 through March 1944. In addition, retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administration to Reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States, totaled $1,020,137.33 from July 1, 1942, through March 31, 1944.

Disbursements for the relief of World War No. 1 veterans and their dependents from 1918 through March 1944 for disability and death compensation or pension, service connected and nonservice connected, totaled $5,007,029,954.54. In addition, disbursements for World War No. 1 Emergency officers' retirement pay through March 31, 1944, totaled $84,889,697.63. Our older veterans are not being forgotten just because there is a new and larger crop, as these figures prove.

MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL CARE, PROSTHETIC APPLIANCES, AND DOMICILIARY CARE

Eligibility is extended to any veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 honorably discharged, having a service-connected disability requiring such care, treatment, or appliance, or one who was discharged for disability and not dishonorably; also one not dishonorably discharged, who is unable to defray his expenses, has tuberculosis or a neuropsychiatric ailment or disability which requires hospital care.

Dependent upon availability of facilities, eligibility includes any veteran of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 not dishonorably discharged, suffering from disability, disease, or defect, and who is in need of such care and is unable to defray the expenses therefor—regardless of whether the disability, disease, or defect was due to service.

The service groups included are all components of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, the respective Women's Reserves thereof, and United States Public Health Service, and Coast and Geodetic Survey under the conditions stated for pension purposes.

The Veterans' Administration maintains 94 facilities and has contract facilities with a total of 92,019 beds, distributed as follows (as of March 23, 1944):

Tuberculosis	6,212
Neuropsychiatric	39,417
General medical and surgical	25,658
Domiciliary	16,117
Contract—other governmental	4,227
State and private	388
Total	92,019

Diagnostic centers, with expert specialists available, are maintained at Hines, Chicago, Ill.; San Francisco, Calif.; and Mount Alto, Washington, D. C. Cancer clinics: Bronx, N. Y.; Hines, Chicago, Ill.; Mount Alto, Washington, D. C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Portland, Oreg.; and Los Angeles, Calif.

The present building program will raise this total to more than 100,000 beds. The Veterans' Administration anticipates an eventual need of 300,000 beds to enable veterans of World War No. 2 and of prior wars to receive hospital and domiciliary care to the same extent as is now provided. However, this estimated maximum should not be needed until long after the war or require the eventual additional construction of more than 100,000 beds, since there will be, under present plans, 100,000 beds in Veterans' Administration facilities, and it is anticipated that it should be possible to obtain the same number from the Army and Navy shortly after the termination of the war.

Claims: Any person who is to be discharged from active service and who is in need of and entitled to hospitalization by the Veterans' Administration, is transferred directly to the Veterans' Administration facility designated to receive him. Claim for all benefits, and necessary clinical and service data accompany him, or are filed by the manager if the veteran is insane or incompetent.

All others should file claim for treatment or hospitalization directly with the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office—one, or more, in each State in the Union except Delaware.

Sixty-four thousand nine hundred and eighty-two veterans of World War No. 2 have been hospitalized by the Veterans' Administration through April 30, 1944. On April 30, 1944, there were 44,967 World War No. 1 veterans and 12,866 World War No. 2 veterans receiving hospitalization, and 8,477 World War No. 1 veterans and 196 World War No. 2 veterans receiving domiciliary care from the Veterans' Administration.

While domiciliary care cannot be said to be a part of the rehabilitation process, it is a valuable benefit for those who have reached a permanent state of disability and have no other means of support.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved by the President March 24, 1943, provides—

First, that any person who served in the active military or naval service at any time after December 6, 1941, and prior to the termination of the present war;

Second, and who was honorably discharged;

Third, and who has a disability incurred in or aggravated by such service for which pension is payable under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration or would be but for the receipt of retirement pay;

Fourth, who is in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of such disability, shall be entitled to such vocational rehabilitation as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit him for employment consistent with the degree of disablement.

Immediately following the passage of that legislation there was created in the Veterans' Administration a vocational rehabilitation service composed of three divisions, namely, the Vocational Advisement Division, the Training Into Employment Division, and the Research Division. The planning and control functions created by the administration of this act are exercised in the central office of the Veterans' Administration. All operations, including determinations of need for training, vocational advisement, induction into training, supervision, as well as the selection of training facilities, are functions of the Vocational Rehabilitation Division in that facility of the Veterans' Administration having jurisdiction of the territory in which the veteran resides. There are 53 such facilities. These facilities are, generally speaking, bound by State boundary lines. In a few States there is more than one facility. Missouri has one at Kansas City and another at St. Louis. The course of training prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit the veteran for employment may not exceed 4 years and may not extend beyond 6 years after the termination of the present war.

The purpose of rehabilitation is to restore employability lost by virtue of a handicap due to service-incurred disability. In performing the functions imposed upon the Administration by Public Law 16, it will be the purpose of the Veterans' Administration to utilize educational institutions and establishments of recognized standing in the training of these disabled veterans into employment and to train each person as near his home as may be possible. In securing employment, a problem which obviously will be very great after the end of the war and perhaps acute after demobilization has been accomplished, every available Federal and State facility will be utilized. Employment of veterans has been accomplished to a considerable extent through the United States Employment Service. It will be the purpose to correlate these activities to the end that those vocationally trained will be graduated into employment opportunities.

While the disabled veteran is in training his pension, unless it equals or exceeds such amounts, will be increased to $80 per month, if single; $90 per month, if married, with $5 additional for each child, and $10 for each dependent parent. All expenses of training, including necessary transportation, are paid. Medical care is given as required.

Claims: Those persons discharged from the service directly to the Veterans' Administration facilities for hospitalization will have their claims filed and processed; and the question of need for and entitlement to vocational rehabilitation may be given consideration as soon as the individual's physical and mental condition make training feasible. Any other person honorably discharged from the service may make claims for vocational rehabilitation in the claim for pension which may be filed at the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office.

INSURANCE

National service life insurance: National service life insurance was provided under the act of October 8, 1940, Public Law No. 801, Seventy-sixth Congress, and liberalizing amendments thereto were enacted during the Seventy-seventh and Seventy-eighth Congresses. A number of other liberalizing proposals are pending in the present Congress and the Veterans' Administration has submitted certain proposed changes found to be justified by studies conducted. Application may be made for not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000 without physical examination prior to the expiration of 120 days from entrance into active service. Thereafter, any such person in the active military or naval service may apply if the application be accompanied by acceptable evidence of good health.

Applications: Application forms are supplied the service departments, and may be obtained from the commanding officer or designated insurance officer. The applicant may elect to pay premiums in cash, or by allotment of pay. Policies are not issued during the war, but insurance certificate is mailed to the address designated by applicant.

The insurance is against death only, but includes waiver of premiums during total disability existing for more than 6 months, and commencing prior to insured's sixtieth birthday. The policy is a 5-year level premium term policy with rate based upon the American experience table of mortality and 3 percent interest— the Government assuming the extra hazard of the military and naval service and the administrative expense. The insurance is payable only to a widow (widower), child (including a stepchild or illegitimate child, if designated as beneficiary by the insured), parent (including person in loco parentis), brother and sister of the insured; and is payable only in monthly installments. The insured may change the beneficiary designation at any time.

After the policy has been in effect for at least 1 year, while in force it may be converted to an ordinary life, 20-payment life or 30-payment life policy upon application to the Veterans' Administration without medical examination.

In cases where the person in service died or became totally disabled, or was captured or isolated by the enemy prior to April 20, 1942, and had less than $5,000 insurance in effect, the law provides that gratuitous insurance to an aggregate of $5,000 shall be deemed in effect. Claims for such gratuitous insurance should be filed as soon as possible, because of limitations. In most of these death cases only a widow, child, or dependent parent can claim such insurance.

As of March 30, 1944, over 14,303,291 applications had been received, representing a total amount of nearly $105,596,766,000 of insurance. The average policy was approximately $7,382.69; the average coverage per life approximately $8,926.74.

The insurance is payable in the event of the death of the insured while the policy is in force to a beneficiary or beneficiaries, which may be designated by the insured, only within the relationship of widow or widower, child, parent, brother, or sister. The proceeds of the policy are payable as an annuity in 240 equal monthly installments of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance to any beneficiary who is under 30 years of age at the time of the death of the insured; otherwise, in continuous monthly installments throughout the lifetime of the beneficiary, with a guaranty of the payment of 120 monthly installments to the surviving relatives of the insured who are within the permitted class of beneficiaries. The amount of the monthly installment under the latter mode of payment is dependent upon the age of the beneficiary at date of death of insured. For example, if the beneficiary is then 40 years old, monthly installment is $4.50 for each $1,000 of insurance; if 50, $5.39; if 60, $6.81; if 70, $8.51.

The beneficiary would receive under a policy of $5,000 or $10,000, for example, monthly payments, beginning at the stated ages, in the following amounts: $27.55–$55.10, $22.50–$45, $26.95–$53.90, $34.05–$68.10, and $42.55–$85.10.

Claims: All claims for insurance benefits should be addressed to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C., but necessary forms may be secured from the nearest Veterans' Administration facility.

United States Government life (converted) insurance: This insurance can be applied for only by those who served in World War No. 1. No one may have more than $10,000 national service life insurance and Government (converted) insurance combined.

Insurance premiums are guaranteed by Government under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended: Any person in the active service having a commercial life policy or policies meeting the requirements of said law, article IV, may, upon application to the Veterans' Administration on form supplied the Army and Navy, secure guaranty of premiums, on amount of insurance not in excess of $10,000, while he is in the service during the present war. The insurance premiums so guaranteed by the Government constitute a lien against the policy and must be paid by the company out of any settlement thereof. In the event of the insured's discharge from service, he has a period of 2 years within which to pay the premiums with interest so guaranteed or otherwise such indebtedness constitutes a loan on the policy with interest and if the amount of such indebtedness exceeds the cash surrender value, the policy is automatically canceled and the Government pays the insurer the difference between such cash surrender value and the indebtedness. Forms for making application for such insurance protection are supplied to the War and Navy Departments and may be secured in person or from his commanding officer or other designated official.

As of March 31, 1944, 72,204 applications with insurance totaling $178,189,853.21 have been approved and premiums guaranteed.

INSURANCE UNDER OTHER LAWS

Old-age and survivors insurance is administered by the Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency; unemployment benefits by Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency; retirement by Railroad Retirement Board and Civil Service Commission. Credit for active military or naval service is allowed for civil-service retirement and railroad retirement purposes.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

Mustering-out pay is provided by the act of February 3, 1944, Public Law 225, Seventy-eighth Congress, and is administered by the War and Navy Departments. The amounts are from $100 to $300.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES

Administered by the War and Navy Departments for dependents of those in the service. Your Congressman can supply many details about this subject and help get delayed allotments straightened out for dependents of servicemen.

DOMICILIARY CARE

United States Soldiers' Home, under jurisdiction of the War Department; Naval Home, under jurisdiction of the Navy Department. This is in addition to that provided by the Veterans' Administration.

GUARDIANSHIP

Supervision is maintained, in cooperation with the State courts, over payments of any benefits made on account of insane or minor beneficiaries to insure proper application of such benefits.

RETIREMENT PAY

Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard: For officers and enlisted personnel of the Regular Establishment, and reserve components of Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard.

TAXES

Bureau of Internal Revenue: All veteran benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration are exempt from all taxation. Special consideration is shown in the income-tax laws for those in the service.

BURIAL ALLOWANCE

Up to the amount of $100 may be paid for any war veteran, honorably discharged or in receipt of pension or compensation, as to any veteran discharged from the armed forces for disability incurred in line of duty or in receipt of pension for service-connected disability.

A United States flag to drape the casket, subsequently to be turned over to the next of kin, may be furnished as to any veteran, discharged honorably after active service during any war or after serving at least one enlistment or by reason of disability incurred in line of duty. Burial in a national cemetery may be arranged for any honorably discharged veteran or for anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances, as to his minor children or adult unmarried daughters. The expenses incident to transporting the body of one who has died while in active service, or of a veteran who has died in a Veterans' Administration facility, to the place of burial, are, within limitations, borne by the Government. Headstone or marker—stone or marble—will be furnished for the unmarked grave of any honorably discharged veteran or as to anyone who died while in the active service. There is a national cemetery at Springfield, Mo.

Various benefits, rights, and privileges are also provided as to certain veterans, their dependents, and their organizations under State laws, as per the résumé thereof, as published by the House Committee on Pensions, entitled "State Veterans' Laws."

CIVIL, SPANISH, AND OTHER WARS

Pensions on the basis of age, degree of inability to earn a living, and/or length of service for (1) Civil War veterans, in the amount of $75 per month, or $100, if in need of a regular attendant, (2) Indian War veterans, in amounts ranging from $20 to $55 per month, or $100, if in need of an attendant, and (3) veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Rebellion, in amounts ranging from $12 to $75 per month, plus varying amounts if in need of a regular attendant, with total not to exceed $100 but only $8 while being furnished hospital treatement or domiciliary care by the Veterans' Administration if the veteran has no dependents, provided that as to those in a soldiers' home continually since on or before July 15, 1943, the pension of $50 shall be continued.

Pension of $50 per month for veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, Boxer Rebellion, or World War No. 1, with 90 days or more of honorable service, or, if less than 90 days, if discharged for disability incurred in line of duty, who suffer with permanent total disability, regardless of service connection, if not due to misconduct. Only $8 per month is paid to single men, without dependents, while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care by a Government agency.

EDUCATION

Congress provided in 1944 that any veteran who served on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to termination of the present war, and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, and whose education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted or interfered with by reason of his entrance into the service, or who desires a refresher or retraining course, and who served 90 days or more, is entitled to education at public expense. Application must be made therefor within 2 years after discharge. The Government will pay to the school of the veteran's choice, up to $500 per year for tuition and books and will pay to the veteran $50 per month maintenance if single and $75 if married, not to exceed 4 years. Any person who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service is assumed to have had his education interrupted. Veterans must meet the regular entrance and scholarship requirements.

FARM, HOME, AND SMALL BUSINESS OWNERSHIP

The Federal Government, through the Administrator of Veterans Affairs, will guarantee up to 50 percent and as high as $2,000 of any approved loan secured by a veteran from a private or Government source for purchase or operation of a farm, home or small business. Loans will be interest free the first year and interest will not exceed 4 percent per annum. Applications for this benefit must be made to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs within 2 years after discharge by those who served in the armed forces on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to termination of this war.

JOBS

Congress provided, in 1944, in addition to the foregoing education, farm, home, and small business opportunities, that every veteran of World War No. 2 shall be helped to find a job. The United States Employment Service and the Veterans' Placement Service Board cooperate to fill this responsibility. Veterans are to be registered and every effort made to assist them to find jobs. This provision includes veterans of all wars. Information on how to get the benefits of this provision can be obtained by the veteran from his own local United States Employment Office in his home town or county.

Return to the job after discharge is under jurisdiction of Selective Service; placing in other jobs is under War Manpower Commission; veterans' preference is administered by United States Civil Service Commission and various departments and agences; job training, rehabilitation (nonservice disability) is administered by Federal Security Agency.

Certain preferences as to Federal civil service, as to physical and age prerequisites, examinations, ratings, appointments, retentions, and reinstatement of Federal employment, are extended to qualified service-connected disabled veterans, the wives of unemployable service-connected or 50-year-aged pensioned veterans, the widows of veterans, and other war veterans and regulars, supplemented by extensive United States Employment Service and Veterans Employment Service, in every State, for war veterans. Any World War No. 2 veteran who applies therefor, within 40 days after discharge, is entitled to reinstatement to the Federal position held at time of entering service, or to one of equal grade and pay, or to his previous private employment, where at all practicable for employer, enforceable by order of court, if necessary.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

Congress provided in 1944 that for the first 2 years after a veteran's discharge he will be entitled to unemployment compensation for 52 weeks if he cannot find a job or the Employment Service cannot find one for him. This allowance is $20 per week, less that part of the wages payable to him for such week which is in excess of $3. Provisions for unemployment compensation, farm, home, and business ownership and education, are part of the so-called G. I. Bill of Rights, one of many veterans' bills prepared in 1943-44 by the World War Veterans' Committee, of which I am a member. By enacting the G. I. Bill of Rights, and other similar legislation, Congress has established a beachhead in America for all of our returning veterans. I repeat, the serviceman, veterans and their dependents can continue to receive help and information on their problems from their Representatives in Congress, who are in daily touch with such matters. The address for residents of the Sixth Missouri Congressional District to write to is Congressman MARION T. BENNETT, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The Intercoastal Shipping Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I have just received through the mails a reprint of an editorial from the Nautical Gazette, the oldest maritime publication in the United States. The editorial strikes me as being interesting and it is devoted to a timely suggestion. My thought is that other Members of Congress and readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD might like to read it also:

PLANS FOR RESTORING THE INTERCOASTAL SERVICE

When the subject of post-war plans for American shipping is being discussed and the air becomes thick with theories for developing and protecting our maritime interests, there is never much quibbling over the contention that in the scheme of things to come the straightest road back to sound commercial sea power lies along the established routes of our Intercoastal Service.

Rich in the grandest traditions of our maritime history, the present version of the intercoastal trade dates from the opening of the Panama Canal in 1914. Its foundations, however, were established firmly by the hardy breed of men who operated the Atlantic packets and the clipper ships of '49. The policy of restriction of the coastwise trade to American flag vessels was adopted by statute as early as March 1, 1817, and these coasting trade laws were extended in application later to the Territory of Alaska, Puerto Rico, and Hawaii.

The men and the ships engaged in the Intercoastal Service have rated the spot they occupy in the shipping picture for services rendered, and it is in such a spirit—and not with one eye glued to the dollar sign on ships being operated by the Government in this emergency—that we should consider the problems they will face when the war is over.

Signs recently emanating from Washington—many of them discernible in the inspired news stories of the Capital's press corps—indicated that certain spokesmen for the Government were of the opinion that it was about time for authorized representatives of the shipping industry to announce their post-war plans, if any—the implication being that perhaps the shipping men could not agree among themselves as to how normal operations should be resumed. Factually, the latter assumption is erroneous.

Naturally, there are many details about which various shipping company executives do not see eye to eye, but behind the alleged delay—if there has been any—in announcing their post-war plans is a completely warranted reluctance against placing themselves in a precarious position by a premature statement of their aims when they don't even know what their starting position is going to be. Before projecting any elaborate plans for what at this stage are rather nebulous future operations, every man with a dollar invested in the shipping business would like to know the answers to several questions that vitally affect his stake in the post-war world. Boiled down to the bare essentials of the real problems facing the intercoastal operator, some of the questions being asked in the trade are:

"If a requisitioned ship has done ton for ton what a new ship has done—and it must be remembered that the old ship did it when it was most needed—will the post-war policy of the Government be to exchange ship for ship?

"What are the possible earnings of the new ship as compared with the old ship?

"Are the possible earnings any greater because the ship is new, or do the possible earnings depend on other factors?

"Is it not true that a ship-for-ship exchange would be justified if a new ship placed in the intercoastal service had no greater earning possibilities than an old ship?

"If the earnings of a new ship are presumed to be potentially greater than the pre-war ship, does not the difference represent the added value of the new ship over the old ship?

"If an intercoastal steamship company failed to make money with an old ship, should it be presumed that it will make money with a new ship?

"If a long-established intercoastal company is certain that it could not buy a new ship and operate it profitably in the intercoastal service, how could a new operator, facing higher capitalization costs and without experience in the field, enter the service and operate new ships at a profit?

"Looking at the ships, old or new, as instruments of commerce and not as representing so many dollars—dollars which in this case represent an abnormal war cost—the question of prime importance should be, How efficient is each ship as an instrument of commerce? How does one of the old ships compare with one of the new ones as an instrument of commerce?

"Lastly, if an old ship has been properly maintained and can carry the same amount of goods as cheaply as a new ship, is the new ship worth any more than the old ship as an instrument of commerce?"

The five-point program offered to the Maritime Commission for study by its subcommittee on domestic shipping does not answer the major questions that are bothering shipping men today. The subcommittee might have reached more definite conclusions if its recommendations had been based on a greater awareness of the fact that as a result of measures taken by the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration, the earnings of steamship companies have been reduced by approximately 66⅔ percent since we became involved in the war.

During this period, as Admiral Land stated recently in commending the shipping industry's record of wartime cooperation, while steamship earnings were being reduced over 60 percent, corporate earnings generally have increased over 40 percent and the earnings of the transportation agencies, such as railroads, have increased over 100 percent. These figures tell a story that must not be forgotten during post-war discussions.

On the issue of ship replacements, the subcommittee recommends that the vessels to be made available from the Government pool should be sold at prices to be determined by a formula set up in the Bland-Bailey bill recently introduced in Congress. This formula presumably has been approved tentatively by the Maritime Commission. The subcommittee also recommends that the Maritime Commission should announce a definite, clear-cut policy with respect to the replacement and maintenance of as many craft as can be economically employed on the intercoastal run. Unless it is unexpectedly granted some superhuman powers of foresight, the Maritime Commission should gracefully duck any such assignment as this, or else be prepared to hear more howls than ever emanated from a Kilkenny cat fight.

The answers to the question outlined by representatives of the intercoastal service should be predicated on familiarity with the traditional importance of this service in the scheme of our national defense. Protected from foreign-flag competition, the intercoastal service must compete against rail and air-borne transportation, but it has no peer as a freight-carrying service. This is its traditional peacetime role, but if we are to maintain a naval force equal to our responsibilities and needs following the end of present hostilities, it is from the intercoastal service that the Government can best requisition vessels for an emergency on short notice.

The naval train must be built up and maintained by the employment of new vessels in the intercoastal service. High-speed ships that might be considered uneconomical or unnecessary under normal conditions would be absolutely essential in wartime. Fast, modern craft, operated by people familiar with the business of intercoastal shipping, should remain the first line of our merchant marine defense. The intercoastal service should be groomed and developed primarily for protective reasons, but the factor of proper utilization in peacetime should not be overlooked.

The intercoastal fleet, as United States Naval Reserve ships, should maintain high personnel standards. They could be detached from time to time to serve in the train during maneuvers. Under this system, the nation would get something permanent for the Government's investment of the taxpayers' war dollars and, if developed properly, the companies which have been engaged in the intercoastal shipping business for generations could maintain operations without being hampered by the constant fear of meeting the hungry wolf of top-heavy operating expenses on their doorstep every month.

Forgetting war-spent dollars for the moment, the intercoastal shipping service if developed along these lines could be made into the finest kind of a training service, a wide avenue for the advancement of our new sea-conscious youth, a feeder for the Navy, and a service where naval men could find places for themselves at the end of their enlistments.

An unholy interest in dollars and cents already spent to meet the challenge of delivering the goods to win the war will not solve the problems confronting our merchant marine. History has demonstrated in the case of Spain, with its slow gold-laden galleons, that pieces-of-eight do not command respect or inspire fear at sea. Fast ships, well-manned, comprise a nation's maritime strength, not bars of gold in the ground vaults at Fort Knox.

No stalemate has been reached on these issues. The Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration have not announced any arbitrary decisions as to post-war policy. The time is approaching, however, when representatives of the Government and the shipping interests should meet and state their views on the problems that are certain to confront them as soon as the war is over. All progress is the result of compromises made by conflicting groups to reach an agreement. In this case, an important factor in the future of the Nation's defense is at stake.

It behooves both sides to assume these responsibilities with dignity and courage. There is no reason under the sun why any details should become an obstacle to final agreement. The post-war plan finally agreed upon for the Intercoastal Service should be the best of all possible plans from the standpoint of the industry, the Government, and the people they serve.

The Mocking Bird, Mississippi's State Bird, Now Demands National Recognition

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, it is more than fitting that we occasionally have a note of gladness to cheer us in these solemn hours.

Some time ago I called the attention of the House to the fact that the Legislature of Mississippi had selected the mocking bird as the official bird—the feathered emblem of our State.

He seems now to be appealing to Congress for national recognition. Just outside the front door of the Capitol, atop a cluster of shrubbery, there is one that every person in the United States ought to hear.

I believe he is the most irresistible lobbyist I have ever known. Men fairly melt beneath the magnetism of his matchless eloquence. If something is not done about it, he is going to captivate the whole Congress, and have himself unanimously chosen as our national representative of "all the feathered tribe."

Members become so entranced that they have to literally tear themselves away to keep from missing the sessions of the House. You know it is said that Alcibiades once stopped up his ears and fled from the presence of Socrates for fear that he would grow old listening to his eloquence. He afterwards caused the downfall of Greece.

Maybe the country would be better off if more of us would pause and listen longer to the song of this all-American bird.

I have asked that his "remarks be taken down" and transmitted by radio to every home in America, and to our soldiers overseas. What an inspiration it would be for those brave boys from the South who are on the various fighting fronts to hear this familiar note from home.

The average person outside of the South never heard a real mockingbird; and I want them to understand just what temptation we are being subjected to by the wiles of this "amorous sojourner."

He is the most persuasive witness that has yet appeared to testify before Congress in his own behalf.

He seems to know when Congress convenes, and does not waste his time here in the early morning hours; but takes his stand in front of the Supreme Court building. He was there as I came along this morning, perched upon the flagpole, with the Stars and Stripes streaming below, making the welkin ring with his tireless serenade. I wish the members of the Supreme Court could have heard him. Maybe he would have inspired that august tribunal to get back "on the beam."

To me it was a glorious picture—the finest expression of American nature, above the emblem of American authority, enlivening the morning hours with his boundless repertoire, as he repeated the songs of other birds with a musical cadence that should be an inspiration to the gods.

He seemed to lift me from the ground and carry me back across the tide of years, wafted, as it were, upon the wings of memory, to the unforgotten scenes of long ago.

I just want to warn you Members now that if you don't want to be swept off your feet and stampeded into voting him the greatest songbird on earth, and adopting him as our national emblem, you had better use the subway in going to and returning from your offices; for, knowing you as I do, I doubt if a single one of you is so devoid of sentiment that you could hold out long against his entrancing appeal.

For my part, I am already convinced. I am ready to support him now; and I believe if it were put to a vote he would sweep the Congress.

Then he would probably make a drive on the peace conference, and have himself selected as the choice of all the civilized nations of the earth, and given rightful recognition as the greatest feathered songster in the world.

Many years ago I delivered a short address before the Mississippi Society here in Washington on the southern mocking bird. At that time, I was accused of exaggerating by a few realistic representatives of the press. I now call as witnesses every Member of this House.

Just step outside the front door and get, not only the ocular proof, as Shakespeare says, but the auricular proof as well; and I am sure you will return the unanimous verdict rendered by the Queen of Sheba after her visit to King Solomon that "the half has never yet been told."

I repeat what I said at that time, and insert those remarks for you to verify. Here is what I said then:

Mr. Chairman, it has indeed been a pleasure to me to listen to your excellent musical program, and especially to the imitations of bird songs as illustrated by that celebrated writer and naturalist, Schuyler Mathews, in his delightful book on Wild Birds and Their Music.

The only suggestion I have to offer is that before he puts out another edition of his wonderful work that distinguished gentleman should take a postgraduate course in his chosen field of study by going down into Mississippi and reveling in the songs of the southern mockingbird—the greatest singer of them all.

I can understand how one who has never heard him can extol in superlative terms the songs of other birds, for as Shakespeare has wisely stated, "The crow doth sing as sweetly as the lark when neither is attended."

And if, as the poet Burton has said, "A nightingale dies for shame if another bird sings better," then one melodious trill of Dixie matchless songster would put a world of nightingales to instant and shameful death.

He is the master of them all.

The Caruso of field and forest, the Mozart of wild music, the grand opera of Nature, he seems to embrace within his boundless repertoire the songs of all the birds that have ever lived and those that are yet to come.

As courageous as the eagle, he guards with valor and with vigilance his nestlings and his mate, repelling the invasion of the dreaded hawk, and scattering a flock of intruding crows in ignominious flight. As gentle as the dove, he manifests the highest attributes of civilization as prescribed by the golden rule by reflecting in his daily life the sentiments of his song.

It has been said that musical expression is confined to the highest natures, and that therefore birds of prey never sing.

The friendless vulture that waits his way in geometric figures over the sunny landscape, measuring with his fleeting shadow those double circles which meet only at the bedside of death, or on the field of carnage, never sings a song. The weird owl, the nightly terror of all the feathered tribe, the most ghastly and striking emblem of desolation and despair, never warbles a note. The loathsome vampire, that detestable plague of the tropics, that reputed pest to human life, never breathes a tune.

I would rather be the mockingbird which Longfellow has described as "swinging aloft on a willow spray" and shaking from his little throat "such floods of delirious music" that all the world would seem to pause and listen, to live for one short hour, than to be the venomous toad and exist throughout a century, or to be the loathsome reptile and live a thousand years.

We dignify as a national emblem the American eagle that soars and shrieks his screams of defiance from the seclusion of the crags; we perpetuate in verse and story the imaginary song of the mythical dying swan; we praise the inferior songs of other birds—but, in my humble judgment, there is none that deserves more praise, credit, or commendation at the hands of enlightened humanity than the peerless mockingbird, America's sweetest singer, who enlivens the spirit of springtime with his tireless serenade, and thrills every heart with his inspiring note of gladness as he touches the golden harp of Nature's sweetest song and "stirs with joy and hope the languid souls of listening men."

Abolish the Electoral College

OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me over the Blue Network, Thursday, June 15, 1944:

The people of the United States will soon be faced with the solemn duty to elect their President and Vice President.

Of such great consequence is this choice of national leader, Chief of State, Commander in Chief of our armed forces that every faculty of mature judgment and of analysis must be brought to bear upon the choice. And yet there are many who have never stopped to consider the machinery of Presidential election. To too many of the voters, the electoral college represents some hazy formula. Not enough is known of its origin, purpose, and function. Its significance as an intermediate agency between the will of the people and the final choice for President and

Vice President, which it is, in fact, is well nigh completely lost. None of you will vote this November directly for Roosevelt or Dewey. You will vote only for so-called electors, who in turn will actually vote for them. Does not this relayed voting shock you?

But the question presents itself time and time again. What is the real necessity for retaining a mechanism that is—at best—a useless, cumbersome, expensive automaton, and—at worst—a dangerous weapon that has within itself the possibilities of thwarting the popular will?

The truth is that the founding fathers did not completely trust the judgment of the common man. Throughout the various proceedings attendant upon the writing of the Constitution, this distrust of the popular will was injected repeatedly into the debates and the discussions. Anent the election of the President and Vice President, Alexander Hamilton writing in the Federalist papers stated, "It was equally desirable that the immediate election should be made by men most capable of analyzing the qualities adapted to the station and acting under circumstances favorable to deliberation, and to a judicious combination of all the reasons and inducements that were proper to govern their choice. A small number of persons selected by their fellow citizens from the general mass will be most likely to possess the information and discernment requisite to so complicated an investigation."

It must be remembered that it was intended that each elector cast his vote according to his own judgment. It wasn't until 1800 that several of the States adopted the unit rule, a rule which still obtains today.

Thus, the electors of a State now cast their votes as one. No individual judgment is expressed in the vote. If a nominee receives a majority in Delaware, no matter how slight, he gets all 3 of Delaware's electoral votes. The favored nominee, if only favored by the smallest possible majority of 1 in New York State, receives the 47 electoral votes of New York State.

I have picked at random various election periods and it is most revealing to note the discrepancies between the popular vote and the electoral vote. For example, in 1900 McKinley received 50 percent of the popular vote, but 65 percent of the electoral vote. In 1940 Teddy Roosevelt received 56 percent of the popular vote, but 70 percent of the electoral vote. In 1928 Hoover received 58 percent of the popular vote and 83 percent of the electoral vote. In 1936 Roosevelt received 60 percent of the popular vote and 98 percent of the electoral vote.

You might say that such discrepancy makes very little difference just so long as the majority vote is reflected in the choice of the candidate receiving it. But that has not been so three times in the history of our country. That which has happened thrice before can happen again. In 1824 a majority of the popular vote was received by Andrew Jackson, but not the majority of the electoral vote. The election was thrown into the House of Representatives and John Quincy Adams was chosen. This was so despite the fact that Jackson received more popular votes than both Adams and Henry Clay. And so John Quincy Adams entered the White House by way of the back door. Again in 1876, Samuel J. Tilden, the Democratic candidate had a majority of some one-quarter million over Rutherford B. Hayes, but did not have the electoral college majority. The House of Representatives chose Hayes. In 1888 Benjamin Harrison received 100,000 less popular votes than the then President Cleveland, but Harrison received the majority in the electoral college and ousted President Cleveland.

The electoral college actually disenfranchises the minority vote. Election campaigns concentrate their heaviest batteries on doubtful or pivotal States. Each State has the same number of electoral votes as it has United States Senators and Representatives combined; each State, then, regardless of population, must have an irreducible minimum of 3 electors, each State having 2 Senators and at least 1 Representative. Thus, the total electoral vote is 531, and 266 of these electoral votes decide the issue. With 12 States—California, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas, and Wisconsin—a Presidential nominee can win the election, regardless of the other 36. It is little wonder then that so much attention is focused on States like New York, California, Illinois, and Ohio. The minority votes in such States, as well as in others, is lost entirely, if indeed, the minority vote is cast. In States where the majority votes are known to be Democratic or Republican, the opposition in most instances will not bother to vote, since it is aware that the entire electoral vote will go to the majority candidate. Multiply such votes not cast in 48 States, since such vote is meaningless, and you can readily see how great a bearing that has on the final choice. Dewey or Roosevelt can win with a popular vote of less than 20,000,000, even though 60,000,000 votes are cast for the opponent. This is a veritable perversion of democracy.

To regard the electoral college as only a mechanical servant is to close one's eyes to its inherent dangers.

Nor are the equities observed in regard to the larger States. Under the electoral college, the votes of those living in small States count for more than the votes of those living in big States, since less popular votes in the small States are needed to represent each electoral vote. For instance, in 1936 Nevada had 1 electoral vote for each 14,616 popular votes cast in that State, while New York had 1 electoral vote for each 112,478 popular votes. Each Nevada voter then, was equal to 8 New Yorkers in electing a President.

Because of this go-between, that is, the electoral college, what is happening in South Carolina, Texas, Mississippi, Virginia, Louisiana, and Arkansas, the solid South has vast national importance. Although the electors of a State are honor-bound, according to time-worn tradition to vote for the candidate who carries the State in the November election, the organizers of the rebelling southern Democrats threaten to instruct their electors to ignore the national nominees for President and Vice President unless the Democratic National Convention, soon to be held in Chicago, complies with their demands. Their terms include a Democratic platform condemning the Supreme Court for its decision permitting Negroes to vote in the Texas primaries, anti-poll-tax legislation, condemning the President's Fair Employment Practice Committee, condemning the nomination of Henry Wallace for the Vice Presidency, and demanding, moreover, the over-all embrace of the theory of so-called white supremacy. It is a case of stand and deliver. In addition, they are insisting on a restoration of the long discarded national convention's two-thirds-vote rule for nominating Presidential and Vice Presidential candidates. These terms are repugnant to the President as well as to the rank and file of northern Democrats.

The danger is real, because the useless electoral college gives edge to the ax. Nothing in the Constitution demands that a State vote as a bloc. The individual electors may exercise their independent judgment if they so desire. Thus the fractious elements of the party may cast their votes one way and the regular party supporters another way. Where does the popular will express itself? Whose voice is represented in the event of such a revolt? The 21 Texas votes might be decisive in the electoral college and yet the popular will in and out of Texas may not be reflected. The Texas people may overwhelmingly vote for Roosevelt but the electors whom they actually select may reject the mandate.

If the Philistines succeed in naming uninstructed electors upon the Democratic convention's refusal to bend to their wishes, then their electors, duly elected by votes in the Democratic column, would fling their votes to the Republican nominee or to a Democrat not named by the convention which might result in neither party obtaining the electoral college majority. In that event, the election would be thrown into the House of Representatives for Presidential choice and into the Senate for the Vice Presidential choice. In such event, each State delegation would have but one vote, the votes being by States. Again, the choice is unrepresentative, for the State with the greatest population will have the same small voice as that with the least population. For example, Pennsylvania would have the same one vote as Idaho. If in the fall we are still at war, such an occurrence would be catastrophic. There would be violent controversies and political logrolling. Uttermost confusion would prevail. The prospect is terrifying. Apparently some of these Democratic Bourbons will stop at nothing in order to gain their ends, even bend the weaknesses of the electoral college to their will.

And these dangers exist only because of the inept electoral college, which is like a recalcitrant mule that suddenly kicks up in all directions.

I have today introduced remedial legislation to do away with the electoral college. I realize that such legislation cannot be put into motion prior to the November election, but nonetheless, the matter is important enough to direct the attention of the Nation to the need for its abolition, to the end that there might be some method of more direct election of the President and Vice President.

It is not an easy matter to destroy machinery that has been in existence over 150 years, nor should it lightly be attempted. The mechanism must be surveyed in the light of existing conditions. Suppose the original intent of the constitutional fathers remained in effect; that is, each member of the electoral college were permitted to exercise his own judgment and cast his vote as he saw fit. Would this distrust of the people's judgment be warranted today? The founding fathers could not foresee the development of undreamed-of modes of communication, of the wider dissemination of learning, and more universal public education. They did not anticipate the radio, the syndicated columnist, the commentators. No secrets can be kept from the people concerning the candidates. The people are and shall continue to be thoroughly informed of the habits, notions, policies, and private lives of the nominees. Even President Cleveland recognized this and could not and would not hide the fact that he had a child born out of wedlock.

The distrust of public judgment, I make bold to say, was not warranted in those days, even less so today. There were those who feared unbridled democracy. Yet it has been said and it contains more than the germ of a truth that the weaknesses of democracy can only be cured with more democracy.

To waste votes, to suppress votes, to count votes in such a manner as to include the possibility of deflecting their true expression of choice is to rob democracy of its most cherished and noblest doctrine—that the Government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. The unit State voting in the electoral college results in just such undemocratic procedure and individual voting in the electoral college is likewise undemocratic in its belittling of the discernment and of the ability of political appraisal of our people.

A bit of Americana comes to mind. One elector chosen on the Federalist ticket voted for Thomas Jefferson instead of John Adams, as Pennsylvania voters had instructed. Mr. Adams won by just 3 votes. An irate Pennsylvanian broke into print with, "What? Do I choose Samuel Miles to determine for me whether John Adams or Thomas Jefferson shall be President? No; I choose him to act, not to think."

Why the retention of such mischief-breeding machinery?

It can be compared with the appendix, and as such can easily become festering and inflammatory.

Three times in our history it has acted up and threatened the existence of the Republic. Each time the body politic was able to survive. It doubtlessly will be able to avert a crisis such as is threatened now again, but prudence advises the removal of the seat of trouble. Prevention is better than cure. Why invite disaster?

The B–29

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased today with the reception accorded my remarks on the floor of the House in salute to my neighbors and friends who, working for the Wright Aeronautical Corporation, of Paterson, N. J., have designed and constructed the Wright Cyclone engines powering the B–29 bombers which yesterday "told the story" to Japan.

The remarks of my distinguished colleagues, Representative REES of Kansas and Representative JACKSON, of Washington, lauding the developers and builders of the carrying planes, by Boeing, were timely and serve to emphasize the deep appreciation by the people's representatives of the home front's contribution to the winning of this terrible war.

Shortly after I spoke our distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. HANCOCK] told me that his boy was now flying one of the B–29's. Undoubtedly, more of our sons here are thus engaged and we have reason to be hopeful that these new and powerful weapons of the air will revolutionize warfare and bring about a speedier victory than heretofore anticipated.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Frank C. Waldrop, writing for today's Washington Times-Herald, describes the Wright Cyclones and Boeing B–29's in the following well-written statement:

Now the Japanese know what Gen. Henry H. Arnold, Chief of the United States Army Air Forces, meant when he said that the Flying Fortress is the last of the small bombers. The Japs have just met up with the B–29, first of the big bombers.

The B–29 is opening up a new kind of warfare, and it was not only the cities of Japan that shook under its blows, yesterday, but also the navies of the world. All of them. Including ours.

When the war's lid of secrecy is lifted and the amazing details about the B–29 are told, people still will be saying about them what the farmer said about the giraffe—that there ain't no such animal.

Elsewhere in this edition you will find some discussion of the B–29, so here we will run on a bit about just one part of it—the engine.

The following facts have been furnished by the Wright Aeronautical Corporation, which made the B–29's engines:

The B–29 has more power in its four 2,200-horsepower engines than the biggest bomber ever sent into action by any other nation in the world. With a total of 8,800 horsepower from these air-cooled, radial engines, the Super Fortress has almost doubled the power of the Boeing B–17 Flying Fortress, long the heavyweight slugger of the Army Air Forces, which has a total of 4,800 horsepower.

It has from 2,400 to 3,800 more horsepower than the biggest British bomber, such as the Lancaster or Halifax.

It tops the largest four-engined bomber of the Germans, the Focke-Wulf Kurier, by 2,800 horsepower, and has more than double the power of the biggest bomber of the Japanese, which, according to the latest published reports, is the Kawasaki T–97, with four engines of only 900 horsepower each.

The scientific meaning of "1 horsepower" is "the energy required to lift 33,000 pounds 1 foot in 1 minute." The engines in the B–29 have the energy to lift 290,400,000 pounds in 1 minute.

A flight of only 20 of the B–29's, therefore, develops the power necessary to drive a 45,000-ton battleship of the Iowa class at a speed of 33 knots.

The crew of a B–29 is only 11 men, which happens to be 2 less than the number for the crew of a PT boat, the Navy's little stingers that first showed in the defense of the Philippines and were valuable again in the Solomons campaign.

And so, a flight of 20 B–29's, burning horsepower equal to that of the largest and latest American battleship, and far easier and less expensive to build, can go into action with less than half the number of men required to run 1 destroyer. A modern destroyer's crew of men and officers is about 315.

As for the fire power of the B–29—which is its only excuse for being, after all—that can be only hinted at, but it is something to make your hair stand on end.

Twenty of these machines can lay, in what the censors will permit to be called a very small area from very, very high up, a quantity of high explosives that no battleship built or building can even nearly match.

And, of course, no battleship of the sea can throw shells to Berlin.

From all the foregoing, you may expect to read next that the battleship is dead, again. But not so.

The battleship is simply sliding down the scale of important weapons in war. It has already lost place to the aircraft carrier as the No. 1 striking weapon of sea warfare.

The B–29 is moving up past the aircraft carrier.

It is now the No. 1 offensive weapon of this World War No. 2, for land or sea attacks. It is the paralyzer.

In war there are two main methods of paralyzing, with speed, or with mass. The little PT boats, with their torpedoes, throw a heavy explosive punch with great speed. The battleship is mass.

The B–29 is the nearest thing to an ideal combination of mass and speed yet to come into the world.

Some military heavy thinkers with whom this writer has been talking say they doubt bombers will ever grow as far above the size of the B–29 as the B–29 has exceeded that of the B–17 Flying Fortress. The B–29 is about half again as large as the B–17.

Not that it couldn't be done as a matter of engineering.

They say it simply won't be necessary.

New kinds of high explosive are coming along which they say will be as superior to TNT as dynamite is to the black powder fired in the Battle of Crecy in 1346, when English artillery was first used to scare the horses of the French feudal aristocracy.

That comparison sounds a little fanciful, and it may be, but it is a fact that new explosives are upcoming that will jar Jap and German cities as never before.

The important additional fact is that they are explosives of relatively small bulk. A B–29 loaded with these extraordinarily concentrated cans of violence can do just about all military men think will be necessary to shatter anybody's will to make war.

Thus the B–29 approaches the largest economical engine of war necessary to win—at 11 men per B–29.

Which makes people enthusiastic about the idea of junking large armies just as the world's largest armies—United States, British, German, and Russian—begin a three-cornered tangle in Europe.

We're fighting yesterday's war in Europe and today's has just shown itself over Japan.

And what about tomorrow's? All we can do about that is pour the money into aviation and high-explosive research until we know we've got the best and the most of it.

Democracy in Action

OF

HON. W. LEE O'DANIEL

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech entitled "Democracy in Action," delivered by me over the Columbia Broadcasting System last night.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There has been much printed in the newspapers lately about what took place at the Democratic conventions held recently in Texas. The true story in detail has not yet, to my knowledge, been made public. I intend to now give you the true and complete story. I believe the Texas Democratic conventions held this year may go down in history as the turning point in our National Government. I think every citizen of this Nation who recognizes that the New Deal dynasty has almost completely wrecked and ruined our American way of life will take renewed faith in democracy and renewed hope in our future freedom when they hear the true story of what happened in the Democratic conventions held in Texas this year. I think you will realize that democracy in America is not dead, and that the people are still capable of governing themselves, and that true American democracy can spring from the people up when the people become tired of it being imposed from the top down, as it is now.

Texas is doing its share in the present war, but while our brave sons are away from home fighting to maintain liberty, freedom, and democracy in the world, we Texans who remain at home are not going to stand idly by and let a little gang of Communists, Socialists, labor leader racketeers, and fellow-traveling New Dealers scuttle our liberty, freedom, and democracy right here on the home front and have our boys return—those who do return—to find that the dictatorship they were fighting to destroy abroad has been set up right here in America. In Texas we are just peaceable and peace-loving people. We have a profound and sincere belief in the sovereignty of our Nation, the sovereignty of our State, and, above all, the sovereignty of freemen. We have cherished, cultivated, and kept our sovereignty, our independence, and last, but not least, our pride. We do not intend to let the New Deal dynasty at Washington usurp our sovereignty, shackle our independence, or crush our pride. When a gang of Communists and their fellow travelers steal our Democratic Party and change its name to the New Deal Party, we are going to rise up and protect the honored name of Thomas Jefferson and other real Democrats of the past, present, and future.

So here is the story of the Texas Democratic conventions. In establishing a beachhead of true democracy at Austin, Tex., May 23, this year, the real tried and true Democrats executed a bit of real strategy. The whole maneuvering was negotiated by a group of silent, determined, patriotic Texas Democrats with blood in their eyes, and was the culmination of months of hard work and quiet planning. Many months ago these Democrats commenced to talk with each other about the situation which existed, and over and over again the question was asked: "What can we do?" And the people who were asking that question were not the political bell-wethers, but the great rank and file of Texas Democrats who love liberty and freedom, and who believe in real Jeffersonian democracy and no New Dealism.

This uprising of Texas Democrats originated at the grass roots of democracy. It came from the great rank and file of the common people. In the past the professional politicians always controlled the precinct conventions, picked their delegates to the county conventions, who in turn, stacked the State convention full of the tried and true professional politicians who would go down the line for what the New Deal bosses called for. Things were different this year. These grass-root Democrats in every community commenced to consult with each other. They commenced to organize and to unite on a well-fixed program designed to liquidate the New Deal. Representatives of these groups traveled from one community to another and these red-blooded Texas Democrats by the time the precinct conventions were held were all of one mind, with the result that they elected their delegates to the county conventions and these county conventions sent real Democrats, not New Dealers—to the State convention. What happened in Texas can be summed up in this statement: Instead of leaving the precinct conventions and the county conventions and the State conventions to be run by a bunch of hand-picked patronage dispensing professional politicians, the rank and file of the common citizens took charge and picked the delegates, and they ran the conventions. Of course the professional politicians have tried to create the false impression that the convention was controlled by a few large corporation representatives, but that is absolutely untrue, and merely a desperate alibi to their bosses as an explanation of their defeat.

The whole organization was made up mostly of honest, fearless, common citizens who had never had much, if any, previous political experience. It was an uprising of the common citizens. A ground swell, I might say. After the precinct conventions, and after the county conventions, then came the State convention at Austin. You know, among the professional politicians we have down in Texas there are some who are willing to play the game of politics up to a given point, but they are not willing to completely scuttle the whole system of democratic government. They will fight to the bitter end on State affairs, but when it comes to a vital national issue they will get together and stand shoulder to shoulder to fight for the fundamental principles of democratic government. In other words, they are old-line politicians, but they are also Democrats, and a substantial number of these men are about fed up on this communistic, fourth-term, indispensable-man philosophy, and they rendered valiant service when the time came at Austin to do the maneuvering and help run the convention. But the successful job done was accounted for by the fact that the common citizens were there in droves from every county in the State, and they had the votes. In other words, the great rank and file of the common citizens had sent the right delegates to Austin and these delegates knew exactly what the people wanted, and what they wanted, and they got it. It was not a one-man fight. It was a united effort of all of our people. I know what I am talking about. I have made a number of trips back to Texas since I have been serving in the Senate and both by personal contact and over the radio I have over and over again pointed out to the great rank and file of our people the danger which I think lies ahead.

In these reports I have explained to my friends that most of this rationing business was plain hooey. I explained to them that this gang of blue-sky promoters who are running this Government and who originated the N. R. A. and the old blue eagle back in their heyday, had now simply dug up the remains of the old bird, restuffed him, draped the American flag about him, and remounted him on a new pedestal labeled "O. P. A." It's just the same old bird with new tail feathers. Of course, in the days of N. R. A. and the blue eagle, before the New Deal had sunk its claws so deep, we had a Supreme Court, and that judicial body plucked the tail feathers out of the old blue eagle and threw it out the window. Today instead of the O. P. A. getting thrown out the window, the Constitution of the United States got thrown out. What the Washington bureaucrats did to the people of this Nation under the N. R. A. was only a dress rehearsal of what they have done to us under O. P. A., but it's still the same old New Deal philosophy that you can have more by producing less.

About 2 months ago I made a trip back to Texas during the Easter vacation of Congress and I did not locate myself in a big luxurious suite of rooms and invite the politicians to come up and tell me what the situation was in Texas, but instead I made a complete tour of most of the State. I talked to small merchants, farmers, dairymen, barbers, filling-station operators, and others who go to make up the great rank and file of the common citizens of our State. I gave them my views about the emergency of the situation now facing the American people and asked them for their views, and I was gratified to find that the great rank and file of the people were really doing some serious thinking, and they were ready to take some action. So I will tell you folks that down in Texas we just decided to liquidate the New Deal; and when I say "we," I do not mean any one man decided to liquidate it. I mean the real, patriotic Texas Democrats who love liberty, freedom, and democracy and despise dictatorship in any form, by any name, and by anybody. The Texas Democrats became largely of one mind on this one subject. It was mass think and mass action. It was a spontaneous revolt from political interference and domination. It was democracy in action. When I returned to Washington after my last trip to Texas, just after the precinct conventions, and before the State convention, there was not a doubt in my mind but what the liquidation of the New Deal was going to take place.

When the State convention convened in Austin, the capital city, May 23, the common citizens were there in droves, both men and women, from every one of the 254 counties. They began to make motions, offer resolutions, and demand recognition of the chairman with complete calmness, thoroughness, and determination. This flabbergasted the faithful followers of "Franklin the Fourth." They were not prepared to counteract it. They had not provided the voice from the gutter, as was provided for the Chicago convention in 1940. Instead of the voice from the gutter, there arose the clear, true, determined voice of the people. The stooges of the Washington dynasty could not control those courageous common citizens. And so the inevitable happened. The little gang of baffled New Dealers and their song leaders and banner carriers walked out of the Democratic convention but, by actual count, only 69 wearing delegate badges walked out and went into another room and set up a little pout meeting of their own. But the main delegation, consisting of more than 1,800 true Texas Democrats, unruffled, remained in session, and continued their labors until they nominated the regular Democratic electors, who will do the actual voting for President and Vice President. And—horror of horrors—these common citizens did something never before done in Texas and never even dreamed of before. They nominated these Presidential electors, all 23 of them, and gave them specific authority by resolution to cast their votes for a Democrat of their own choosing, not necessarily for the nominee of the Chicago convention, but to cast their votes for some other Democrat for President, unless the Chicago convention restores the two-thirds rule for nominating candidates and adopts platform planks upholding white supremacy. Thus, my friends, one of the greatest political battles of the century for liberty, freedom, and democracy has just been fought and won in Texas.

Again across the broad plains and rugged mountains of that great empire of Texas the gentle breezes of democracy freely blow. Once again the true Democrats of Texas are holding their chins a little higher. Big, tall, sun-tanned men of Texas now look down from their lofty heights with scorn upon the swarms of Federal flunkies sent thither and yon by the oppressors of democracy in Washington to harass, insult, and embarrass the free men and women of that great and sovereign Lone Star State of Texas. Since this great victory by the real Democrats of Texas, the whole South is taking renewed hope. The whole Nation is taking renewed hope. What has been done in Texas can be done in every other State if the great rank and file of the people will only rise to the occasion.

Now, friends, in conclusion let me say that ever since I came to the United States Senate and found out what the Washington dynasty has been doing to the people of this Nation I have been conducting a campaign to keep my people in Texas fully informed so that they might devise ways and means of recovering our Government and returning it to the people. I have broadcast many programs on the subject, and the campaign has met with such hearty approval that it has practically turned into a crusade. It has been suggested that I make regular reports to the whole Nation by radio at least once each week from now until election time. Not being a candidate for any public office I would have nothing to gain by conducting such a campaign except to help save my country for my children and your children, and their children. If any of you folks listening would like for me to make such a Nation-wide campaign, please drop me a line and let me know, also give me your ideas on the subject. To everybody who writes me, I will be glad to send you a copy of this radio speech, also a copy of a radio speech I made a few days ago about the Montgomery-Ward seizure, titled, "The Crucifixion of American Private Enterprise on the Brazen Cross of the C. I. O. by Decree of a Modern Pontius Pilate." Address all communications to Senator W. LEE O'DANIEL, Washington, D. C. This is your United States Senator W. LEE O'DANIEL, of Texas, speaking from your Nation's Capital, Washington, D. C., and wishing you all a very pleasant good day.

Platform Issues: Labor and Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL A. HATCH
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in this morning's Washington Post under the heading of "Platform issues," by Mr. Wendell Willkie. This morning I want to call especial attention to one paragraph in the article. The whole article deals with the question of labor and industry, and the particular paragraph I have in mind discusses a subject in which I have long been interested and to which I wish not only the major political parties but both labor and industry would give their undivided attention.

This is the paragraph I desire now to read:

Labor also has aspirations which are not only just, but indispensable to the health of a society marked by wide economic fluctuations. For instance, an annual wage to those who work in plants with long seasonal or periodic shut-downs seems fair and necessary.

That is the point I wanted to stress, namely, the necessity for evolving a plan of annual wage instead of an hourly wage. Such a plan has been tried in certain industries and has worked out most successfully and profitably to both employer and employee. I renew my request that the article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLATFORM ISSUES

(By Wendell Willkie)

LABOR AND INDUSTRY

The problem of labor today is surcharged with emotion and dangerously sharp cleavages. Men more zealous than wise are trying to label the Democratic Party the exclusive friend of labor, and the Republican Party its inveterate enemy. The source of this theory is not difficult to discern. Labor leaders feel that before the advent of the present administration, labor did not get a fair break, and that previous Republican administrations gave consideration solely to a business point of view. Today, on the other hand, many industrialists believe with almost fanatical intensity that the present administration sees everything exclusively through the eyes of labor, and plays politics both with and within labor.

There is considerable truth in the viewpoints of both.

However, nothing inherent in the nature of the two parties justifies the roles that propagandists have sought to assign them. Assuming that there are in the Republican Party a few ninteenth century industrialists who still believe that labor is a commodity, everyone of these has his Democratic counterparts in the SMITH-CONNALLY'S, who devote their energies to baiting organized labor.

But the Republican Party has allowed itself to be put on the spot on the labor question. It has done so by failing to appreciate sufficiently that for labor the essential content of freedom is different in today's industrial society from what it was in the agricultural society of an earlier age. Men no longer able to own, or to aspire to own, small businesses and farms have sought new solutions for a need which all Americans must respect—the need to control for themselves the circumstances which dictate their working lives. However much the present administration has bungled the problem, it has taken cognizance of this historic change.

A 1944 Republican platform should acknowledge the necessary requirements for the protection of labor under conditions existent today—not yesterday. Some of them are: The continuance and improvement of a Federal wage-and-hour law and Federal regulatory machinery for its interpretation and enforcement. However, it should be remembered that no law, sponsored by business or labor, is a good law which creates in the mind of either the justifiable belief that fair and impartial treatment cannot be obtained under it. Compulsory social insurances must be broadened in their base and progressively expanded. Coercive legislation, such as the Smith-Connally Act, which is both unwise and unenforceable, should be repealed, for labor's inherent right to strike, which it has voluntarily abandoned during the war, is the basis of all its rights and must not be outlawed merely because the administration has created an atmosphere in which strikes are inevitable.

Industry must convince labor that it is prepared permanently to accept the basic principles of collective bargaining and unions must be reassured that the period of transition to peace will not be used, as in 1919–20, to destroy the organizations they have built.

Labor also has aspirations which are not only just but indispensable to the health of a society marked by wide economic fluctuations. For instance, an annual wage to those who work in plants with long seasonal or periodic shut-downs seems fair and necessary, and our post-war economy must be built on a high wage level if we hope to furnish a market for the goods of an expanding peacetime production. Our wheels can keep turning only if our workers can keep spending.

Labor-management cooperation has proved fruitful during the war. The more it is continued and developed after the peace, the less necessity there will be for Government intervention in industrial relations. It is time for both labor and management to grow up, to recognize each other as essential factors in the same basic enterprise—United States industry—and to settle their affairs among themselves without recourse to government.

Now that labor is reaching maturity, all labor leaders must recognize what some leaders are saying—witness the recent statements of Mr. Thomas and Mr. Dubinsky—that labor must become responsible, must drive from its midst its racketeers, adopt democratic procedures, and account for its funds and activities both to the public and to its own membership. And if the reluctant few refuse to follow democratic procedures, then under appropriate legislation such matters must be regulated.

Finally, and basic to the whole question of labor in a democratic society, in addition to its part in American industrial life, labor must be made an essential part of government with a real labor representative in the Cabinet. Like other economic groups, it must share in the determination of government's fiscal, domestic, and international policies. Thus it will share the responsibility for the results.

The coming days of demobilization will be difficult, particularly difficult for labor. Millions of men and women will have to take up new forms of work in new localities. Returning soldiers will properly feel that they should have equal, if not preferential, opportunities for jobs. The adjustments of our economy to a peacetime basis will bring a multitude of stresses and strains, and labor is fearful that it alone will be asked to bear the sacrifices. That must not be.

Every thoughtful American knows today that a strong labor movement is one of our greatest bulwarks against the growth of fascistic tendencies and consequently is necessary for our democratic way of life. The Republican Party must demonstrate visibly and tangibly that it appreciates the contribution of labor to our economic well-being. It must leave no doubt that it understands that labor has legitimate grievances and justifiable aspirations toward a more secure place with larger participation in our modern industrial life. Above all, the Republican Party must demonstrate that it can produce a constructive, just, and humane labor program.

Pussyfoot Role Seen by G. O. P. in Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence, from the Washington Post of June 15, 1944:

PUSSYFOOT ROLE SEEN BY G. O. P. IN CONGRESS—POLITICALLY SAFE SILENCE KEPT ON ISSUES OF DAY, SAYS WRITER

(By David Lawrence)

The Democratic Party, with 216 Members, no longer has a majority of the House of Representatives, while the Republican Party, with 212 Members, has strength nearly equal to that of the Democrats. Recent elections to fill vacancies have diminished the Democratic total.

But the public would hardly suspect that the two major parties are so closely divided in the lower House of Congress.

Certainly very little has happened since the present Congress took office in January 1943 to indicate that the Republicans as a whole have developed a program that can be readily identified by observers. While there has been opposition from time to time by the Republicans, who voted in a bloc, it would be difficult to discover by the reading of the record just what the Republican Party would do if it had complete control of the machinery of the House of Representatives.

Whether the subject is labor or agriculture or taxation or price control or the Montgomery Ward case or any one of a number of issues that are supposed to be close to the hearts and minds of the people, the Republicans have done little to manifest how they would handle these matters if they really had the majority.

PUSSYFOOT ROLE

The Republican Party in the House has played the same pussyfoot role which has so often been adopted in past years by the minority party on either side of the political aisle. The strategy is to avoid commitments on major issues and appear to be friendly to all groups in the hope that the minority party will be the beneficiary at the polls of all the protests and dissatisfactions of the people over the legislative acts of the majority party.

Under the existing constitutional system, it is thus possible for a minority party to come within five votes of actually being a majority in the House of Representatives and yet escape all responsibility for the action of the House. That is why the term "responsible government" is so often used to describe a parliamentary system where a powerful minority, or one that almost divides power with the opposition side, has been virtually compelled by public opinion to assume responsibility in the Cabinet. If the parties were almost as equally divided in Canada, Britain, or Australia as they are in the House of Representatives today, a coalition government would be in power in the executive branch. There need then to have been no election in the midst of the invasion campaign.

It is true, of course, that the Republicans have supported the major war programs and particularly the appropriations for military purposes. On these there have been virtually unanimous votes.

SAFE SILENCE ON ISSUES

But on the issues which divide the country, particularly questions arising out of administrative bureaucracy or misuse of public power as in the Ward case, the Republicans have preferred to maintain a politically safe silence. Indeed, to speak out forthrightly is considered unwise on the eve of an election. Governor Dewey's candidacy, for example, has managed to draw support from many elements because the New York Governor has kept his views on specific questions very much to himself.

The party in power, however, has not hesitated to commit itself to particular positions on domestic issues. There is, of course, a possible inference from all this that the Democratic position is much stronger than the Republicans would like to admit.

Certainly if the Republican party is afraid to make an issue on certain domestic questions, it could be construed to mean that the Democratic position has considerable popular support. The behavior of the Republican party in the House of Representatives appears to be more and more an admission that the Democratic positions on various issues is much more likely to receive public support at the polls than the Republicans care to concede at this time.

Some day the idea of responsible Government which enables the people to check both legislative and executive branches as the case may be by compelling or threatening an election at any time—the parliamentary system used in Canada and Australia—may prove even more advantageous than it appears at present. For while the change is fundamental, it may be the only way in the end that the people as a whole can exercise a check upon the growing powers of the central Government.

Keep Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR WALSH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WALSH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Keep Price Control," published in the Newark (N. J.) Evening News of June 12, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KEEP PRICE CONTROL

One piece of legislation now before the Congress is of particular interest to all American families. That is the price control bill, extending the life of O. P. A. after its present expiration date, which is June 30. If weakening amendments are attached to this renewal, the major control against high prices and rents, and against inflation in general, will be removed.

Price Administrator Chester Bowles puts the situation thus:

"If the present act is renewed without weakening amendments, we in the O. P. A. can continue to protect the American people, the American businessman, and the American taxpayers against the need for paying high wartime prices and the eventual inflation that will follow."

The alternative, according to Mr. Bowles:

"The plain fact is that some amendments already accepted in the Senate and others being seriously considered in both Houses would wreck the present price-control program beyond recognition and create higher prices of every family in this country."

The House last week overrode its Rules Committee which, through a combination of southern Democrats and Republicans, wanted to tack labor amendments to the price-control bill. Whether or not such amendments were germane, their source was suspected—none other than Representative HOWARD SMITH of Virginia, who would like to see wholesale revision of the Price Control and Economic Stabilization Acts.

The Senate has adopted the Bankhead cotton amendment which in Mr. Bowles' opinion, is best calculated to shatter the entire structure of stabilization.

"A frank and open attack on price control should shock the country," Mr. Bowles asserts. "No one has proposed or would dare propose wrecking the stabilization program. But today price control is being killed with kind words."

With kind words or otherwise, the present structure of price control should be preserved. With War bond savings and a modest scale of living, O. P. A. has prevented the wide inflation gap some economists feared. If the Congress wants to consider legislation banning maintenance-of-membership contracts, if it wishes to curb W. L. B. or subject its decisions to judicial review, if it wishes to give profit advantages to the textile industry, those propositions should be threshed out on their merits in separate legislation. To tinker with O. P. A. at this stage of the war, when it is achieving its main object, is to open a path to inflation.

Members of Congress who are hot for removing the controls on prices and rents, while holding wages frozen at present levels, are deluding themselves. If prices and rents rise, no legislative enactment will for long freeze wages.

Anti-Semitism Directly Opposed to Christian Teaching

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 15, 1944

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Archbishop Edward Mooney in an address at a civic meeting paying tribute to the heroes of the Jewish ghetto in Warsaw:

In accepting the kind invitation of your committee to address this meeting, I was conscious of the opportunity thus given me to say in highly significant circumstances some things which I think American Jews may well expect to hear from the lips of their Christian fellow-citizens. From a platform shared by those who bear heavy civic and religious responsibilities in Detroit, one can speak with all the advantages of direct, personal address to an audience that is keenly sensitive to the practical social problems that arise when malevolent emphasis is placed on the things that divide us rather than on the things that unite us as members of the great human family. Nothing in the news today justifies that sensitiveness more completely than the story of the Warsaw ghetto, the details of which are just now seeping through the wall of Nazi censorship which encloses occupied Europe. For that story vividly highlights the inhuman lengths to which men can go when they allow the things that divide us to generate hatred between man and man, and attempt to settle resulting problems on the deadly inspiration of that fanatical hatred.

This meeting affords us occasion publicly to express our admiration of the heroic courage of those who in the last days of the Warsaw ghetto led a forlorn hope in resistance to their murderous oppressors. This they did not with any idea that they could ultimately prevail, but with the determination that they would die, if die they must, like men fighting to defend their rights rather than as abject slaves, and with the thought that their resistance might arouse the conscience of the world. It is pleasing to note that their desperate cry was taken up by the Government of Poland and relayed to the world. In a recent meeting of the International Labor Office, a member of that Government said: "Hitler is using Poland as a slaughterhouse for the mass murder of millions of Polish Jews and Jews of other European countries—a murder unprecedented in the annals of history. Hitler is determined to achieve the complete annihilation of the Jewish people.

"In some areas fighters of the Jewish underground, aided by their Polish brothers-in-arms, rose against the German conqueror. The heroic armed resistance of the Warsaw ghetto will live forever in the story of mankind."

SUFFERED FOR CENTURIES

Not only a sense of brotherly compassion, but even an elementary concern for the moral health of our western civilization prompts our cry of horror at the deliberate and brutal extermination of a race which, more than any other of equally high and ancient culture, has through the centuries felt the flail of man's inhumanity to man. It implies no closing of our eyes to other contemporary instances of unconscionable cruelty in handling problems of racial and religious antagonism to give full play to this salutary sense of horror at the utterly inhuman solution of a problem in human relations which the story of the Warsaw ghetto so repulsively climaxes. A generation which has grown accustomed to read of the systematic suppression of inalienable human rights, of mass deportations of millions of men, women, and children at the nod of a dictator, of the deliberately murderous extinction of whole sectors of populous nations on account of racial, religious, or political antagonism—a generation which, like our own, has had to read of these horrible things in the contemporary history of the establishment of either Communist or Nazi domination, is in danger of losing its capacity of being shocked at the sight of brute force standing over the trampled form of human rights.

Without the unremitting cultivation of a keen sense of right and wrong, and its objective application to all situations regardless of whether they concern us, our allies or our enemies, there is the further danger that we may almost unconsciously admit into our souls a kind of fatal admiration for the efficiency of brute force instead of persistently retaining our natural abhorrence of its callousness. To give full play, therefore, to our instinctive revulsion of horror against this latest instance of mass cruelty in the story of the Warsaw ghetto, is to serve a salutary purpose in preparing ourselves for the impending task of putting together the shattered pieces of a war-torn world.

NAZIS ANTI-CHRISTIAN

I have no thought of extenuating the lapse from ideals of Christian conduct so often evident in the part which Christians have played in the age-long tragedy of Israel's wanderings through the nations. But we should not fail to note the fact that the Nazi perpetrators of the colossal crime of the Warsaw ghetto are professedly and rabidly anti-Christian as well as anti-Jewish. In Germany itself, throughout occupied Europe and particularly in Poland they have persecuted Christians with a ferocity that is exceeded only by their unparalleled cruelty to the Jews. May we not hope that in the fires of a common tribulation new bonds of human solidarity and mutual good will are being forged between Christian and Jew? In the heroism of Christians who have so often risked and not infrequently given their lives to rescue their even more unfortunate Jewish brothers, may we not find an augury that when the agony is over Jews and Christians will work together to write a brighter page of history in liberated Europe, and particularly in Poland which has, at least, the historic glory of having offered the Jews a haven of refuge when they were driven out of other countries?

PRIESTS KILLED AIDING JEWS

For me it is a matter of pride to recall the memory of the venerable Father Godlewski, a 77-year-old priest who, together with the vicar of Grzybow parish, voluntarily remained in the Warsaw ghetto to alleviate the sufferings of its condemned inhabitants. Even now it is known that the following Catholic priests met their death at the hands of the Nazis for giving aid to hunted Jews: Father Urbanowicz, who was shot in 1943; Father Archutowski, rector of the seminary of Warsaw, who was sent to Majdanek where he died under torture in October 1943; the dean of Grodno and the prior of the Franciscan monastery in that city, who were sent to Lomza and shot there in the autumn of 1943. But it is not a question merely of a few outstanding instances which inadequate information of a detailed kind reveals. There is an organized movement in Poland for the protection of Jews by their non-Jewish neighbors.

A special committee of the Polish underground has for its aim to conceal the Jews who are in hiding among the Polish people and to render them needed assistance. How widespread this movement is may be inferred from the fact that there are in Poland today about 1,000,000 survivors out of a Jewish population of three and one-half million in 1939. That even this number has so far escaped the Nazi terror is largely due to the brotherly cooperation of the Christian fellow-citizens. What this means in terms of heroic human solidarity is clear when we reflect that to conceal a Jew, to give him a night's lodging, to supply him with food or any kind of transportation is punishable by death in Nazi-dominated Poland, and captured Jews are put to torture to force them to reveal the names of those who helped them. Surely those who during these bloody years have suffered together in mutual helpfulness under the very shadow of death will have learned how to work together in harmony for the restoration of their native land in the new day of freedom.

DEPLORES GROUP ANTAGONISM

In all of this there is a deep lesson for us. The horrors of the Polish ghettos under the Nazi terror represent the climax of Nazi anti-Semitism and call attention to the inhuman lengths to which group antagonisms can go when fostered hatred is given rein. It would be a blessed thing, indeed, if our instinctive revulsion against these extreme manifestations of hatred and cruelty were to warn us against incipient and ofttimes covert attempts to stir up or to exploit group antagonisms in our own land. That such attempts have been made it is futile to deny. The A. P. A. movement, the Ku Klux Klan, and our pre-war wave of anti-Semitism were, in fact, more than merely incipient phenomena. How to counter such attempts prudently, indeed, but effectively is something we should all have at heart.

It is easy enough to deal with open manifestations of this kind in their initial stage. When exposed in their true light they wither in the free air of democratic discussion. I think the record will show that they have attained full growth only under the encouragement of a repressive dictatorship. It is not so easy, on the other hand, to deal with covert incitement to group antagonisms—which can, however, produce a noxious undergrowth in the social life of any nation. Anti-Semitism in America is usually of the covert type. It tries to evade the condemnation which recognition of its stark, repulsive reality would immediately evoke by resorting to an unduly abstract definition of anti-Semitism as hatred of the Jew as a Jew. That definition is so close to the metaphysical as to offer too wide a margin of evasion to the covert anti-Semite. To insist on a more concrete description of anti-Semitism with its mean jibes, its vicious innuendo, its vague accusations, its unjustified generalizations, its distorted emphasis—all calculated to foster organized antagonism—is to enable the man in the street to recognize it for the ugly thing it really is and put him on his guard against it.

EXPLOITERS OF ANTI-SEMITISM

Once we are aware of the moral and social evil of anti-Semitism, open or covert, what can we do to eradicate it or to keept it from spreading? Obviously, the responsibility here falls chiefly on the Christian majority, although the Jewish minority has a part to play, and all of us have to be intent on fostering sincere good will, on examining and repressing our own instinctive or inherited prejudices, and on developing an attitude of alertness against the vicious activities of those who would exploit these prejudices for personal profit or subversive propaganda. In connection with this last point it will be helpful for all of us to remember that just as there are professional anti-Semites who exploit the simplicity of emotional Christions, so, too, there are professional opponents of anti-Semitism who exploit the simplicity of emotional Jews. In regard to two publications, which I would place in this second category, it is gratifying to note that prominent Jewish leaders of my acquaintance are working diligently to keep their people—and many sympathetic Christians as well—from being deceived by them. Reason and experience prove, to my mind, at least, that mere denunciations of anti-Semitism, accomplish little; reason and experience indicate, moreover, that each group can act most effectively within the limits of its own membership, and that for one group to tell another what it should do in the matter is generally futile and ofttime positively harmful.

In all frankness, I should here give expression to my deepest conviction that there is no solution for the problem of anti-Semitism or any similar problem in the latitudinarian tendency to brush aside as nonessential the religious differences that divide us. Is the latitudinarian Jew for that reason any less the object of anti-Semitic prejudice? Or is the latitudinarian Christian for that reason any less susceptible to the virus of present-day anti-Semitism? Personally, I do not think so. We should never forget that anti-Semitism developed in Germany in direct ratio to the effectiveness of the official repression of Christianity, and that the Nazis, notorious for their atrocious persecution of the Jew, were branded by Pope Pius XI as the "deniers and destroyers of the Christian west."

TASK OF CATHOLICS

This brings me to the consideration of the positive contribution which Christians can make to the solution of the problem of anti-Semitism. To be consistent with the obesrvation I made a moment ago, I should restrict myself to what I might call the Catholic prophylaxis against anti-Semitism. Briefly, I might say that is to be found in a better understanding of the doctrine the church teaches and a better observance of the moral precepts she inculcates. Catholic teaching formally and explicitly condemns anti-Semitism. To cite an instance from the records of our day I quote a Papal decree of March 25, 1928, which reads: "The Apostolic See * * * condemns most emphatically the hatred directed against a people which was once chosen by God, that particular hatred which today commonly goes by the name of anti-Semitism." Catholic teaching directly and by manifold implication emphasizes the dignity of the human person which anti-Semitism outrages. Catholic teaching exalts the historic religious role of the Jewish people, and glories in the heritage from Judaism which is an essential element in Christianity. This is what Pope Pius XI had in mind when, referring to the words every priest recites daily in the mass, he said: "Abraham is called our patriarch and ancestor. Anti-Semitism is not compatible with the sublime reality of this text. It is a movement in which Catholics cannot participate. We are spiritually semites."

SAVIOUR'S PRECEPT

The moral precept which the Catholic Church considers most distinctively Christian is the command of Christ to love our neighbor. Anti-Semitism is diametrically opposed to this virtue of Christian charity. I shall never forget a comment on Christian charity which nearly 40 years ago I heard from the lips of an old Irish priest in Rome. He said:

"Charity is the virtue which disposes us to do good to all men, especially those who differ from us in religion."

That concept of charity is typically Irish but thoroughly Christian. When Christ Himself wished to illustrate what He meant by love of neighbor, He told the parable of the Good Samaritan. No chasm that divides us today is deeper than the chasm which divided the Jew from the Samaritan of Biblical days. Yet that was pointed out by Christ as the social chasm which the charity He taught should bridge. Evidently that chasm has been bridged in the homeland of that old Irish priest—which, by the way, is one of the few really Catholic states in the world. About 2 months ago a New York tabloid ran a series of articles alleging the existence of an anti-Semitic movement in Eire. A group of prominent Jewish leaders in Dublin and a Jewish member of the Irish Parliament promptly replied. Here is what they said:

"The Jewish Representative Council of Eire repudiates as false, irresponsible, and mischievous any suggestion that the Government of this country is anti-Semitic, or that there is any organized anti-Semitic movement in Eire. The Jewish community live and always have lived on terms of closest friendship with their fellow Irish citizens. No Irish Government has ever discriminated between Jew and non-Jew."

The Jewish Member of Parliament added:

"As a member of the Irish Parliament and a practicing adherent of the Jewish faith who has represented for 17 years a Dublin constituency 97 percent Roman Catholic, I deny emphatically that the people of Ireland, or the present or any Government of Ireland, are or ever have been anti-Semitic."

This is a tribute not only to Irish justice but to Irish charity as well. In Catholic Ireland charity—love of God and love of neighbor inspired by love of God—has been an effective solvent of racial and religious antagonisms. It can be that everywhere.

MORAL ORDER COMES FIRST

The heartrending story of the Warsaw ghetto told here tonight reveals in all its horror what Hitler's new order really means. Significantly, indeed, our President said 2 years ago: "To the new order of tyranny which the dictators wish to impose with the crash of a bomb, we oppose a greater concept—the moral order." Last October men prominent in Jewish, Catholic, and Protestant religious leadership in the United States summarized in a seven-point declaration the fundamental principles of the moral order and their prime applications to the relations of man to man, group to group, and nation to nation. The first point in that declaration called for the recognition of the fact that not only individuals but nations, states, and international society are subject to the sovereignty of God and the moral law which comes from God. The second assertion reads: "The dignity of the human person as the image of God must be set forth in all its essential implications in an international declaration of rights. States as well as individuals must repudiate racial, religious, or other discrimination in violation of those rights."

These are foundation stones in the making of a better world—a world that will solve the problems of racial and religious differences by justice and charity and not by hate. On these foundations every group can build higher under the stimulus of all that is best in its own religious and cultural inspiration. But if we disregard these foundation principles that lie deep in man's nature and in his reverence for his Creator, if we undermine these cornerstones of morality in setting the emplacements of the future, the story of the Warsaw ghetto will not be what it certainly should be—the last sad record of mass hatred organized by those who had foresworn the law, God and consequently the prime instincts of their common humanity. The security of Jew and Christian, as well as of those who are neither Jew nor Christian, and the promise of their living together as men and brothers lies in our common devotion to the moral order as a reflection of the mind and will of God our Maker, our Supreme Lawgiver and our Judge.

Ramspeck Committee Urges Army Air Forces to Utilize 10,000 Instructors and Trainees of WTS Program and Curtail Further Expansion of WASP Program

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a report by the Ramspeck committee in the investigation of the WASP program. This committee report is concise, exact, and to the point. Mr. RAMSPECK, chairman of this committee, is one of the most solid, straightforward, able, and conscientious men in this House. I feel sure that he and his committee, which is one of the most highly respected committees in this House, would not have made such a direct, thorough report of the findings upon complete and detailed investigation of this entire situation had not the situation warranted same. I am therefore going to urge each and every Member of this body to read this report very carefully in order to understand the entire problem when the WASP bill is brought up for consideration Monday or Tuesday of next week.

The report follows:

REPORT CONCERNING INQUIRIES MADE OF CERTAIN PROPOSALS FOR THE EXPANSION AND CHANGE IN CIVIL SERVICE STATUS OF THE WASP

As a result of correspondence and inquiries which were referred to the Committee on the Civil Service by Members of the House and Senate, representatives of civilian aviation organizations, veterans' associations, civilian pilots, and pilot instructors and trainees, the investigating staff of this committee has made inquiry as to the necessity or desirability of the program of the Women's Air Service Pilots (WASP).

The WASP is an organization of women pilots presently engaged on a civilian basis by the War Department for the purpose of ferrying, transporting, target towing, testing, tracking, and other duties within the continental limits of the United States.

Essentially, the mass of this correspondence addressed to the Congress protested that—

1. Army Air Forces had embarked upon a costly and unnecessary program of recruiting inexperienced young women for training as noncombat service pilots.

2. Simultaneously, Army Air Forces was dismissing, or failing to properly utilize, large numbers of male civilian pilot-instructors, who had been trained at a cost of millions of dollars.

3. While insisting upon high qualifications as prerequisite to the retention of these male civilian pilot-instructors, Army Air Forces was lowering the standards for female civilian recruits to an almost irreducible minimum.

4. The program was highly experimental.

5. The alleged manpower shortage given as a reason for the recruiting and training of inexperienced personnel was not, as claimed, being alleviated, but instead was being further confused and aggravated.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZATION

Under House Resolution 16, the Committee on the Civil Service is authorized and directed to (a) conduct thorough studies and investigations of the policies and practices relating to civilian employment; (b) study and investigate the effect of such policies and practices upon the conduct of the war, with the view of determining whether such policies and practices are efficient and economical; (c) determine the number of employees in each department or agency, whether such number of employees is necessary, and whether their skills are used to the best advantage; (d) study all other matters relating to the recruiting and the efficient and economical use of civilian employees; and (e) make such inquiry as the committee may consider important or pertinent to any matter coming within its jurisdiction.

Therefore, under House Resolution 16, this committee is directed to investigate the recruiting and efficient and economical use of civilian employees within the War Department, of which Army Air Forces is a component.

The young women being recruited for training at public expense as WASPS are civilians, graduate WASPS are civilians and operate under the protection of the Civil Service, and, finally, to a major extent, the overwhelming protest registered with the Congress is from civilians and taxpayers.

Within the purview of this committee there are two considerations of importance:

1. The expansion of any governmental organization is of immediate interest to this committee.

2. Proper utilization of the highest skills of trained personnel is of paramount importance. This is especially true in time of national emergency.

The implication contained in the proposal, that it is now either necessary or desirable to recruit stenographers, clerks, school teachers, housewives, factory workers, and other inexperienced personnel for training at great outlay of public funds as pilots for the military planes of this Government, particularly when there already exists a surplus of personnel to perform these identical duties, is as startling as it is invalid.

If it is necessary at this stage of the war to embark upon this costly and experimental program,[1] then this Nation, insofar as manpower is concerned, is in worse position than any of our allies, and apparently any of our enemies. Fortunately, the evidence presented during this inquiry demonstrates that the implied condition is neither actual nor probable.

SOURCES OF AVAILABLE PILOTS

The proposal to expand the WASPS comes at a time when, because of the curtailment of its training program, the Army Air Forces is eliminating 25 of its primary contract schools and canceling aviation-training programs in 151 colleges.

This releases for other duties the following groups of trained personnel:

1. Civilian instructors, 25 Army Air Forces primary contract schools	2,836
2. Civilian instructors, Civil Aeronautics Administration-War Training Service program	3,046

The cancelation of the Civil Aeronautics Administration-War Training Service program also brought about the dispersal of an additional 4,689 pilot-instructor trainees. These men entered the Civil Aeronautics Administration program as civilians. They were later activated into the Reserve and at the time of their dispersal were being trained as pilot instructors. Only 974 were accepted by Army Air Forces for aviation cadet training. The remaining 3,713 pilot-instructor trainees were assigned to technical, special, and glider-pilot training.

Since these 3,713 pilot-instructor trainees are now military personnel, their disposition and utilization is not within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Civil Service. However, the dispersal and assignment of this group is of interest for the reason that these pilots are not now being used for the purpose for which they were trained. There has been considerable complaint that the assignment of these men has been negative. Information has been submitted that in many cases duties assigned are trivial and demoralizing. This is not in accordance with the expressed policies of the War Department as to utilization of personnel.

It is a matter of resolute obligation for this committee to point out that proper utilization of the training and skills of these 5,882 civilian pilot instructors alone would ameliorate the need for the recruiting and training of additional WASPS, and to suggest that in the group of 3,713 pilot-instructor trainees will be found additional potential service pilots.

[1] Giving as one of the two purposes for the WASP program, the Secretary of War states: "To determine the extent that women pilots can be effectively used in the Army Air Forces for whatever conditions may arise in the future."—Washington Times-Herald, May 5, 1944.

WOMEN PILOTS

The inquiry and the consideration of this committee were not concerned with and do not resolve any question pertaining to the use of women as aviators.

It is definitely the concern of this committee that the current proposal contemplates the recruiting of inexperienced personnel. It is also definitely the concern of this committee that this inexperienced personnel must be trained at great outlay of public funds at a time when there is already available a sufficient supply of potential service pilots. This available personnel consists of civilian pilot instructors, who for several years have been training pilots for the armed forces. These men have had thousands of air hours and a wealth of experience. The experience and capabilities of these instructors should be fully utilized before any consideration is given to the recruiting and training of inexperienced personnel.

This is not a question of the utilization of male or female personnel, but is a question of the utilization of experience and capabilities before resorting to the use of inexperience and costly training. If a supply of trained women pilots presently existed, and there was a shortage of men pilots, this committee would unhesitatingly insist that the trained women pilots be fully utilized before inexperienced men were recruited for training.

BRITISH WOMEN FLYERS (A. T. A.) CIVILIANS

Utilization of women as pilots has been on a limited scale and of comparatively recent development.

In the early days of the present war the British, then desperately short of air personnel, recruited a group of civilian women pilots to transport and ferry planes. Many of these women were Americans. All were experienced and required only transitional training to familiarize themselves with military aircraft. The British organization, which is composed of both men and women pilots, is known as the Air Transport Auxiliary (A. T. A.) and is not a part of the Royal Air Force but is a branch of the Ministry of Production.

RECRUITING SOURCES

This inquiry has established that the present sources of WASP recruits are essentially the same as those of any other organization recruiting women personnel, and that:

1. The potential supply of qualified female pilots in the United States has long since been exhausted.

2. The recruits now being accepted are (a) selected from those who are too young to be eligible for membership in the already established women's organizations, or (b) being recruited in direct competition with these organizations.

The personnel now being recruited by the WASPS lacks aviation experience. The training necessary to qualify a WASP for even the lighter type of ship extends over a period of many months. One and one-half years is required before the maximum utilization of a WASP may be expected. During this period the WASP trainee is, in effect, removed from direct participation in the war effort. In some instances, the staff noted, trainees were recruited from industry and from war agencies where they were already applying skills vital to the war effort.[1] It was necessary for these recruits to be released or resign from war activities for which they had already received extended training. In several cases releases were refused. It was then necessary, due to War Manpower regulations, for these recruits to resign and remain idle 60 days in order to enroll in the WASP.

SURPLUS TO ADD TO SURPLUS

It is a matter of record that women pilots have served their countries well during periods of emergencies in both Great Britain and the United States. While the number of qualified women pilots has always been relatively small, they have made a distinct contribution to the war effort.

The opportunity for women pilots, even in time of war, has been limited. The United States Navy is forbidden by law to utilize women pilots in Navy, Marine, or Coast Guard planes. It is the policy of the Navy to utilize the experience of their returned combat and over-age pilots as service pilots. More importantly, it is Navy policy to use younger pilots for target towing, tracking, and related duties, so that the recently graduated pilots will gain experience and confidence before being assigned combat duty.

At the end of this war there will be tremendous surpluses of trained and experienced pilots throughout the world. Utilization of these surpluses will constitute an acute post-war problem. To now seek out and train, at Government expense, additional inexperienced personnel would add another surplus to this recognized post-war surplus.

WASP

The civilian organization known as the WASP is a merger of the Women's Auxiliary Ferrying Squadron (WAFS) and the Women's Flying Training Detachment (WFTD).

The WAFS were organized in September 1942 for the purpose of ferrying trainer- and liaison-type planes within the limits of the United States. Members were qualified civilian pilots with 500 hours or more of air time and a commercial license of 200-horsepower rating. This group was attached to the Second Ferrying Command and performed outstanding service during a critical period when all competent male pilots were engaged in combat or training duties.

In September 1942 the organization known as the Women's Flying Training Detachment (WFTD) was established for the purpose of training young women who could not meet the qualifications for duty in the Women's Auxiliary Ferrying Squadron (WAFS). For this purpose a school was established at Houston, Tex., and later transferred to Sweetwater, Tex.

Merger of the Women's Auxiliary Ferrying Squadron (WAFS) and the Women's Flying Training Detachment (WFTD) into the present Women's Air Service Pilots (WASP) was announced June 28, 1943.

NO SPECIFIC LEGISLATION

While there is constituted authority for the Secretary of War to appoint trained civilian personnel to such duties in the War Department as he sees fit, the staff has been unable to find, and, notwithstanding repeated requests, the War Department has failed to produce, specific authorization for the training program previously known as the Women's Flying Training Detachment, now known as the WASP, included in this merger.

It would appear that a program involving 2,500 graduate trainees, at an approximated cost of $50,000,000 of public funds, would have been of sufficient importance to have had the specific authority of the Congress.

The War Department states that in Public Law 108 (78th Cong.) it has found authority within "the general provisions of the 1943 act authorizing expenditures for the training of such civilian employees during the fiscal year 1943." The section quoted is "salaries and wages of civilian employees as may be necessary." The necessity for this training program has not been demonstrated.

STANDARDS LOWERED

A recruiting program to procure WASP trainees is vigorously pursued.

The age limit has been reduced from 21 years to 18½ years.

Required hours in the air have been reduced from 500 to 35 hours, dual or solo.

Smart uniforms, designed by John Fredericks and Carmel Bros., are furnished at Government expense. The War Department is presently encumbered with over one-half million dollars ($505,014.72) for these ensembles.

Salaries of $150 monthly plus overtime are paid trainees. Upon graduation, WASPS are paid $250 per month for services performed for the Army Air Forces.

SWEETWATER TRAINING

According to Army Air Forces, the training course at Sweetwater is somewhat comparable to that given Air Force cadets in early stages of their training. WASP recruits have not attended preflight school, and it is necessary to give them an additional amount of mathematics, physics, and certain other subjects. WASP training does not include physical conditioning to the extent given Army air cadets, nor does it include extended air acrobatic or combat maneuver training.

The Sweetwater course includes 180 to 200 hours in primary trainers of 165–200 horsepower, basic trainers of 200–450 horsepower, and advanced trainers of 450–650 horsepower. Before the completion of the course, some training is given in advanced twin-engine trainers.

Upon graduation at Sweetwater, the WASP trainee is qualified as a class 1 pilot and is ready for assignment to duty in the lighter ships or further training to gain competency in the handling of heavier aircraft.

APPROXIMATELY 80 PERCENT COMPLETE COURSE

Apparently there has been a total enrollment of 1,313 students in the Houston and Sweetwater schools. During training eliminations have been as follows:

Resignations	57
Student fatalities (does not include 2 reported Apr. 16, 1944)	5
Flying deficiencies (wash-outs)	208
Physical deficiencies	7
Disciplinary	4
Total failing to complete course	281

As of March 28, 1944, there have been 541 students graduated from the course. Of this number, 26 have been separated (18 of these resigned for personal reasons and 8 were relieved for inability to maintain required standards).

TRAINING COST: $12,150 TO $20,000-PLUS

At the outset of this inquiry information was sought as to the cost of the Sweetwater course. On February 26, War Department presented this cost as $6,540.90. This same figure had earlier been presented to the Truman committee. However, request for more complete analysis of the cost resulted in the submission, on April 21, of further detailed figures, showing the cost to be $12,150 per graduate. This larger figure includes additional items not previously mentioned:

	Cost per graduate
Original figure (tuition, student salary, plane depreciation)	$6,265.35
Additional costs:
Maintenance cost, material, labor, gas and oil	3,023.50
Personnel, military and civilian	540.10
Equipment	89.56
Travel	18.00
Uniform	326.06
Medical examination and hospitalization	66.59
Communications	8.80
Amortization, crash truck—link trainer—vehicles	95.60
Maintenance, administrative vehicles	13.64
Adjustment for eliminees	1,703.44
Total additional costs	5,885.35
Total cost per graduate	12,150.70

[1] (a) Motor inspector, aircraft plant; (b) lens polisher; (c) airport traffic control operator; (d) map expert, War Department.

It is important to consider that the $12,150 figure last submitted includes only the cost at Sweetwater, and that graduates of Sweetwater are qualified to operate only the lighter type ships, generally used in training, courier, and liaison work.

Training for operating this faster and heavier equipment is much more expensive than for the lighter types. It is necessary that these fledgling pilots have many hours of dual and solo instructions, which is costly in fuel, equipment, instructor time, and other direct and indirect expenses.

It is the studied opinion of the staff that complete training of a WASP pilot qualified to handle the faster and heavier ships costs a minimum of $20,000 per pilot. This estimate is supported by the considered opinion of highly competent civilian and military authorities.

CASUALTIES—TRAINING AND OPERATIONS

In the course of training and operations WASP fatalities, according to the War Department, have been as follows:

Training	8
Total	19

It is not possible to determine the significance of these casualties. The staff reports that WASP training and operations are not comparable to those of Army Air Forces cadets and combat trained pilots. Neither is it possible to make accurate comparisons with the Civil Aeronautics Administration-War Training Service programs. The objectives of the two programs are not comparable, the training is not identical, nor are conditions under which training is conducted similar. The WASP curriculum contains a minimum of acrobatic and combat maneuver training.

It is authoritatively stated, and there is every reason to believe, that the introduction of additional unskilled personnel into this program will accelerate the accident and fatality record.

The operational program of the WASP is somewhat selective. Flying is confined to the limits of continental United States. There are no long overwater flights. Mountain and difficult terrain is traversed over selected and well-marked routes. The miles-flown basis usually utilized for comparisons cannot apply. Accidents incurred in bomber-crew training and operation frequently cost a number of lives. WASP training and operations generally involve lighter-type ships and a single pilot.

OPERATIONS

As of March 1, 1944, a total of 532 WASPS, former members of the Women's Auxiliary Ferrying Squadron, or graduates of the Sweetwater course, were on duty with Army Air Forces in continental United States; 285 are assigned to ferrying, and the remainder to utility flying, target towing, and various other routine noncombat jobs.

For purposes of operational classification WASPS assigned to Air Transport Command are qualitatively separated into five classifications based upon training, experience, and demonstrated efficiency. Because of their significance these classifications, together with the number of WASPS in each category, are shown below:

WASP Class	WASP Pilots	Type planes	Horsepower each motor	Typical plane
1	50	Single-engine trainer	200- 650	PT-19, AT-6, BT-13.
2	125	Twin-engine trainer as above	225- 450	AT-11, AT-17, UC-78.
3	96	Twin-engine transport and cargo (instrument car required)	1,150-1,325	C-47, C-60, P-40, P-51.
4	11	Twin-engine pursuit and bombers	1,425-1,700	B-25, B-26, A-20, P-38.
5	3	4-engine bombers	1,200	B-17, B-24.

The significance of the above table with respect to the war program is all the more potent when the following facts are considered:

(a) After a year of operations, only 3 of the 285 WASP pilots with Air Transport Command are qualified in class 5 (4-engine bombers and transports). It is our information that all 3 of these top-flight WASPS were qualified aviators with more than a thousand hours each before they joined the original WAFS. It is understood that another WASP pilot of long experience is eligible for this class 5 rating. Of the 532 WASP pilots, apparently less than 1 percent are qualified to handle this type of equipment.

(b) An additional 11 WASPS are qualified in class 4; 5 of these are original WAFS and the other 6 had 200 or more hours of flying before they joined the WASPS.

(c) While 96 WASP pilots can handle the twin-engine transport and cargo ships in class 3, this group is said to be in varying stages of proficiency, inasmuch as a number only recently qualified and admittedly need more flying hours.

(d) One hundred and seventy-five of the two hundred and eighty-five, or 60 percent, are in classes 1 and 2, and are qualified to handle only relatively light planes. It is said to take 30 to 60 days for transition from class 1 to class 2, and 3 to 4 months, or longer, to successfully complete transition from class 1 to class 3. A substantial number of candidates for the higher ratings experience difficulties in making the transition, and officers in charge of WASP operations state that there is a lack of sufficient experience upon which to base an estimate of probable results.

ELIMINEES TOTAL LOSS

Authoritative sources are definite in their opinion that a large percentage of the WASPS will never qualify to pilot the faster or heavier class 3, 4, or 5 ships. Increasing apprehension over this situation was expressed. It was also called to the attention of the committee that any elimination of WASPS, or trainees, represents a total loss to the taxpayer. Army Air Forces' cadets found not qualified as pilots are given an opportunity to qualify in other capacities. Eliminees in the WASP program do not qualify for other services.

In the Army Air Forces' estimate of $12,150.70 for each WASP graduated there has been provided $1,703.44 for eliminees. On this basis, with 541 graduates, taxpayers in this country have paid to date $860,237.04 for eliminees alone. No part of this loss is retrievable. It is a total loss.

For 2,500 graduates this figure becomes $3,558,600. Whether the program is civilian or an elite officers' corps, this loss is the same—a total loss.

TRANSITIONAL TRAINING

Transition from class 1 to class 5 is a long, tedious, and expensive process requiring utilization of expensive equipment, proficient, and male instructor personnel. Information furnished the staff by the Army Air Forces has stated the facts found in the following table relative to time and instructions needed for qualifying pilots in the ferrying service for operating the more difficult aircraft:

Class	Hours needed
	Flying	Instruction
Class 1 to class 2	100	3-4
Class 2 to class 3	60	8-12
Class 3 to class 4	140	6-8
Class 4 to class 5	200	6-8

Thus, approximately 500 hours of ferrying and training with the Ferrying Division is necessary to upgrade WASPS or other Ferrying Division pilots from class 1 to class 5. This can be accomplished in approximately 1 year. The majority of training received by pilots in the Ferrying Division is accomplished during actual ferrying missions; therefore, the upgrading of WASPS varies from group to group, depending upon the class of aircraft that is being ferried by each group.

The statement was repeatedly made that if the fast fighter and heavy bomber load increased, it would be necessary to depend upon already qualified male-pilot personnel. It was bluntly stated by operation officers that with the exception of the few WASP pilots in class 4 and class 5, and a relatively few additional WASPS eligible, or soon to be, for upgrading to these classes, no great confidence was felt in the ability of hastily trained girls to successfully withstand this strain. It was pointed out that under present plans only 75 WASP graduates could be expected from Sweetwater a month; that a substantial number of these would never qualify for the "hotter" ships, and that, because of lack of confidence and reluctance to impose too heavy a burden upon inexperienced air personnel, there was a tendency to overwork the more experienced WASP pilots or to shift the assignments to seasoned male pilots. This was not an isolated viewpoint, but the directly stated or strongly implied opinion of officers who have had immediate contact with the problem and who express grave doubt as to the outcome of an expanded WASP program with its inevitable product of less-experienced pilots.

WASPS ARE CIVILIANS

The proposal to change the civil-service status of the WASP is of concern to this committee. The members of the Women's Air Service Pilots were recruited as civilians. They are under the civil service, enjoy the democratic freedom of civilians, and have won recognition as civilians.

In their civilian status many of these young women, particularly a substantial group of the more experienced, have earned the respect, approval, and confidence of the military personnel at the stations to which they are assigned. In their present civilian status WASP pilots know that no question of rank can arise to mar the present amicable relationships.

CLASSES 3, 4, AND 5 WASPS

In its report to the committee, the staff states that there exists in the present WASP organization a pool of well-qualified pilots whose services should be utilized, and this committee recommends that provision be made to adjust the salaries of these qualified WASP pilots in accordance with their experience and responsibilities. It is also recommended that provision should be made so that these qualified WASPS may obtain insurance and hospitalization.

QUALIFICATIONS DISCRIMINATORY

The training and operations of WASPS brings into focus a related situation of definite interest to this committee. The standards for acceptance for training as service pilots differ for men and women.

In the case of the WASP recruit, the standards have been lowered to 35 air hours (dual or solo). Accepted WASP recruits are given 6 months' training of approximately 200 hours. The graduate WASP is qualified to operate a class 1 plane. It should be kept in mind that the WASP graduate has approximately only 235 air hours.

In view of the above scant requirements, it cannot be understood why a qualification of 1,000 or more hours, 200 of which must be in planes of 200 or more horsepower, is required and insisted upon as a prerequisite to acceptance of the now available male instructors.

This situation becomes more confused when it is understood that many of these civilian instructors could be qualified to fly the heavier and hotter ships with a minimum of transitional training and a significant saving in expense and, more importantly, time. The average civilian instructor can be fully qualified to operate the class 4 and 5 planes months ahead of the WASP recruits now available.

It is not understood why the qualification for both men and women should not be identical, and why the proven experience of this available male personnel is not being utilized. It is impossible to escape the conclusion that this discrimination attempts to demonstrate that the millions of dollars of public funds, spent with the approval and at the insistance of the War Department, to train these civilian instructors has been unwise and unavailing. This committee must reject such reasoning.

TECHNIQUES USED IN SCREENING INSTRUCTORS

Reports received by the staff indicated that the approach made by 45 boards set up to screen civilian instructors of discontinued programs did not consider the experience of those being "screened."

A study of the certificate of acceptance reveals that the civilian instructors and reservists were given three major opportunities:

(a) Discharge from Enlisted Reserve Corps;

(b) Continuance in the Reserve Corps for training and duty with the Army Training Command; [1]

(c) Called to active duty in the Army Air Forces.

The staff stated that this is an elimination technique and does not give proper consideration to training, ability, or experience. Any figure purportedly gathered from this technique invites careful scrutiny. The chance to qualify appears prejudicial. The results of this classification should be reviewed in detail on the basis of House Resolution 16, directing investigation of the effects of such policies and practices upon the war effort.

ADDITIONAL PERSONNEL AVAILABLE

It is suggested to the Army Air Forces that there may be found the required additional personnel, given as the need for expanding the WASP program as a civilian activity, through a careful analysis and proper utilization of the following available groups of trained and partially trained air personnel:

1. Civilian instructors now released, or to be released, through curtailment of the Army Air Forces primary training schools.

2. Civilian instructors now released, or to be released, through the liquidation of the Civil Aeronautics Administration-War Training Service program.

3. Instructor-trainees of the Army Air Forces, either wholly or partially trained for the Army Air Forces by the Civil Aeronautics Administration-War Training Service training program, who, notwithstanding this costly and highly technical training, have been returned to the walking army or to ground crews or assigned other duties having no relation to the training for which millions of dollars of public funds have been spent.

4. Student trainees of the Civil Aeronautics Administration-War Training Service program who, at varying stages of their training, have been returned to other duties not connected with the purposes for which they were trained, and, who, with transitional training, would be more quickly made available than new recruits.

5. Army Air Forces commissioned instructor personnel of the Air Forces Training Command now released for other assignments because of the curtailment of the cadet-training program. Many of these instructors, because of over age, or for other reasons, will not be assigned to combat duty.

6. Commissioned personnel of the Army Air Forces returning from combat areas who have either completed their missions or, having been wounded or otherwise battle-marked, are nevertheless qualified for service pilot duties.

7. Noncommissioned personnel of the Army Air Forces whose experience and performance merits consideration for pilot or transitional training, and whose services would be more quickly available than those of new recruits.

8. Recently commissioned Army Air Force pilot personnel who desire and need further air hours and experience before being sent to combat or foreign operational duty.

9. Army Air Forces personnel now assigned to administrative duties in the United States and elsewhere who, although in flight pay status, are actually engaged in administrative, consulting, liaison, and contact duties for which payment of flight pay was not contemplated and which, in many cases, could well be done by nonflying officers. Air-WAC's, or civil-service personnel.

It is the opinion of the committee that the above categories contain an abundance of pilot personnel susceptible to immediate utilization at less expense than would be possible under the contemplated expansion of the WASP program.

ONE AND ONE-HALF YEARS

Due to the nature of the request, the investigative staff has examined with care and diligence the development of any reason or evidence which might seem to justify this proposal.

If this proposal had been made earlier in the war, when an acute shortage of pilots did exist, it is more than probable that the plan would have met with approval; but at this time, realizing that a year and a half must pass before full utilization may be expected of trainees recruited today, this committee does not consider this experiment justified.

It appears that there exists an available surplus of pilot personnel larger than the stated needs of the WASP program. The opinion of the committee is that this available surplus must be properly utilized to the full extent of its capacities before further recruiting and training of WASPS can be justified.

PUBLIC FUNDS

This inquiry has developed that the Congress appropriated substantial funds for the training of civilian pilot instructors and trainees. It is clear that large numbers of these men are not now being used for the purpose for which these funds were appropriated. Neither are the skills developed during their training being properly applied to the war effort. The reasons advanced for this diversion and dissipation of manpower trained for a specialized purpose is not acceptable to this committee. Army Air Forces is now requesting that additional millions be spent on recruiting and training inexperienced personnel to perform the functions for which these men are now, or could quickly be, qualified. It is stated by the War Department that the transitional training necessary to further qualify these men for the hotter and heavier ships can be accomplished at a fraction of the cost contemplated in the proposed program.

If the number of WASPS were increased, as proposed, to 2,500, the estimated training cost alone would be $50,000,000.

If, as indicated, the WASP program were ultimately increased to 5,000, the cost would be $100,000,000 of public funds.

Public funds are made up of the War stamps of school children, the taxes of the farmer, the savings of the wage earner, deductions from the pay envelope of the laborer, and the earnings of industry.

Congress is the custodian of these public funds, and it is with the full realization of this responsibility that the Committee on the Civil Service presents the following:

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The proposal to expand the WASP has not been justified. Therefore, it is recommended that the recruiting of inexperienced personnel and their training for the WASPS be immediately terminated.

2. That the use of the WASPS already trained and in training be continued and provision be made for hospitalization and insurance.

3. There exist several surpluses of experienced pilot personnel available for utilization as service pilots.

Therefore, it is recommended that the service of these several groups of experienced air personnel be immediately utilized.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Record of June 16, 1944:

CONGRESS PRICE CONTROL OPENS DOOR TO INFLATION

You can't expect a boxer to put up a winning fight if his manager sends him into the ring with one hand tied behind his back.

That is the handicap which both Houses of Congress, in a series of amendments to the price control bill, would impose on the Office of Price Administration.

The seriousness of such a situation cannot be exaggerated.

The economic stabilization of the Nation hinges on continued ability of O. P. A. to hold the line against runaway inflation.

It can't be held if Congress deliberately enfeebles that mainstay.

The bill extending the Price Control Act, which expires at the end of this month, is now in Senate-House conference, where it is to be taken up today.

Among obvious inflationary amendments and legal booby traps is the Bankhead Senate cotton amendment which would force an increase of from $225,000,000 to $350,000,000 in the Nation's annual bill for clothing, sheets, towels, etc.

The House rejected that amendment in its original version but inserted an equally dangerous provision which would oblige processors of agricultural products to pay parity prices for raw materials in order to charge full ceiling prices for finished products.

Other tinkerings with our well-functioning O. P. A. machinery are provisions abolishing O. P. A.'s highest price line regulation, requiring upward revision of rents under certain conditions, removing wage controls from salaries less than $37.50 a week, making ignorance of O. P. A. regulations a defense in civil suits against price-ceiling violators.

O. P. A., while not above criticism, has done a remarkably good job.

It has made the President's anti-inflationary program work.

There has been no recurrence of the disruptive days of World War No. 1, when living costs skyrocketed 107 percent between 1914 and 1920.

The congressional amendments, which would make a mockery of the title of the bill—the price-control bill—would breach the dikes. They would provide special indulgent legislation for some industries and thus, as the President has pointed out, open the door to demands for similar treatment from all industry.

O. P. A. Administrator Chester Bowles has warned that they would wreck the entire price-control program.

The Senate-House conference has a solemn and difficult duty imposed upon it by the failure of both Houses as a whole. It must prune the bill of its inflationary jokers and persuade Senate and House to reconsider.

It would be treacherous betrayal of the public if Congress in the name of price control deliberately legislated inflation on the one hand and on the other destroyed the efficiency of our main bulwark against economic chaos—the O. P. A.

President Roosevelt should not be obliged to veto the entire price-control bill to get rid of these crippling amendments. For it is urgent to get a new Price Control Act on the statute books without delay.

America's Foremost Social Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the most serious and basic problems confronting the American people is the accelerating trend of delinquency in youth. Much has been written and said on this most important subject, but I rather think it has remained for Mrs. Donald D. Conn, of Evanston, Ill., to offer a remedy that can easily be put into force, and I feel, with splendid results.

The motion picture industry confines itself almost altogether to entertaining the public, and we must agree that there is altogether too great a percentage of films presented that have an evil influence upon the young. Mrs. Conn shows how this can and should be remedied:

AMERICA'S FOREMOST SOCIAL PROBLEMS—A SUPPLEMENTAL PROGRAM OF EDUCATION TO ASSIST IN ARRESTING THE INCREASE OF DELINQUENCY AND CRIME IN YOUTH

AN APPEAL TO THE PUBLIC

The appalling increase of delinquency and crime in youth throughout America during the past 20 years presents a challenge to every citizen and to the leadership of every community.

As a result of an extensive study of this subject, I published Religion's New Frontier in 1940, urging the adoption of every means at our command to aid in molding the highest standards of character in our children without which we cannot expect this country to continue its spiritual, economic, and social progress, or to assume its position of leadership in the world to come.

I emphasized that the potentialities of one of the most important and far-reaching educational mediums in dealing with this subject—the motion-picture—had not been fully explored and offered the following suggestion: That daily motion-picture performances include a 10- to 15-minute short—a biographical sketch of a true human-interest story depicting actual examples of the influences of spiritual experiences upon lives of individuals who have traveled the same path and have met the same problems as confront the youth of today; such pictures to be dramatized by professional actors and actresses of the screen.

Both our past and present-day civilization is replete with instances where the lives of individuals have been changed or directed by spiritual experiences. My suggestion would dramatize the lessons of such experiences in those places where the great masses of our youth, including the underprivileged, congregate—the motion-picture theaters.

Aside from the home, the church, and the school, the two most influential channels of education are the radio and motion pictures, both of fairly recent origin. Substantial progress has been made in broadcasting religious services—in the use of this instrumentality for the general public good, as well as for entertainment. But the radio can be turned on and off at will, while those who attend motion-picture theaters willingly accept the continuity of the performance because of their particular interest in one of the main features. People of all walks of life, who have never seen the inside of a church, swarm into these theaters for entertainment and relaxation. The gamut of human emotion finds expression in this shrine of millions. People forget themselves. They are carried away in imagination. Their thoughts are stimulated and directed.

According to official publications of the motion-picture industry, between 80,000,000 and 85,000,000 people, well over half of the country's population, attend motion-picture performances each week.

THE REAL DEFICIENCY

It is apparent from the statements of leading crime authorities that the greatest number of our criminals spring from the masses of so-called underprivileged youth. However, the facts also show that crime is by no means restricted to the ranks of these less fortunate children. The files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation abound with instances of criminals who come from average homes but who in early childhood adopted careers of lawlessness. Authorities agree that this great segment of our youth has little, if any, foundation in spiritual education.

This deficiency, they claim, is the primary cause for the development of criminal tendencies in early childhood. Young people, unversed in spiritual education, form their own code of living and invoke self-inflicted penalties for their wrongs—their ignorance of a constructive philosophy of life leading to utter disregard of the rights, property, and lives of other people.

Recently published statistics give the population of children between the ages of 5 and 17 as 30,340,000. The Sunday school enrollment for children between these ages is 11,991,000, or about 40 percent. Even taking into consideration the children reached by the Roman Catholic Church through its parochial schools, and those enrolled by Jewish congregations in Talmud Torah schools, it is probably not far from correct to say that less than one-half of the entire population, or about 15,000,000 children in this age bracket, are not being reached by any type of spiritual education.

The problem presents complexities which require not only renewed effort on the part of all existing groups working for the betterment of youth but also the utilization of every available channel of education for reaching the great number of these young people. We do not meet the issue by assuming that mandatory academic education will suffice. Notwithstanding the combined efforts of the schools, churches, and social organizations of all kinds, delinquency and crime in youth are mounting at a rapidly increasing rate.

I do not offer my suggestion as a substitute for any of the splendid programs now in operation but merely as a supplement to the excellent work being carried on by all organizations.

CRIME MARCHES ON

Long before this country entered the present World War, the increase of delinquency and crime in youth had become a national problem so serious in its implications as to challenge the foremost consideration of the churches of all denominations, social organizations of all kinds, and of the Federal and State Governments. When civilization is faced with war, or unusual disturbances of any kind, the first victims of the resulting chaos are the children. When we relax grown-up authority, or fail to exercise it, then society as a whole pays the penalty.

The following facts are derived from well-known authorities:

The national prison population is increasing at the rate of 25,000 a year. Of the criminals sent to prison, 73 percent are between 15 and 24 years of age.

There are three and one-half times as many criminals in our penal institutions as there are students in our universities and colleges.

Major crimes are committed in the United States on the average of one in every 24 seconds—the majority by boys and girls under voting age.

More than 13,000 families each year are directly affected by criminal homicides, many of which are premeditated murders.

In addition to major crimes, there is a staggering total of 14,000,000 less serious ones during each year. Most of our criminals are boys under 20, many of them barely 16 years old.

Since 1920 the population of reformatories, prisons, correctional schools, and mental hospitals in the State of Illinois has increased by 100 percent. In this same period the State's population has grown 20 percent, one-fifth as much.

The army of criminals contains 1 out of every 29 persons in the United States. Our crime population, if concentrated in one spot, would form a metropolis larger than any city in the United States except New York.

The cost of crime now exceeds $15,000,000,000 each year.

Any person, regardless of his station in life, might become a potential victim of crime.

OUR CRUMBLING DEMOCRACY

Such is our record—the results of our failure to build and protect the spiritual fabric and the character of the youth of the Nation. Through public default, delinquency and crime among our children are gaining the upper hand in this democracy. They now threaten the whole moral and spiritual structure of the country.

We may well defeat our enemies abroad but in the process abandon the very principles which form the foundations of our economic and social order at home. The "catch, convict, and confine" treatment of criminals is not enough. There is a missing link somewhere in this problem—that link is crime prevention. Criminal careers must be checked. Juvenile demoralization must be prevented. It is the social order which produces the problem children—not the children themselves. They are amenable to such a degree and character of education as we are willing to give them.

MOTION PICTURES AND THE PUBLIC INTEREST

Essentially the motion-picture industry is devoted to money making through furnishing such entertainment as the people desire. In a broader sense, the exercise of its functions, and the implications of its programs, might well transcend the business motive of the enterprise. Motion pictures are a powerful force in molding the character of youth, whether such is their primary intent or not. Their productions can contribute to, or detract from, the teachings of our churches and the work of our social organizations. The industry is truly "clothed with the whole public interest."

Soon after the publication of Religion's New Frontier I was accorded the opportunity of discussing the proposal with the executives of the Motion Picture Producers & Distributors of America, Inc. While given a sympathetic hearing I was advised that the industry was necessarily responsive to public opinion—that I would be required to stimulate a widespread demand for such pictures before serious consideration could be given to their production. Believing this attitude to be entirely reasonable, I have, during the past several years, presented the idea to outstanding citizens throughout the country, including leaders of our churches, educational institutions, social organizations, and business enterprises. Not only has the proposal been very favorably received but I have accumulated a wealth of worth-while reactions as to the character of such productions which I shall catalog and make available to the organized sponsorship of the program at the proper time.

And, as the next logical step toward challenging public appreciation of the gravity of this problem and to encourage consideration of the proposal by all of the principal social, educational, and business elements throughout the country, I am making a general distribution of this summary—extra copies of which are available upon request.

Corn for Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I have requested permission to put information in the RECORD that was sent to me by the War Food Administration relative to the use of corn for industry because I feel that it is not generally known that of this agricultural product 130,000,000 bushels of corn is needed annually for this purpose. It is another indication as to what the farmers of the country are doing in connection with the prosecution of the war.

Under the permission granted me, I include the statement. It follows:

The war production program of this country is threatened with interruption because of a shortage of corn. Although requirements of corn by war industries are less than 1 out of every 25 bushels grown last year, the flow of corn from farm to factory has fallen off to a mere trickle. Receipts of corn at primary markets have dropped from 10,000,000 bushels a week in January to two and one-half million bushels the last of March. Only part of the little corn being marketed is available to war industries which have minimum needs of two and one-half million bushels a week.

Corn goes into the production of nearly every war weapon. For example, corn is necessary for all foundry work, such as the casting and molding of bronze, steel, aluminum, and magnesium, for all textile production, for all paper manufacturing, for drugs and chemicals, and for adhesive production.

Unlike most farmers who can substitute other grains for corn as feed, the corn processors have no substitute materials for corn. If processors can't get corn, they shut down. And that is what is happening today—corn-processing plants are shutting down; supplies and vital war materials are running short.

The situation is so serious that Secretary of War Stimson, Secretary of the Navy Knox, War Production Chairman Nelson, and War Food Administrator Jones are appealing to United States farmers to sell more corn.

HOW MUCH CORN IS NEEDED

While corn-processing industries generally need 300,000,000 bushels of corn a year for civilian and war uses, around 130,000,000 bushels of this total—11,000,000 bushels a month—are absolutely indispensable to keep our war machine running and to meet essential civilian needs. This 130,000,000 bushels is only 4 percent of the 3,000,000,000 bushels grown by United States farmers in 1943.

The wet-corn-milling industry has been operating 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, since 1942. Nine wet-corn millers manufacture the starch, sirups, and sugars needed for war products. These are located at Robey and Indianapolis, Ind.; St. Louis and Kansas City, Mo.; Clinton, Keokuk, and Cedar Rapids, Iowa; and at Argo, Pekin, and Decatur, Ill.

Six dry-corn millers manufacture core binders and other industrial products for war. These are in Milwaukee, Wis.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Decatur and Paris, Ill.; Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; and Geneva, N. Y.

A larger plant at Peoria, Ill., makes alcohol and explosives.

HOW CORN FIGHTS

Drugs, vitamins

Thirty to forty million pounds of cornstarch, sugar, and sirup annually. Corn has made it possible to quadruple the production of penicillin, the entire production of which is going to the armed services for treatment of the wounded. Corn also goes into sulfa drugs, aspirin, other pharmaceuticals.

Butyl alcohol

Three million bushels of corn annually. High on the list of critical war materials. Through butyl-alcohol channels, corn is converted to butyl acetate, from which it emerges as lacquer and protective coatings for ammunition, aircraft, aircraft parts, guns, and gun mounts. Converted into dibutyl phthlate, corn emerges as smokeless powder and as plasticizers, vital to the manufacture of many types of coatings. Butyl alcohol flies in the gasoline tanks of our air forces in the form of inhibitors which discourage rust and stabilize the high-octane gasoline and prevent the formation of gummy substances; it goes into the rubber which makes bullet-proof gasoline tanks for planes; it is used in the manufacture of photographic film, most of which is taken by the military.

Chemicals and explosives

More than 50,000,000 pounds of cornstarch and corn grits annually. As starch, corn goes into dynamite, nitrocellulose; soaked with nitroglycerine, flakes of cornstarch fire our fighters' big guns.

Core binders, molders

One hundred to one hundred and fifty million pounds of starch annually. Starch from corn is used in foundry work, in special molds for castings of aluminum, steel, iron, magnesium, bronze, and copper which go into airplane engines, tanks, and other war implements.

Production of aluminum and other critical metals

More than 10,000,000 pounds annually. It would be impossible to produce aluminum without starch which is the only flotation agent capable of transmuting bauxite, the raw material, into alumina.

Paper and paper products

Three hundred million pounds of starch and dextrins annually. V-board containers for overseas shipments to our fighting forces take more than 100,000,000 pounds of starch and dextrins a year. More than 200,000,000 pounds are required for sizing paper products.

Textiles and cotton rayons

More than 300,000,000 pounds of cornstarch, annually for essential uses. Cornstarch sizing makes cloth sturdy. It also is used in finishing denims, ducks, as fiber glass cloth for bomber brake linings, and as camouflage cloth (printed with ink from corn). Surgical dressings are improved by starch treatment, enabling wounded fighters to recover more quickly.

Adhesives

More than 100,000,000 pounds of cornstarch yearly. Used to make airplane parts. The special plyboard veneer wings on newest type planes require corn products. Corn makes watertight and vermin-proof the containers which hold Army supplies.

Corn sirup

Over 25,000,000 bushels of corn annually and dextrose go into emergency ration kits, and into the jams and jellies which provide energy foods for fighters, war workers. In emergency cases dextrose can be injected directly into the blood stream.

CONVERSION FACTORS

On the average, refiners get about 34 pounds of cornstarch from 17 bushel of corn.

If starch is converted into sirup 1 bushel of corn produces 40 pound. of corn sirup.

The Army and Navy require more than 400,000,000 pounds of refined corn products annually for food uses.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DATE

Because corn was not moving to refineries in sufficient volume to insure uninterrupted production of essential war products, the War Food Administration conferred with representatives of the corn industry in mid-March to discuss the problem and determine a course of action.

1. As a result, W. F. A. issued Food Distribution Order No. 96, effective March 24, requiring country and terminal elevators to set aside 35 percent of their current stocks of yellow and mixed corn for sale to designated purchasers; requiring country elevators to set aside 35 percent of their future receipts; and requiring terminal elevators to set aside a similar quantity of their future receipts from sources other than country elevators.

2. On April 1 representatives of the corn industry reported that the situation was becoming progressively more acute, with very meager quantities of corn being delivered to the grain elevators. Effective as of that date, W. F. A. increased the set-aside percentage of 60 percent.

The order applies to counties in the five largest corn-producing States:

Minnesota: Blue Earth, Brown, Chippewa, Cottonwood, Faribault, Jackson, Lac Qui Parle, Lincoln, Lyon, Martin, Murray, Nobles, Pipestone, Redwood, Renville, Rock, Watonwan, Yellow Medicine.

Nebraska: Burt, Butler, Cass, Cunning, Dodge, Douglas, Lancaster, Otoe, Sarpy, Saunders, Seward, Thurston, Washington.

Iowa: Audubon, Boone, Buena Vista, Calhoun, Carroll, Cerro Gordo, Cherokee, Clay, Crawford, Dallas, Dickinson, Emmet, Franklin, Fremont, Greene, Grundy, Guthrie, Hamilton, Hancock, Hardin, Harrison, Humboldt, Ida, Jasper, Kossuth, Lyon, Marshall, Mills, Monona, Montgomery, O'Brien, Osceola, Page, Palo Alto, Plymouth, Pocahontas, Polk, Pottawattamie, Poweshiek, Sac, Shelby, Sioux, Story, Tama, Webster, Winnebago, Woodbury, Wright.

Illinois: Bureau, Cass, Champaign, Christian, De Witt, Douglas, Edgar, Ford, Fulton, Grundy, Iroquois, Kankakee, Kendall, Knox, La Salle, Lee, Livingston, Logan, McLean, Macon, Marshall, Mason, Menard, Morgan, Moultrie, Peoria, Piatt, Putnam, Sangamon, Scott, Stark, Tazewell, Vermilion, Will, Woodford.

Indiana: Benton, Fountain, Jasper, Montgomery, Newton, Pulaski, Starke, Tippecanoe, Vermillion, Warren, White.

WAR INDUSTRIES NEED MORE CORN NOW

Every bomb dropped on Germany and every shell fired in the Pacific contains some refined corn. Every plane blasting the Jap depends upon corn—its engine is cast in a mold made in part from corn starch, and many planes have special ply-board veneer wings made possible only through use of corn products. Our soldiers and sailors wear uniforms treated with cornstarch and eat food shipped in boxes made in part from corn.

Corn fights—and it has no substitute.

WAR FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C.:

In accordance with the request of the Interagency Corn Committee on April 4, I am transmitting for the War Production Board the list of essential commercial uses of corn and corn products which the War Production Board would like to have you, as Administrator of F. Important Message to Next of Kin of Men and Women in Armed Forces

OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, with the invasion now under way on the western front, with the fierce battles raging in Italy and the Southwest Pacific, as our boys on the battle fronts of the world move into the crucial struggle for victory, unfortunately there will come to the people of the Nation and to my district a great many telegrams reporting our soldiers, wounded, missing, or killed in action.

For the benefit of my people in the twenty-third district and for the information of the Members of the House, I want to point out how we can be of service to the people of our various districts in the hope that we can help to alleviate some of their trials and troubles in knowing how to approach the Federal Government in order to settle their claims wherein they are beneficiaries of the men and women now in the armed service.

The next of kin of one who loses his life in the service is eligible for one or more of four different monetary benefits, as follows:

First. A 6-month gratuity payment: This payment is automatically paid to a wife or, if there is no wife, to a child or children. If there is no wife or child, this gratuity goes to dependent parents or other dependent relatives—grandchildren, brothers, sisters, or grandparents—who have been named by the soldier to receive this gratuity pay. If there is no wife or child or dependent relatives named by the soldier, this gratuity is paid to any dependent relative if they are shown to have been dependent upon the soldier before his death. The amount of this payment depends upon the amount of pay the soldier was receiving at the time of his death—not including rental and subsistence pay. The beneficiary receives six times this monthly payment.

Second. Monthly insurance payments: This insurance is not paid in a lump sum. It is paid on a monthly basis, depending on the age of the beneficiary. The older the beneficiary, the higher is each monthly payment. On a $10,000 policy a beneficiary under 30 years of age will receive $55.10 a month for 240 months. A beneficiary over 30 years of age will get a guaranteed 120 equal installments—and if they survive beyond 120 months it is paid for life. The amount of monthly payment, if the beneficiary is over 30, depends on the age of the beneficiary. Under a $10,000 policy a 50-year-old beneficiary will get $53.90 monthly. Under the same policy a 70-year-old beneficiary will get $85.10 monthly, and so forth.

Parents and next of kin should check with the men and women in service to see that all insurance policies are in order and a certificate in the hands of the beneficiaries. An insurance policy taken out by men and women in service can name any of the following as beneficiaries: Wife, husband, child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parents, brother, or sister including those of half blood.

All dependents and next of kin ought to check the insurance policy now. See that everything is in order now. It might save a lot of grief in the future. Negligence has caused many a beneficiary to lose out. A little care can avoid a lot of trouble should anything happen.

Third. A pension: This pension is paid automatically to a wife and children. All children under 18 are eligible. Children up to 21 are eligible if they are in school up to that time. If a child marries before 18 or 21, they are not eligible for this pension. Parents who have been dependent upon the deceased man or woman in service are also entitled to a pension. Parents who have been dependent upon a deceased soldier can get a pension at the same time his wife and children are getting a pension. The amounts of the monthly pension are as follows:

One parent, $45 a month; two parents, $25 each; widow but no child, $50; widow with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child—subject to apportionment regulations; no widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38—equally divided, with $10 for each additional child—total divided. Total pension as to widow, child, or children not to exceed $100.

Note: The fact that a widow, a child, or parent gets insurance does not prevent them from getting a pension also. They can collect insurance and get a pension besides.

Fourth. Arrears of pay: When a casualty occurs that service man or woman who has become a casualty may have back pay coming. For instance, if the casualty occurs on the 27th of the month he had 27 days' pay coming. If the casualty occurs on the 15th of the month he had 15 days' back pay coming. Then, too, when soldiers are at the front in actual combat they may miss several pay days. All of this back pay is paid to the nearest heir. The nearest heir of the deceased serviceman should inquire about and collect this arrears of pay if the service man or woman becomes a casualty.

SUMMARY

Should there be a death casualty in your family remember there are one or more of four payments due the dependents: First, 6 months' gratuity payment; second, insurance; third, a pension; and, fourth, arrears of pay. If there are any questions, or should you know anyone having difficulty getting their payments from the Government, it would be well for them to take it up with their Congressman. He will be glad to handle the case for them. Citizens of the Twenty-third District of Illinois may write Congressman CHARLES W. VURSELL, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Benefits Provided Under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944—S. 1767

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an analysis of benefits provided under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944. This analysis was compiled under the direction of Omar B. Ketchum, director of the V. F. W. National Service Bureau and legislative representative of that organization. The members of his staff have made a very thorough study of this legislation and I am confident the analysis will be helpful to returning veterans, and the service officers of all organizations:

ELIGIBILITY

To be eligible for benefits under the act—except as to employment—a man or woman must have served in the active forces of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, or one of their components, during the period beginning September 16, 1940, and ending with the termination of the present war. Such person must have served for at least 90 days, or have been sooner discharged for disability incurred in line of duty, and in addition, must have been discharged or released from active service under conditions other than dishonorable.

TITLE I. HOSPITALIZATION, CLAIMS, AND PROCEDURES

The Veterans' Administration is determined to be an essential war agency entitled to priorities in personnel, materials, etc., second only to the War and Navy Departments. State institutions to be built for the care or hospitalization of veterans shall have the same priorities for materials.

The Veterans' Administration shall provide adequate facilities, and an apropriation of $500,000,000 is authorized. The Veterans' Administration and War and Navy Departments are authorized to arrange for mutual use of hospitals, equipment, etc.

The Veterans' Administration is authorized to place employees in Army and Navy hospitals to adjudicate disability claims and give aid and advice to persons about to be discharged from active service.

No person shall be discharged or released from active service until discharge certificate and final pay, or a substantial portion thereof, are ready for delivery to him or to his next of kin or legal representative.

No person shall be discharged from active service on account of disability until and unless he has executed a claim for compensation, pension, or hospitalization, to be filed with the Veterans' Administration, or has signed a statement that he has had explained to him the right to file such claim. Refusal or failure to file a claim shall be without prejudice to any right the veteran may subsequently assert.

No person in the armed forces shall be required to sign a statement of any nature relating to the origin, incurrence, or aggravation of any disease or injury he may have, and any such statement against his own interest signed at any time, shall be null and void and of no force and effect.

Paid full-time accredited representatives of recognized veterans' organizations are to be permitted to function in the various discharge centers to aid servicemen about to be discharged in the preparation and presentation of their claims for benefits.

Boards of review are to be established by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, which boards are given authority to review, on their own motion or on request of a veteran or his representative, the type and nature of discharge or dismissal, except one by sentence of court martial, and upon the facts found, to change, correct, or modify such discharge or dismissal. The findings of the board shall be subject to the final approval of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy. Request for review must be filed within 15 years after separation from the service or 15 years after effective date of the act, whichever is the later.

The Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury are authorized to assemble, from time to time, boards of review composed of five members to consider the request of any officer retired or released to inactive service, without pay, for physical disability pursuant to the decision of a retiring board, the findings and decision of such retiring board. Request for review must be filed within 15 years after separation from the service or 15 years after effective date of the act, whichever is the later.

TITLE II. EDUCATION OF VETERANS

This title makes available to eligible veterans courses of education or training ranging from 1 to 4 years, depending on length of service; authorizes payment to the veteran of a subsistence allowance of $50 per month while he is receiving education or training; with an additional $25 per month if he has a dependent or dependents; and grants to educational institutions up to $500 for each veteran enrolled during an ordinary school year to cover tuition, other fees, books, etc.

The veteran's education or training must have been impeded, delayed, or interrupted or interfered with by reason of his entrance into the service, or he must show need for a refresher or retraining course. Any person who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service shall be deemed to have had his education or training impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with. Service under the Army specialized training program or naval college training program or as a cadet or midshipman does not count as qualifying service.

The eligible veteran may attend an educational institution of his own choice in any State for the purpose of taking the course elected by him, for a period of 1 calendar year or the equivalent thereof in part-time study, and upon satisfactory completion of the 1-year course of study, he may continue for an additional period not to exceed the time he was in active service and exclusive of educational courses taken during his active service. However, a refresher or retrainer course may not exceed 1 year.

Part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance, but with payment of tuition and other expenses is permissible.

Books and equipment furnished the veteran may be kept by him if he satisfactorily completes his course of education or training.

Any course may be discontinued if and when the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs decides the conduct or progress of the veteran is unsatisfactory.

The right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities is extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941, thus amending Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress.

TITLE III. LOANS FOR THE PURCHASE OR CONSTRUCTION OF HOMES, FARMS, AND BUSINESS PROPERTY

The United States Employment Service shall assign to each of the States a veterans' employment representative, who shall be a veteran of the wars of the United States separated from active service under honorable conditions, who at the time of appointment shall have been a bona fide resident of the State for at least 2 years, and who shall be appointed, subject to the approval of the board, in accordance with the civil-service laws. He shall be responsible for the supervision of the registration of veterans in local employment officers and for their placement in employment; assist in furnishing current information as to the various types of available employment in public works and private industry or business; and otherwise promote the employment of veterans.

The person is not receiving subsistence allowance for education or training under title II of the act or increased pension for vocational training under Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress.

To be eligible the person must (a) reside in the United States; (b) be completely unemployed, or, if partially employed, at wages less than $23 per week; (c) be registered with and report to a public employment office; (d) be able to work and available for suitable work.

Within the 52 weeks limit the total eligibility is determined by allowing 8 weeks of allowances for each of the first 3 months of service, and 4 weeks of allowances for each month or major fraction thereof of service beyond 3 months.

No allowance may be paid for any period more than 5 years after the end of the war.

The allowance of $20 per week will be reduced by any Federal or State unemployment or disability compensation—other than pension, compensation, or retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administration—received by the veteran for the same period of time.

Any person self-employed for profit in an independent establishment, trade, business, profession, or other vocation is eligible for readjustment allowances (a) if net earnings are less than $100 for the previous calendar month; (b) the amount of allowance to be the difference between the net earnings and $100 per month; (c) the conditions as to eligibility otherwise as provided in Title V.

Severe penalties are provided for fraud and misrepresentation in connection with claims for readjustment allowances.

Readjustment allowance claims are to be serviced by State agencies or as to railway employees, by the Railroad Retirement Board.

Right of appeal from any such agency to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is preserved.

TITLE VI. GENERAL ADMINISTRATIVE AND PENAL PROVISIONS

By definition "veterans" are included those who reside within the continental United States, several States, territories, and possessions, and the District of Columbia.

A discharge or release from active service under conditions other than dishonorable is made a prerequisite to entitlement to benefits under Public Law No. 2, as amended, as well as this act. This will apply to (a) pensions, (b) compensation, (c) hospitalization, (d) domiciliary care, (e) vocational training, (f) benefits provided under this act.

Veterans' Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LA VERN R. DILWEG

OF WISCONSIN

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. DILWEG. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Touchdown Club of Washington, D. C., I have attended several of their very interesting, snappy Tuesday luncheons. I missed out on the luncheon last Tuesday, June 13, 1944, and therefore missed an excellent address made by Maj. O. W. Clark, Assistant Administrator of the Veterans' Administration, but one of my fellow members, Thomas J. Kehoe, assistant national service director of the Disabled American Veterans, has been kind enough to furnish me with a copy of the major's talk, and because of the well-coordinated information therein concerning veteran benefits generally I here insert his address as a part of my remarks, as follows:

Public interest in the care of the men and women who have served or are now serving in our armed forces has raised many questions regarding the assistance such persons may expect from the Federal Government after their separation from military service. For many years our only form of relief for disabled veterans was a pension. The history of the rehabilitative measures, adopted from time to time, will provide a better understanding of the Nation's willingness and desire to assist the returned veteran to become a useful citizen.

Pension legislation in this country was first enacted by the different States for the relief of those who were wounded or disabled in service during the War of the Revolution, but in 1789 by an act of Congress the Federal Government assumed the payment of such pensions as had been granted by the States and this provision was continued by subsequent legislation. Throughout our history provision has been made for those who became disabled while serving in our armed forces and for certain dependents of those who died while in the service or as the result of service-incurred disabilities. The care of veterans has become a national responsibility. This is as it should be. In no other way could there exist uniformity of benefits to those who served honorably.

Prior to August 9, 1921, the only provision made for the care of veterans who were in need of medical treatment was that available in the hospitals of the United States Public Health Service and the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. Before that date veterans were forced to contact the Pension Bureau, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Federal Board for Vocational Rehabilitation, the United States Public Health Service, or the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. The uncertainty in the ex-serviceman's mind regarding the agency which might serve him caused chaos and public criticism. Because of the number of World War No. 1 veterans who were, by circumstances, forced to go from one agency to another, the United States Veterans' Bureau was created by an act of Congress. There was transferred to that agency the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, that part of the Public Health Service engaged in the examination and hospital care of World War No. 1 veterans, and that part of the Federal Board for Vocational Education engaged in the vocational rehabilitation of such persons. An act of Congress dated July 3, 1930, created the Veterans' Administration by the consolidation of the United States Veterans' Bureau, the Pension Bureau, and the National Home for Volunteer Soldiers. Subsequent to that date there is but one agency of the Government charged with the responsibility of awarding benefits to veterans.

The Veterans' Administration is organized on a functional basis. There is complete centralization of policymaking, supervision, and control, and generally a complete decentralization of operations. There are 104 field facilities in the several States so as to serve the veterans most expeditiously and economically.

Most persons now in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard have purchased national service life insurance. Life insurance coverage amounts to approximately $114,000,000,000. Deductions from the monthly pay of persons in the service is made in most cases to keep such insurance in force. After discharge from the service an insured may continue the life protection by remittance to the collection subdivision, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

Honorably discharge veterans are entitled to hospital treatment in our hospitals regardless of cause or time of disablement except that due to misconduct.

Over 1,000,000 men and women have already been discharged from active service since December 7, 1941, and more than one-half of those on account of disability. Over 325,000 disability claims have been received by the Veterans' Administration, a number not ex-ment Act of 1944. This analysis was or increase with the decrease of the amount of unpaid obligation; (g) the agreement

ceeded, incident to World War No. 1, until a year and 4 months after the armistice. Our adjudication capacity, early in the war, was only about 6,000 new claims. That was the number of claims we could dispose of currently. We are proud to report that in March 1944 over 45,000 new claims were adjudicated. The pending load mounted at first due to lack of personnel to dispose of it, but in March and April the pending load was reduced by 40,000 claims and now stands slightly over 70,000. Of the adjudicated claims, 58 percent have been allowed, and in March the figure was 71 percent, reflecting the full effect of current legislation. There are 154,056 veterans with service-connected disabilities on the pension rolls, a number not reached in World War No. 1, until long after the armistice. We have every expectation of becoming current in July of this year.

The amount of monthly pension ranges from $10 to $100 per month depending upon the degree of disablement. These rates have recently been increased 15 percent. There are other statutory rates which provide monthly pension for specific disabilities, the maximum of which is $250 per month.

With a view to reducing the time consumed in securing essential service and medical records and adjudicating claims for disability pension to an absolute minimum, the Veterans' Administration with the cooperation of the War and Navy Departments undertook an experiment of establishing groups of Veterans' Administration employees at Army and Navy discharge centers to adjudicate claims for disability pension filed by enlisted men discharged for disability.

Groups, or units, of Veterans' Administration employees were established at Walter Reed General Hospital, Washington, D. C.; Ft. Devens, Mass.; and United States Navy Hospital, Great Lakes, Ill. These groups were authorized to completely adjudicate claims for disability pension filed by enlisted men discharged for disability at the Army or Navy stations mentioned. However, adjustment of account and authorization of payment of disability pension to the Division of Disbursements, Treasury Department, was accomplished by the regional office or facility with regional office activities having jurisdiction over the territory in which the mailing address of the veteran was located and to which the case folder was transferred.

It soon became apparent that this plan was not feasible because there were approximately 650 Army and Navy stations from which enlisted men were discharged for disability and the number of discharges for disability ranged from four or five to over a thousand a month. To establish a group of Veterans' Administration employees at each of the 650 discharge centers was impossible due to the manpower situation. Furthermore, had it been possible to secure sufficient trained personnel to establish groups at each discharge center, it would have been a flagrant waste of manpower and funds, as the number of discharges for disability per month from the overwhelming majority of discharge centers would not warrant or justify a group even of the minimum number of employees required to adjudicate claims for disability pension.

In view of these circumstances and the increased pressure, both public and private, to expedite the adjudication of claims for disbility pension filed by World War No. 2 veterans discharged for disability, it was imperative that the Veterans' Administration adopt a plan to accomplish the results desired.

After due consideration and study, the plan to establish nine area offices, one for each Army service command area, was adopted by the Veterans' Administration.

It is the function of these nine area offices to initially adjudicate all claims for disability pension filed by enlisted men who are discharged from World War No. 2 military or naval service because of disability and make application for this benefit at the time of or prior to discharge. The adjudication includes adjustment of account and authorization of payment of disability pension to the Division of Disbursements, Treasury Department, for the first and second monthly pension checks when in order. When the claim is adjudicated the case folder with related records is transferred to the Veterans' Administration regional office that has jurisdiction over the territory in which the mailing address of the veteran is located. When notified of the adjudication action taken by the area office, the veteran is advised to address further communications regarding his claim to the Veterans' Administration office to which his claim was transferred.

By greater concentration of employees and specialization in adjudication of a particular class of claims, not feasible in a regional office, the adjudication will be accelerated and the lapse of time between date of receipt of claim and initial payment of pension will be expedited and held to a minimum. In addition, training of new personnel is facilitated.

Reports received from the several area managers indicate that when inexperienced personnel become familiar with procedure and detail and more proficient, the maximum lapse of time between date of receipt of claim and date case folder is transferred will be 1 week. As a matter of fact, one area office reports that cases were adjudicated within 24 hours of date of receipt of claim. A claim adjudicated and transferred within 6 or 7 days of its receipt certainly should be classed as receiving expedited action, and this, of course, was the purpose motivating the creation of the area offices.

In order to provide for the vocational rehabilitation of the service men and women of World War No. 2, the Seventy-eighth Congress of the United States extended the rehabilitation activities of the Veterans' Administration by the passage of Public Law 16, which provides for a program to last 6 years after the termination of the war.

The purpose of vocational rehabilitation is to restore the employability lost by virtue of a handicap due to a service-incurred disability.

To be eligible for such training, the individual must have been in the active military or naval service any time after December 6, 1941, and during the present war; must have been honorably discharged; must have a disability incurred in or aggravated by such service for which pension is payable under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, or would be but for the receipt of retirement pay; and must be in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap caused by such service-connected disability.

During the training period and for 2 months afterward, the veteran, if single, will receive a pension of $80 a month; and if married, $90 a month, and will receive $5 a month additional for each dependent child and $10 a month for each dependent parent.

In carrying out the rehabilitation program for disabled veterans, the Veterans' Administration will use recognized or accredited schools and colleges and industrial enterprises for training on the job.

To make application for vocational rehabilitation, the veteran should write to the Veterans' Administration and request an application for pension. This will initiate the determination as to whether the veteran has a pensionable disability resulting in a vocational handicap. If a vocational handicap is present, the veteran will be advised that he or she may make application for vocational training. Arrangements for vocational training will be made by the Veterans' Administration having jurisdiction in the territory in which the veteran intends to reside permanently.

Previous to entrance upon a training program, the veteran will undergo a process of advisement in which his abilities and disabilities will be considered in relation to his adjustment in an occupation. This advisement will take into consideration his education, previous vocational training, skills, aptitudes, interests, and personal desires. When the advisement is completed and an occupational objective has been selected, the training program will be carried on by means of existing agencies particularly selected for the purpose. The object of this training is to supply the disabled person with a well-rounded knowledge of the occupation and ability to perform all of the skills, job operations, and work tasks which are essential to meeting employment requirements.

The training will be carried on in the nearest suitable training facility. Training on the job is provided in the veteran's home community whenever possible to avoid unnecessary dislocation. Institutional training is generally provided in the institution nearest to the veteran's residence which is prepared to give the training prescribed. Tuition, books, supplies, and other incidentals are furnished in institutional training and all necessary equipment and supplies are provided in training on the job.

Under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration provision is made for the payment of death benefits to the widows and children and dependent parents of men whose deaths are held to have been in line of duty and not the result of their own misconduct.

Upon receipt of notice of death from the service department, appropriate forms are forwarded by the Veterans' Administration.

Payment of benefits is effective from the day following the date of death if application is received within 1 year from the date of death; otherwise, payments would be effective from date of receipt of the application.

Benefits are payable to the unremarried widow or child under the age of 18 unless prior to reaching the age of 18 such child becomes permanently incapable of self-support by reason of mental or physical defects. Payments may be continued until the age of 21 if the child is pursuing an approved course of instruction.

Widow but no child, $50; widow with one child, $65; with $13 for each additional child. No widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38 (equally divided) with $10 for each additional child (total equally divided). Total amount payable to widow and children, $100.

The dependent parents are entitled to $25 each or $45 for one parent.

The father or mother will not be considered dependent if it is shown that they both have sufficient income to provide for their reasonable support and maintenance, including clothing and medical attention for themselves and family under legal age, or any age if physically or mentally incapacitated.

Discussion of the so-called "G. I. Bill of Rights" has not been included in these remarks, as that bill is still pending final action by the Congress.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, this Tuesday luncheon at the Touchdown Club, at which Maj. O. W. Clark, Assistant Administrator of the Veterans' Administration, delivered the above-quoted address, was appropriately featured by the presence of several special guests of the club, consisting mostly of amputated veterans of World War No. 2.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the people of the Twenty-third District of Illinois which I have the honor to represent and the Members of this body, all of whom are interested, I want to briefly point out the benefits which have been written into law which can be obtained by those who are dependent upon the soldier who is in the armed service, and, may I point out, these benefits apply as well to the dependents of women in our service forces.

I hope the dependents in my district will save this article for future use as they may find it will answer questions which may later come to them for decision.

There are three principal classes of dependents to which this dependency benefit law applies and their allowances are as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, $42; a divorced wife with one child, $72; a divorced wife with each additional child, $20. Note: A wife separated or divorced from a man in service will get no more than the amount fixed in a court order or decree in case of alimony. If the divorce or separation order does not call for alimony or separate maintenance she will not receive any allowance.

Class B dependents: A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers and sisters, $37; two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37. Note.—Class B dependents, it must be clearly understood, are dependents who are only partially dependent upon service men and women for support. In other words, if the dependents are dependent upon men or women in service 50 percent or less, but are still substantially dependent, they come under class B. Only $37 is allowed no matter if there are one or even four or five more partially dependent. Those who make application for family allowance, therefore, should be very careful to show the full degree of their dependency. This is important.

Class B–1 dependents: One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; one parent and each additional brother or sister, $11. Two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $79; two parents and each additional brother or sister, $11; a brother or sister but no parents, $42; each additional brother or sister without parents, $11.

HOW TO GET THE ALLOWANCE

Wherever possible as soon as a man or woman enters service his or her application for the allowance should be made immediately when they are inducted. The allowance payments do not go back. The payments begin with the first of the month in which the application is filed. Therefore, if the man or women in service waits a month after induction before an application is filed, 1 month's allowance is lost. The longer they wait to file an application the more money is lost. It is important that they file an application for this allowance within 15 days after they are inducted.

The man or woman in service should submit the application on a form which they can get from the commanding officer. In filling out this form they should be careful to spell all names correctly and give exact information as to marriage, dates of birth, and so forth. Many of the troubles dependents have in getting their allowance are due to the fact that the service man or woman is careless in filling out the blank. An extra minute in filling out the blank may save several months' time in getting the allowance approved. The application should then be handed to the commanding officer.

If the service man or woman for some reason or other fails to make application, or is in a position where he or she cannot make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. If there is any question as to where or how to apply just drop a letter to your Congressman. The Army requires their regular application blank to be filled out. The Navy requires merely a letter giving the name of applicant's wife, and children, dates of birth, and so forth. Therefore, if any class A dependent does not know for certain just how to apply, he or she could well write a Member of Congress and ask for instructions.

If the man or woman in service with class B or B–1 dependents declines to make an application for a family allowance for them, no other person can apply. Class B and B–1 allowances are granted and continued only at the will of the man or woman in service. They cannot be forced to make application. Wherever the service man or woman with class B or class B–1 dependents is overseas and fails to make application, and these dependents are reasonably sure that he will approve it, they can make application. However, the permission of the man or woman in service will have to be obtained before application for family allowance is approved for class B or B–1 dependents.

Family allowances are compulsory only when applied for for class A dependents.

PARENTS AND BROTHERS AND SISTERS CAN RECEIVE ALLOWANCES AT THE SAME TIME AS WIFE AND CHILDREN

It is also important to know that parents and brothers and sisters can get an allowance even if the serviceman's wife and children get one. In other words, if men or women in service have parents and brothers and/or sisters dependent upon them as well as a wife and children—all of these dependents can get a family allowance. For example: If there is a wife and child dependent on the man in service they get $80. If this same man in service has two parents and a sister, also dependent upon him for chief support, they too, can get $79 a month also. This is important. To get this extra $79 only $5 more is taken out of the serviceman's pay. The balance of the $74 is paid by the Government. If the parents and brothers or sisters are only partially dependent, that is, less than 50 percent dependent but still dependent to a substantial degree, they can get $37. Because a serviceman has a wife and children getting an allowance does not prevent his parents and brothers and sisters dependent on him from getting an allowance also. If you have any question on this write your Congressman and he will explain how to go about it.

PARENTS CAN GET ALLOWANCES FROM MORE THAN ONE SON OR DAUGHTER IN SERVICE

If parents are dependent upon more than one son or daughter or both in service, they can get more allowance. For instance, if two parents are greatly dependent upon a son in service, they get $68 per month. Now, if another son or daughter in service helped support these same two parents, they can get another $37 from the second son or daughter.

YOUR CONGRESSMAN OFTEN CAN HELP YOU

It is a Congressman's function to help with such matters. He is your Representative in Washington. If you have any difficulty at all in this respect, your Congressman is the person to take it up with.

If any questions arise regarding where to get application blanks or how to make an application, write to Congressman CHARLES W. VURSELL, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

A Message to and Information for Mother Whose Husband Is in Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, at this time I want to explain for the benefit of the wives of servicemen what the Congress has done in order to aid them in maternity cases.

The following facts should be of extreme interest to the women of America whose hubands are in the armed service:

Congress has appropriated $24,200,000 for this maternity care for wives of servicemen of the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh grades. We have made possible through legislation we have passed for the wife of the man in service in these lower four grades to receive medical, nursing, and infant care without cost during that maternity period. In Illinois, our State Department of Public Health, Springfield, Ill., cooperating with the Federal Government's program, directs and administers this service through the division of child hygiene.

Inquiries relative to these benefits and this program may be directed to Division of Maternal and Child Hygiene, Department of Public Health, Springfield, Ill.

Under this plan the wife of the man in service may receive prenatal care from a qualified doctor at her home or at the doctor's office. At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided, including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. Besides all this, the baby is entitled to free medical care during the first year of life.

IMPORTANT TO FOLLOW RULES

Wives of servicemen should acquaint themselves thoroughly with the rules set down for this free medical attention. The rules set down in Illinois are clearly stated and must be met in order to receive this care and service. The wife should see a doctor at the first sign of pregnancy. She should then ask the doctor for an application form to apply for this free service. If the doctor does not have these blanks, write to the Division of Maternal and Child Hygiene, Department of Public Health, Springfield, Ill., and ask them to send a blank to you. Fill out the application blank carefully. Be sure to include your husband's army serial number. The wife fills in part 1 of the blank. Ask your doctor to fill in part 2 at once, and rush it to Springfield, Ill., for approval.

APPLY EARLY

It is important that wives apply for this in early pregnancy. The State Department of Public Health will not approve payment of the doctor, hospital, or any service before the application is made out. It is important that the application be made out by the wife at the first sign of pregnancy. In case of an emergency be sure that the doctor makes application for you immediately. It is most important to get the application filled out and sent in at the earliest possible time. See your doctor at the first sign of pregnancy and apply for this free service.

Wives can see their regular family doctor for this. It is not necessary to go to a special or certain doctor to get this aid. It is most important that wives of servicemen remember that no payment for any such service will be made prior to the filing of an application. In other words, no application—no aid.

CHARGES PAID THROUGH STATE DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH

The charges for this medical, hospital, and surgical attention are paid through the division of Maternal and Child Hygiene, Department of Public Health, Springfield, Ill. The charges are paid directly to the hospital and the doctor and the nurse. No money is given to the wife. No serviceman's wife need worry about proper medical, infant, or hospital care in the event of a birth if she acquaints herself with this free service and makes proper application before the event rather than after. Pregnant wives can get prenatal care as well.

WHAT SERVICE WIVES CAN EXPECT

Complete medical service for maternity patients during the prenatal period, childbirth, and 6 weeks thereafter—including care of complications, operations, post-partum examination—and to the newborn infant.

Health supervision for infants, usually provided in childbirth conferences.

Nursing care, in the home, through the local health department including bedside nursing care as necessary—for the mother, before, during, and after childbirth, and for the baby during the first year of life.

Hospital care, in wards or at ward rates, for maternity patients and infants. Funds cannot be used in part payment for more expensive hospital accommodations. A minimum stay in the hospital of 10 days after childbirth is arranged if possible. Hospital care may be authorized in any hospital, including Army and Navy hospitals, where the maternity and pediatric services have been approved by the State health agency.

CONGRESS SET UP THIS SERVICE

The money for this service is available by acts of Congress passed last year, 1943. Your present Congress has appropriated a total of $24,200,000 for this service. Should any question arise regarding any phase of this aid, or should any wives of servicemen be unable to secure this aid write your Congressman about it. Address your letter: Congressman CHARLES W. VURSELL, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

The Democratic Party in Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK B. KEEFE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MCMURRAY], who is the New Deal candidate for the United States Senate in Wisconsin, has placed in the RECORD a series of editorials referring to the Republican and Progressive Party Conventions. It is significant that the gentleman has failed to so dignify the "Democratic convention" held in Wisconsin. Perhaps there is a good reason. In order that the full picture may be presented, we desire to include in the RECORD for the information of the public an article recently appearing in the Capital Times, a pro-Roosevelt newspaper published in the city of Madison, Wis. The author of the article is a capable and discerning reporter for the Capital Times. We believe his observations are worthy of inclusion in the RECORD.

ALDRIC REVELL

The Democratic Party of Wisconsin, woefully inept at best, is now being led by the hand along the political road by our hirsute friends, the Communists. Operating under the banner of labor, these Communists have stepped into the party and are now calling the shots.

The Communists, whose shifts of policy are notorious, are now on the Roosevelt bandwagon and with their customary energy have stepped into the Democratic Party to make certain the boys don't falter.

There was a time when the Communists operated within the Socialist Party. But this party was too cohesive and slow for them, so along about 1936, when the Farmer-Labor Progressive Federation was founded they jumped into this organization and started breasting the stream vigorously.

For a long time, although running their own candidates, Communists remained in the Progressive ranks since at that time Progressives happened to be going part way in the direction of the party line.

When Hitler signed a peace pact with Russia the Progressives could do no wrong, since they opposed entering the war and wanted to keep this country free from alliances. The Yanks were not coming then, and the Communists yelled about imperialism.

When Hitler invaded Russia, however, Progressives did not change their position but the Communists did over night.

Then the Progressives became defeatists and the Communists would have nothing to do with them. The Yanks were not coming fast enough then. The Communists swallowed all the nasty things they said about Roosevelt and started to infiltrate into the Democratic Party.

From their strongly entrenched position in the C. I. O. in Milwaukee, which they still dominate, the Communists began to operate under the guise of labor. Their representatives appeared at Democratic gatherings and they yelled the loudest for an amalgamation of all liberals to drive the reactionaries out of power.

This, of course, was Communist double talk for doing everything which would help Russia. The boys, as usual, had their eyes on the ball, but it was out of sight of everyone else.

At every Democratic gathering they introduced resolutions condemning the isolationists and defeatists (the boys always give themselves away by the stock phrases they use) and since the Democrats were opposed to isolationism, these resolutions were adopted.

The stage has now been reached where the Communists get practically everything they want from the Democrats. Thomas King, the susceptible and gullible chairman of the party, would deny that the Communists have been pushing him around, but the facts are plain for all to see.

What gives Communists so much power is the fact that the rank and file of labor, both A. F. of L. and C. I. O., are for Roosevelt and consequently any resolution that would advance and support Roosevelt's beliefs are acceptable to them.

Of course, it makes no difference now, but the Communists are for the same things labor is for. The only danger is that these boys are solidifying themselves in positions of trust and if the party line switches they will break up the labor movement if they can.

The C. I. O. in Wisconsin, the vast majority of whose members are unsympathetic with the Communist ideology, has been dominated by a group of Communists in Milwaukee, who pass resolutions purporting to represent the thousands of C. I. O. members, but which are in reality opposed by the majority.

Having been and now being president of the C. I. O. council in Madison, we know whereof we speak. We have fought this Communist influence in Milwaukee, sometimes with success, but the boys are still in the ascendancy.

It is this clique from Milwaukee which attends the Democratic convention and purports to speak for the C. I. O. Being anxious to get the support of labor, and knowing nothing of the Communist domination of the C. I. O., Democratic leaders willingly seek and follow the advice of this camarilla.

We sometimes laugh when we think of former State Senators Harry W. Bolens, Port Washington, and William D. Carroll, Prairie du Chien, both famous for their "red baiting" in the legislature in 1933 and 1935, being supported by the Communists.

Both men are Roosevelt-pledged delegates to the national convention and both, presumably received Communist support when they ran as delegates in the spring elections.

The Democrats, naturally, can do nothing about their fellow travelers. In a democracy the Communists have a perfect right to support whom they choose and to join any party they desire.

The party line is now dedicated to defeating Germany, which has been a terrific threat to Russia, even if this means supporting free enterprise and heaping encomiums upon Wall Street.

After the boys have gotten rid of the Fascists the party line will veer in another direction. What direction that will be no one can tell. If the direction is opposed to where labor wants to go it will be too bad for labor.

We have simply listed the above facts to show that if you live long enough you will some day have the Communists in your hair. There is no moral to this column except possibly that a rolling Communist gathers mossbacks or anything rolling in its direction.

Wethersfield, Conn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, every Member of Congress is proud of the accomplishments of the district he has the honor of representing. We have a special pride in the town we call home.

My home town is Wethersfield, Conn. Wethersfield was settled in 1634, more than 300 years ago. It is a beautiful New England town, the home of more than 10,000 people.

On the evening of June 19 the citizens of Wethersfield will assemble in the high-school auditorium for a huge reception and testimonial to Wethersfield's first citizen, Mr. Alfred W. Hanmer.

Mr. Hanmer has served the town of Wethersfield as first selectman for 46 consecutive years. On June 30, he voluntarily retires from office. I believe that his 46 years of continuous service is a national record. Forty-six years of loyal service to the Republican Party and the town of Wethersfield.

When Mr. Hanmer was first elected to the office of first selectman, Wethersfield was a town of less than 2,000 people. It had a grand list of $1,500,000. Today Wethersfield's population is over 10,000 and the present grand list is approximately $19,000,000.

Wethersfield's appearance has changed during the past 46 years. It has many more good streets. Busses have taken the place of the old horse car. Airplanes constantly fly overhead. Radio programs can be heard by those who pass down its quiet streets. Fundamentally, however, the old town hasn't changed. Its citizens turn out each year for town meetings. Its town officials make their annual reports and are reelected on the record they have made.

It is in the old New England town meeting that we see democracy working at its best. Democracy needs a strong guiding hand. Wethersfield, Conn., has been fortunate in having such a guiding hand in the person of Mr. Hanmer.

What an example of unselfish service Mr. Hanmer has given to the youth of his community. We need more men like him today as we never needed them before. Men who can and will sit around a table and solve the problems of our towns, our cities, our States, and, yes, our National Government.

Due to the program here in the House it will be impossible for me to join with my fellow-townsmen next Monday evening. I will, however, be with them in spirit, and I am sending to Mr. Hanmer my best wishes with the hope that he will enjoy many, many years of good health and happiness in the town to which he has given so much.

C. I. O. Political Action Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert in the RECORD two editorials which are self-explanatory. One is written by Mr. Kyle Palmer, political editor of the Los Angeles Times, and the other editorial is by Judge Harlan Palmer, editor and publisher of the Hollywood Citizen-News. Both of these editorials are on the subject of the C. I. O. political-action group.

[From the Los Angeles Times of June 3, 1944]

THE SHRINKING C. I. O. VIOLET

(By Kyle Palmer)

Lincoln said it.

And the C. I. O. Political Action Committee in California came pretty close in the May 16 primaries to accomplishing the first phase of the celebrated triological homily:

You can fool some of the people all the time.

Now, with the first phase checked off, this same political action committee is taking on the job of accomplishing the second phase:

You can fool all the people some of the time.

The second phase will be a little more difficult, but the C. I. O. is preparing to see what can be done about it under the circumstances.

If by chance you were among those who heard the exuberant remarks of the local C. I. O. spokesman, Philip Connelly, on election night when he used the radio to broadcast the jubilant tidings of "a great C. I. O. victory," you are in for a shock.

If you were among those who received samples of the impressive C. I. O. election literature, or heard the C. I. O.-approved political radio programs, or ran across one or more of the thousands of C. I. O. workers on election day, or encountered any other aspect of the C. I. O. attempt to rule the selection of congressional and legislative candidates in the May primaries, prepare for disillusionment.

The C. I. O. did very little in the primary election. The C. I. O. just went along for the ride. The victory, great as it was, should be credited elsewhere.

Mr. Connelly was two other fellows.

COMMON PEOPLE

According to State C. I. O. legislative director Claudia Williams:

"The job was done by a coalition of the common people."

She is pained no end, and a trifle suspicious, too, that the C. I. O. should be receiving so many bouquets for what the rotund Connelly termed "a great C. I. O. victory."

Mr. Williams is quoted in the C. I. O. newspaper, Labor Herald, as warning the labor politicians to beware of overconfidence and to renew their efforts to pile up the uncontributed balance of a $100,000 "legislative action fund." She reports that all but about $2,000 of $47,000 raised in advance of the primaries has been disbursed.

Unlike Celebrater Connelly, Mrs. Williams has no hymns of victory in her system. In the role of a political shrinking violet she insists that the primary gains cannot be considered solely the C. I. O.'s achievement.

Further, Mrs. Williams warns:

"Reactionary opponents of this growing people's coalition are now attempting to isolate the C. I. O. and the progressive candidates (she terms them the 'win the war candidates') nominated in the primaries by tagging them with a C. I. O. label."

In fact, reports the C. I. O. State legislative director:

NOW FOR NOVEMBER

"With the exception of the removal from office of JOHN COSTELLO in the Fifteenth District and election of certain incumbents, no final results were achieved."

The plain fact is that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee did exert itself to the limit in the primary election in California, and the more important fact remains that the C. I. O. will go forward in full cry to consolidate in the November elections such advances as it may have gained in earlier and inconclusive contests.

True it is, as Mrs. Williams says, that other elements joined with the C. I. O. in attempting to defeat certain incumbents and elect the C. I. O.'s "win the war" preferences.

Potent, indeed, was Dave Beck's teamsters' union.

Also industrious and enterprising was the United American Federation of Labor Political Action Committee, that committee being the agency credited by the editor of the Los Angeles Citizen—official A. F. of L. newspaper—with responsibility for an order suppressing the editor's right to tell his readers about candidates not supported by the U. A. F. L.

Also on the job were the Communists. Very much on the job were the Communists.

Give credit where credit is due. No summary of election kudos given the C. I. O. and affiliated groups would be complete without a handsome tribute to the part played by the Communists.

COMPLICATIONS

Just how this Communist participation in the coalition will work out in November is not clear in view of action by the Washington (D. C.) A. F. of L. in withdrawing from A. F. of L.-C. I. O. joint weekly radio programs because the C. I. O. radio programs have occasionally had "more than a trace of the Communist Party line."

There was "more than a trace" of the Communist Party line in the California primary elections.

But under no circumstances could the C. I. O.-A. F. L.-teamsters-Communist coalition movement be described as a "people's movement."

It was inspired, organized, financed, and directed by a band of union labor politicians who have been and are determined to dominate the political and, hence, the governmental affairs of this country.

Success for the movement was due directly to lack of public alertness, information, and understanding.

Defeat for the movement will follow general public realization of what the movement represents and what it seeks.

None knows this more clearly than the C. I. O. leadership, which has been quick to take alarm at the reaction which followed primary election results here and elsewhere in the country.

If the general public can be persuaded to fall back into its former lethargy—to fall back into the lethargy which gave the C. I. O. and friends the chance to win so many complete or partial primary election victories—then it may turn out that Lincoln was wrong, after all.

Perhaps the opinion of the Great Emancipator to the contrary notwithstanding:

"You can fool all of the people all of the time."

[From the Hollywood Citizen-News of June 1, 1944]

ISSUE

Senator BUTLER, Nebraska Republican, demands a Senatorial investigation of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee as a result of charges hurled by Harrison E. Spangler, Republican national chairman.

In the language of Spangler, the union organization is guilty of "flagrant and bold violation" of the Corrupt Practices and Hatch Acts.

The Corrupt Practices Act outlaws contributions by labor organizations toward the election of Federal officials. The Hatch Act bans contributions in excess of $5,000 by any committee, association, corporation or other agency.

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee boasts that it will this year spend $600,000 to elect President Roosevelt to a fourth term and to defeat all candidates for Congress who did not vote in accordance with the wishes of the committee. Slim Connelly, California C. I. O leader, boasts that $60,000 has been spent locally in pursuance of the plan.

Whether or not the committee has or may violate any law isn't nearly so important as it is for the public to clearly understand that the main issue in the national elections this year is whether or not public servants must do the bidding of the men at the head of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee, according to its declarations, is out to teach all Members of Congress that in the future they must vote as the committee wants them to vote. Thus it would seem that there is going to be just one issue in the national elections this year, to wit: Is the control of our President and our law-making bodies by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee approved? or: Shall the powers of making all decisions in national affairs be transferred to the C. I. O. Political Action Committee?

If such issues are made clear and the people vote in favor of a national government conducted in accordance with the demands of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, then considerable expense might be saved by doing away with Congress entirely and installing the three or four men who decide what it is that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee wants.

A congressional investigation might serve to make clear to the voters just what is involved in the committee's campaign program and expenditures of the slush funds.

That the issue be clear is a right of the voters. In the local campaigns of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee on behalf of Ned Healy in the Thirteenth Congressional District, Helen Gahagan Douglas in the Fourteenth District, Hal Styles in the Fifteenth District, Ellis Patterson in the Sixteenth District and Archibald Young in the Twentieth District, the issue hasn't been made clear.

Some voters thought they were voting in an effort to please a motion-picture actress with an attractive pair of legs, others that they were voting racial or religious prejudices, and others that they were voting for a pleasing radio voice. A congressional investigation would serve to make it plain that these were not the real issues at all and that the real issue is whether or not a committee of a few men is going to make all congressional and Presidential deliberations coincide with decisions of the committee—a committee that thus far has not gone beyond reflecting the wishes of some astute Communists.

Effect of Dirksen Amendment on Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT W. KEAN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of today:

EFFECT OF DIRKSEN AMENDMENT ON PRICE CONTROL

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, June 15.—Those who have been following the proceedings in Congress on the bill to extend price control might fairly assume that opposition by the O. P. A. and others to the court review amendment of Representative DIRKSEN, of Illinois, is bureaucracy run riot. They might readily conclude that if this amendment survives the House-Senate conference and goes to the President, a veto based upon it would be another proof that the administration wants government by Executive act and order without giving an injured citizen his once inalienable right to legal redress.

CAN PLEAD NOT GUILTY

The administration's record gives ground for this general suspicion. But in the particular instance of its opposition to the Dirksen amendment it can enter and sustain a plea of not guilty.

The provision, which the House made a part of the price control bill yesterday looks innocent of its face. It gives to a seller of commodities on which the O. P. A. has fixed a price schedule, or has otherwise regulated, the right to go into a Federal district court on his own volition and ask for an injunction.

This appears merely to be asserting in law an ancient privilege of freemen, and to say that it might be justification for a Presidential veto seems to be the attitude of an autocrat.

But what the amendment really does is to open the way to the destruction of price control by substituting many courts for the single tribunal—the Emergency Court of Appeals—established in the body of the bill. As Representative VOORHIS of California said in the course of the debate, it creates the probability "of one set of standards and regulations in Chicago and an entirely different one in Milwaukee." He added:

"For if the O. P. A. regulations were upheld in the Milwaukee district court and overthrown in Chicago, prices in the Chicago area might immediately increase, and all the goods affected by the ruling would flow into the Chicago market and out of the Milwaukee market, as I think anyone ought to be able to see."

FULL REDRESS PROVIDED

If the price-control bill did not provide for factual court review of O. P. A. rulings, or if any attempt was being made to close the courts to general pleas of unconstitutionality, there would be both need and justification for amendments to maintain these basic rights. But court review of rulings is in the law without the amendment. And unconstitutionality is a plea open to any citizen against any statute which no law of Congress can abridge.

The Emergency Court of Appeals established in the bill is a constitutional tribunal, though temporary in its nature, composed of judges from the Federal circuit courts throughout the country. It sits whenever protestants against O. P. A. rulings ask it to sit and has never turned down a request. Also the O. P. A. has never asked the Supreme Court to overrule any of its findings which have invalidated acts of the agency; and any litigant, defeated therein, can seek from the Supreme Court a writ of certiorari.

The only requirement is that a seller who objects to an O. P. A. ruling must first file a protest in writing to the agency and, if that is denied, go to the Emergency Court within 30 days. The result is that much of the litigation can be presented in written form and is handled by a single court system.

Mr. DIRKSEN would throw open to this litigation every district court, and the questions are as intricate as those raised in suits over public utility rates. The burden of trying these cases all over the country would swamp O. P. A., since in each instance mountains of statistics are required to prove or disprove such questions as the impairment of peacetime earnings. Conflicting district court decisions would, as Mr. VOORHIS said, be the inevitable consequence; these would first have to be reduced by the Federal Courts of Appeal and then sublimated by the Supreme Court. The process in each instance would take a year and possibly two. And during the interval of uncertainty price control in the affected industries would be destroyed.

INJUSTICES TO NONLITIGANTS

There are other administrative reasons why the Dirksen amendment is a threat to the operation of price control. Above the rank of clerk there are 950 price officials of the O. P. A. in Washington, a comparatively small number since they deal with thousands of industries and many more thousands of commodities. If they are taken from their duties here and sent to trials throughout the Nation, many grave questions affecting industries not involved in the trials must go unsettled for long periods of time. This would work an injustice against these industries as well as to price control as a system.

If, as Mr. VOORHIS said, a Milwaukee court should uphold a regulation and a Chicago court should upset it (on the same goods), the favored area would get all the product during the year or two before the Supreme Court could resolve the issue. And all national sellers would not be in the same boat, as is the present objective.

Price control is an essential wartime measure and cannot be subjected to peacetime procedures and practices without impairing or destroying it—in this instance without the sound excuse of providing court redress where none exists.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein copy of a resolution adopted by the Lowville Kiwanis Club, Lowville, N. Y., urging the enactment of legislation authorizing the St. Lawrence seaway and power development:

Whereas Hon. GEORGE D. AIKEN, has introduced in the United States Senate, a bill to approve and carry into effect an agreement between the United States and Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway, and the development of 2,200,000 horsepower from the navigation dam near Massena; and

Whereas the two countries have, for 30 years, mutually planned the development of this great international highway from the Atlantic Ocean through the Great Lakes to Duluth, Minn.; and

Whereas said seaway is practically completed with the exception of a bottleneck near Massena, N. Y.; and

Whereas said development is of great importance to the people of northern New York, as well as to the whole United States; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of New York, in March 1944, unanimously passed concurrent resolutions demanding the immediate development of the hydroelectric power; and

Whereas as a post-war measure or development more than 10,000 men would necessarily be employed in the construction of the works near Massena, N. Y.: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this club favors such development and advocates the passage of the Aiken bill and the comparable measure introduced in the House of Representatives by the Honorable WILLIAM A. PITTENGER, of Minnesota; further Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Hon. George D. Aiken, Hon. William A. Pittenger, and to Gov. Thomas E. Dewey.

Reclassification of Federal Veterinarians and Their Lay Assistants

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, the Personnel Division of the Department of Agriculture, after an elaborate investigation, has worked out a plan for reclassification of veterinarians and their assistants, and this plan has been approved by the Civil Service Commission as in conformity with the Federal Classification Act. The Director of the Budget, the Department of Agriculture, and the War Food Administration have requested sufficient appropriations to put this plan into effect, and these appropriations have been voted by the Senate.

I support the motion to concur in these amendments because—

First. The hearing records show unmistakably that the employees in this service are underpaid.

Second. As now classified, the prospects of promotion within grades are so uninviting that veterinary schools are advising their graduates "all hope abandon ye who enter here."

Third. The maintenance of this field service at a high rate of efficiency is essential to safeguard the meat supplied to the armed forces and to our civilian population and allies.

Fourth. No service can long maintain its efficiency without replacements, and reclassification is essential to make this service attractive to graduates of veterinary schools.

Fifth. The average salary of the 3,449 employees affected now is $2,573, including overtime under the War Overtime Pay Act. As reclassified they will receive on the average of $2,862.

Sixth. The reclassification is in accord with the Reclassification Act. Keeping faith with the employees now in the service requires concurrence with the Senate amendments in order that each may be placed in the grade to which he belongs under the standards of the present Classification Act.

Agricultural Adjustment Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY P. JEFFREY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. JEFFREY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring to the attention of the House a situation in the Third Ohio District that I regard as both deplorable and significant. A few days ago I received a statement signed by 62 farmers of Clay and Perry Townships, Montgomery County, Ohio, describing certain practices of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. I propose to let these embattled farmers tell their own story. Here it is:

We, the undersigned farmers in Clay and Perry Townships, Montgomery County, Ohio, hereby state that we have had the following experience with the A. A. A. in this district:

1. We have been advised by agents of the local office that unless we signed up for the A. A. A. we would not receive a farmer's allotment for gasoline for farm purposes.

2. We have been advised that unless we signed up for the A. A. A. we would not be granted deferments for military service for our sons and employees as farmers.

3. We have been advised that unless we signed up for the A. A. A. we would not be granted priorities for farm machinery needed by us to get the maximum production from our farms.

We believe, therefore, that the A. A. A. has been a serious detriment to maximum production on the farms in this locality and that it has created a feeling of apprehension and disloyalty and are anxious to do all we can for our country, but we are unable to do so because of this impediment.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the situation I wish to bring to the attention of Congress. I also wish to add some facts from my own knowledge and certain affidavits which give specific instances of the practices complained of. In the first place there has been a bitter controversy over the A. A. A. in this section of Ohio for several years. There has been litigation about it, and not long ago in a neighboring county—not in my district—there were threats of violence. As a result there has been great bitterness and hostility between two sharply defined groups.

In spite of all these prejudice-breeding circumstances the authorities in charge of the war effort chose to let one group sit in judgment over the other. Instead of selecting for such responsibilities men who were above suspicion and without connection with either group, those in power closely and deliberately identified the A. A. A. with the rationing program and with the draft. Such a policy is most unfortunate; under it even the most honorable man finds himself inviting suspicion. Presumably the theory existed that the only really expert farmers capable of passing judgment on agricultural matters belonged to the A. A. A. That theory has been hotly contested. But that is not all.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, three affidavits reiterating in the form of specific instances some of the complaints mentioned in the petition I read to the House a moment ago. The first of these reads as follows:

STATE OF OHIO,
County of Montgomery, ss:

Verne Peters, being first duly sworn, deposes and states that sometime during the month of April 1944 one John Share of the Triple A Office, Dayton, Ohio, told him that he was not entitled to milk-subsidy payments because he was still charged with an unpaid wheat penalty.

VERNE PETERS.

Sworn to and subscribed before me on the 10th day of June 1944.

CECIL E. EDWARDS,
Notary Public, Montgomery County, Ohio.

The second affidavit shows the lamentable link between the A. A. A. and the gasoline rationing system. It is as follows:

STATE OF OHIO,
County of Montgomery, ss:

Charles M. King, being first duly sworn, deposes and states that during the month of March 1944 one George Eck, of the triple A, told him that unless he signed up for the triple A he would not be given gas to operate his farm.

CHARLES M. KING.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 10th day of June 1944.

CECIL E. EDWARDS,
Notary Public, Montgomery County, Ohio.

The third affidavit, Mr. Speaker, is the most amazing of all:

STATE OF OHIO,
County of Montgomery, ss:

Clarence Miller, being first duly sworn upon his oath, deposes and states that during the month of December 1943 George Eck, of the Triple A office, Dayton, Ohio, made the statement to him that if he would sign up for the Triple A program it would have a lot of influence in the keeping of his boy out of the Army; Mr. Eck said the committee who made recommendations to the draft board would take his word for the fact that he was cooperating.

CLARENCE MILLER.

Sworn to and subscribed before me by the said Clarence Miller this 10th day of June 1944 at Brookville, Ohio.

CECIL E. EDWARDS,
Notary Public, Montgomery County, Ohio.

So it appears, at least in some cases, champions of the A. A. A. have put regimentation not only ahead of the war effort but ahead of common justice. Official power in their hands has been employed to advance the interests of a bureaucracy rather than those of a Nation at war. That is a most shameful situation. To have gasoline rationing, or to have machinery rationing, made contingent upon adherence to the Government's farm program amounts to high contempt for democratic ideals Most shameful of all is the statement that compulsory military service may be contingent on the favoritism—or the lack of it—displayed by a part of the Government millions of men are today being called upon to defend.

In effect this statement, supported by the affidavits, makes a most serious charge. It charges that unfairness and favoritism are being permitted to interfere with rationing and with the Selective Service System. Should men connected with the rationing board or draft boards permit money to influence their decisions they would be sent to jail. But is it any less dangerous to have this mania for regimentation accomplishing the same end? Yet that is exactly what all this amounts to.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the fact that this statement and the attending affidavits do not concern an individual or isolated case. Apparently there were sixty-two cases—more or less—that followed an all-too-familiar pattern. So many of them within a comparatively limited area may indicate that this practice prevails elsewhere to an alarming degree. The farmers who signed these affidavits and the statement knew they were taking a risk. Signatures on such documents might mean for them additional hours of grinding labor because of machinery being withheld; they might mean military service for a son or relative. Yet in the interests of justice they assumed these risks. Their cause is entitled to careful consideration by the Congress of the United States.

Walter Winchell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY M. JACKSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, there appears in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page A2783 a speech by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] entitled "Patriotism at a Price," denouncing Walter Winchell. The gentleman from Michigan stated in part as follows:

Winchell, lieutenant commander in the Navy, although not speaking as such, recently threatened that, unless Congress took certain action reducing tax on night clubs, the actors union would forbid members from participating in bond rallies.

This statement, I understand, is based on what purports to be an editorial from the Omaha World Herald, quoting from Mr. Winchell's column.

I have read the quoted portion from Mr. Winchell's column and find nothing in it which indicates that Mr. Winchell advocated any such course of procedure. It seems that Mr. Winchell merely reported that the Night Club Actors' Union planned to take steps against participating in War bond drives unless the 30 percent tax on night clubs was cut. He did not endorse any such contemplated step by the Night Club Actors' Union. He condoned it in no way whatsoever. I am at a complete loss to know how the gentleman from Michigan could possibly infer that Mr. Winchell was advocating any such thing. I believe, in all fairness to Mr. Winchell, this matter should be called to the attention of the Members of the House.

It is my understanding Mr. Winchell himself was responsible for raising so much money for Navy Relief in such a short time that the quota for funds for aid of the families of the boys in our Navy was oversubscribed in a very short time. It is common knowledge that he, like millions of other patriotic Americans, has given unstintingly of his time, his money, and his great energy in the sale of War bonds and other patriotic activities.

Your Congressman Can Help

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, during these trying times with rules and regulations going out by the hundreds, it is difficult for most people to learn just what they are entitled to and what they are not entitled to. In this respect I would like to call the attention of my people to the fact that a Congressman's office is the best and surest way of getting help in straightening out Federal matters. It is a Congressman's duty to help in matters of difficulty confronting his people. A Congressman is the people's representative in Washington. He is their agent. If the people have any trouble in collecting their allotment or any benefit due them their Congressman is the best bet to take care of it for them.

In my short experience here I have already helped in the adjustment of many dependency allotment cases. In my short time here I have already helped to straighten out scores of insurance claims.

FINANCIAL CLAIMS ARE BEST HANDLED THROUGH A CONGRESSMAN'S OFFICE

Should anyone have a claim against the Government for a dependency allotment or any war benefit, it is best to first ask for help from the local Red Cross, local veterans' service office, or American Legion. These local agencies will do everything they can. Sometimes, however, something goes wrong, and the claims are not settled, or it takes too much time to get the case settled. If that happens, your best bet is to write your Congressman and explain everything to him in detail.

Your Congressman has a direct connection with all offices in Washington. He can serve his people very effectively in getting matters straightened out. It is his duty to do this, and it costs nothing. In the Twenty-third District those desiring such aid should write Congressman CHARLES W. VURSELL, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Philippine Plank in Party Platforms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, as the national conventions of the two major political parties approach, let us remember the Philippines. Under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD a timely statement on the subject:

PHILIPPINE PLANK IN PARTY PLATFORMS

(By Vicente Villamin, Filipino lawyer and economist, Los Angeles, Calif.)

A Philippine plank in the platforms of both the Democratic and Republican parties would be logical, timely, and useful. Since 1900 the two parties have taken different views on the Philippine question, but in 1942 the physical subject matter of the question was lost to the Japanese enemy, a fact that brought them together on a common ground.

The plank would be the unanimous expression of the American people—appreciating the loyalty and cooperation of the Filipinos in the war, vindicating the American Philippine experiment before the world and confirming the assurances already given by the President of the United States that the Philippines would be retaken from the enemy, turned over to the Filipinos in freedom, aided in its post-war reconstruction and protected in its sovereign independence.

Thus conceived, the plank would be a powerful weapon in Allied hands in the psychological warfare in all battlefronts. If there is still any doubt as to the supreme importance of this type of warfare, let it be remembered that if the Japanese-conquered peoples should fail to cooperate with the Allies in their reconquering operations, additional hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of fighters would be needed to overcome the enemy; and if those people should, by Japanese coercion or persuasion, fight side by side with the Japanese, then the job of the Allies would be enormously greater.

The question of Philippine independence is settled. Under the Independence Act, the Philippines will be an independent nation on July 4, 1946, or sooner under a joint resolution pending in Congress, if the war should be won before that date.

The war thus far has wrought destruction in the Philippines and more destruction is forthcoming when General MacArthur functions on the spot to expel the Japanese invaders. The sacrifice is worth the end, which, on the one hand, is to vindicate America's authority and honor and, on the other, to liberate the Filipinos from a medieval-minded nation so they can develop themselves freely according to their native genius and best interests.

The present government in the islands by Filipinos is inevitable and does not necessarily constitute a repudiation of the United States. The alternative would have been a government by Japanese nationals or by Filipinos of lesser caliber, and that would be a calamity to the people. That government is properly called a puppet organization, but its officials—the overwhelming majority of them—could not be, spiritually and intellectually, willing Japanese puppets. They are not free men in a situation where the price of noncooperation would be needless death or unpatriotic indifference to the country's fate.

But, for the sake of tactical clarity, the plank should state the political and legal truism that the only legitimate government in the islands is the one organized under the American sovereignty whose juridical continuity has not been disturbed by the invasion, thereby giving the Japanese enemy no consolation and his puppets no justification.

The Filipinos in the United States, numbering 120,000, support that government, which is now in residence in Washington for 2 years. They are desirous, almost impatiently so, to receive orders from it to further the war effort or to prepare for the rehabilitation of their country after the war.

The Philippine plank might recognize the fact that with the help of the United States the Philippine Government in exile will immediately start the reconstruction program by providing for the training of Filipinos here for technical and specialized work in the islands. The importance of this is emphasized by the fact that the Japanese are losing no time to train Filipinos in different trades and occupations with indoctrination in Japanese ideas, methods, and aims.

While this plan would benefit the Filipino people and strengthen American influence among them, it would also serve to make available for American commerce and industry American-trained Filipinos who can represent them in the islands and promote Philippine-American trade. Such a plan has everything to commend itself to the Philippine government, which knows that technically trained Filipinos are few and that many such Filipinos would be needed in the reconstruction work.

When peace comes, the reconciliation of all Filipinos and the formation of a new government are rendered easier by the provision in the puppet constitution that upon the cessation of hostilities a new election of delegates shall be held to formulate a new constitution and organize the new Philippine Republic.

A generous Philippine plank in the platforms of the Democratic and Republican parties would be a dynamic message of cheer and encouragement to the Filipino people, a formidable implement in the psychological warfare, and a reaffirmation of America's Philippine policy of magnanimity which Bataan has justified and consecrated.

A Brave and Blessed Symbol of Unity Flying Triumphantly on Land, on Sea, and in the Air

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial entitled "A Brave and Blessed Symbol of Unity Flying Triumphantly on Land, on Sea, and in the Air," which appeared in the Paterson Evening News, Paterson, N. J., on June 14, 1944:

A BRAVE AND BLESSED SYMBOL OF UNITY FLYING TRIUMPHANTLY ON LAND, ON SEA AND IN THE AIR

Flag Day in 1944 has a greater significance than ever before. Not only do Americans this year pay honor to the Stars and Stripes, the symbol of that national unity which has carried the United States to greatness among the nations and is now the chief resource in this mighty peoples' struggle, but the American flag is associated today with the emblems of 31 other nations fighting in the common cause of national liberation. The massed flags of the United Nations symbolize the world unity of the peoples which is being forged in the smithy of war and must become the basis of a just and lasting peace, guaranteed by a renewed march toward the freedom, progress, and opportunity which has been the beacon light of America and her flag.

In honoring the flag today, Americans will also hold to thoughts of the men in the armed forces who are fighting and dying on every battlefield and ocean of this global war in the gallant tradition of those who fought under its folds in the past. The flag belongs to us all, but theirs is a special dedication to the things for which it stands. All Americans must renew the resolve to be worthy of their sacrifice and of the red, white and blue symbol of their valor and our hopes for a future of national and world unity.

There is one aspect of the American flag which those who live and serve under it—as well as their friends and enemies in other lands—are sometimes inclined to forget. Americans are a young people, representing the union of many diverse elements, dwelling in a land which has not known the centuries of cutting and planting, of mining and working, which have marked the soil of other nations, and shaped the characters of their inhabitants. Yet the American flag, and the Government it represents, is older than most of the flags and governments of the world today. When the Ranger, commanded by John Paul Jones, carried the Stars and Stripes to European waters in 1778, it was a royal fleet, flying the lilies of France, which saluted the new emblem. Italy's tricolor is younger than that of France; Russia's flag is the flag of the Bolshevik Revolution; Germany's is as young as nazi-ism, although the swastika is as old as sin. When the eager traders of the young American Republic took their flag to China an emperor ruled there under dragon banners and feudal Japan was remote, untouchable. Some flags are older than Old Glory—Britain's Union Jack, for example (although the St. Patrick's cross was only added in 1801); the flag of the Netherlands and Denmark's ancient Dannebrog.

No, the American flag and the Nation over which it flies are not new things, as human institutions go. They have been tested in the fires of civil strife and foreign war; in the slower processes of peaceful development. Through the years they have meant freedom and opportunity—an inspiration for the world. What they shall mean in the future rests with those who celebrate this Flag Day of 1944, those who shape the Nation's course when the world is malleable in the heat of war. It is no easy task to be worthy of a great tradition, a great Nation, and a great flag.

Flag Day, 1944, is a solemn occasion. Our country's banner leads the way in a struggle against an enemy that threatens every principle for which Old Glory stands. Soon, perhaps sooner than we dare to hope, it will lead us to victory.

"I pledge allegiance to the flag." How often have we repeated those words without realizing all that they mean? "One nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all." What better expression have we of the spirit of America? What better answer to the proponents of Hitler's fantastic racial myths, to the hatemongers and bigots who would defame the flag that protects them? What greater hope can we hold out to the beaten and oppressed in other lands?

The conquered people of Europe, the courageous workers of the underground, the weary prisoners of war who languish in Axis prison camps, all look to our flag for deliverance

The leaders of the Axis Nations are well aware of this fact. Cornered, with their backs against the wall, they are now exerting their last desperate efforts to stave off defeat, or at least to make our victory meaningless. If their propaganda should succeed, if they could inspire a movement for a negotiated peace or beguile us into offering soft peace terms; if they could instill into our minds the hated Nazi theories with which they have persistently attempted to divide our people into hostile racial and religious groups—if they could achieve these ends, then they would have won the war in spite of all our military victories.

But they will not succeed. We will not sacrifice the lives of tens of thousands of our bravest men in vain. Today, as our Nation's colors fly from church and school and private dwelling, Americans pledge themselves, with renewed devotion, to "one nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Jackson Hole National Monument

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me I include in my remarks a very short editorial from the New York Times of June 13, 1944, concerning the effort to destroy the Jackson Hole National Monument. It follows:

Last year President Roosevelt set aside the old trappers' rendezvous of Jackson Hole, Teton County, Wyo., as a national monument—in effect, a park. He did this under authority of an act passed in 1906 under a Republican President, Theodore Roosevelt, and the public lands thus set aside were free for such disposal because another Republican President, Calvin Coolidge, had withdrawn them from entry. To the public lands designated as a monument there may be added 33,000 acres purchased and freely presented to the Nation by John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

There is now pending in Congress a bill introduced by Representative BARRETT, of Wyoming, to abolish this monument. The bill is not unanimously supported, even in Jackson Hole itself. Many citizens there have expressed themselves against the indiscriminate commercialization which would probably follow the restoration of the area to private entry. The practical interests of Wyoming people lie in preserving grazing rights and in some compensation for lost taxes—in this case, about $10,000 a year. Friends of the proposed monument are quite willing to be fair in these respects. For the Nation at large it is no less fair to preserve forever unharmed, the beauty of a historic spot. The Barrett bill should be killed.

Senator Charles L. McNary

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. CHARLES LINZA MCNARY, late a Senator from the State of Oregon

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, we pause today to pay our last tribute to the passing of a great American. The late CHARLES L. MCNARY, Senator for the State of Oregon, for 27 years has served in the United States Senate.

For 11 years he has been minority leader in the Senate. He has not only been a stalwart Member of that great deliberative body of our Nation in upholding the fundamental principles of our American way of life but he has been an inspiration to all of us who have had the privilege of serving with him. Of a modest and retiring nature, he never thought of imposing himself upon his colleagues but was always ready to give a word of encouragement or lend a helping hand to a friend. No man in the Senate of the United States was more beloved. In our State of Oregon he not only commanded the respect and admiration of our citizens but was the first citizen of this great State which he had the honor to represent so long in our National Legislature.

It has been my great privilege to have known Senator MCNARY from the days of my youth and to have been associated with him in the last 5 years in the Congress of the United States. I always found him to be always ready to assist me in my legislative work, and I know that every new Member in the Congress from the State of Oregon always leaned heavily upon our friend who has now gone to his reward.

Every Member of the Oregon delegation joined the funeral party on its long trip across the continent to Oregon to pay our final respects to our departed friend. As the congressional party, friends, and colleagues of Senator MCNARY wended its way across the continent with heavy hearts we realized that our beloved colleague was making the last long journey into the great West over the old Oregon Trail—a roadway which his ancestors a century ago helped to chart and which with his own long faithful service helped to make possible the building of the old Oregon country into a mighty empire. As we sped across the plains over the great rivers of the Middle West and the far West and over the towering mountain ranges of our own America, we were made conscious of the great contribution Senator MCNARY and his pioneer ancestors had made to the founding and upbuilding of the rich productive States along our Pacific shores which originally constituted old Oregon.

It was his guiding hand, his wise counsel, and his long, faithful service to his State and Nation that made possible the development of the great projects of the West for the improvement of our waterways, the building of the mighty dams and hydroelectric plants, the controlling of the floodwaters of the mountains and plains, and the reclamation of the broad acres of the West, now producing foodstuffs and other supplies to feed and equip the nations of the world as well as to maintain our armed forces in the great struggle for the liberation of the world from dictatorship.

Senator MCNARY has been called to his eternal home, but his work for the upbuilding and preservation of our Nation will live throughout the years to come.

FOR HE WALKED WITH MEN AND UNDERSTOOD

Here was a man whose heart was good,
Who walked with men and understood.
His was a voice that spoke to cheer,
And fell like music on the ear.
His was a smile men loved to see,
His was a hand that asked no fee
For friendliness or kindness done.
And now that he has journeyed on,
His is a fame that never ends
And leaves behind uncounted friends.

Congress Should Stay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM MURRAY

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial entitled "Congress Should Stay" published in the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal on June 13, 1944.

I am fully in accord with the views expressed therein, as, in my opinion, Congress should not take an extended recess this summer. There is much important, urgent, and pressing legislation yet to be considered and Congress should stay on the job regardless of how hot, unpleasant, or disagreeable the weather may be in Washington during July and August.

While Congress has reached an agreement on the so-called G. I. bill of rights for the members of our armed forces, and while legislation on the termination of war contracts will be approved before the contemplated recess, there are many other matters including vital post-war legislation, which should be considered by Congress this summer. This is no time for a long summer vacation for Congress.

The editorial in the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal is as follows:

CONGRESS SHOULD STAY

Congressional leaders in both parties ought to make up their minds to forget about a suggested 5-week recess and use all their power and influence to keep the National Legislature on the job. As matters go, there is a lot of talk about rushing through only measures that might be called "must" in 2 weeks and then taking off for 5, largely for the purposes of attending national political conventions.

On its hands at the moment the Congress has a bill, greatly mixed up in controversy, to extend the Price Control Act that expires June 30. It must make some disposition of appropriation bills that total close to a hundred billion dollars before June 30. It ought to work out the so-called G. I. Bill of Rights to provide a system of benefits for servicemen and women. It needs to do something also about a measure to expedite the settlement of terminated war contracts. There are other matters on the calendar that require attention, but those here mentioned are alone enough to militate against any rush season and recess.

The desire of Members of Congress to attend the party conventions is understandable. A good many fences are in bad repair at home, which is probably a sign that they could and should have been better built in the first place. Unless all signs fail, the total time necessary for holding the conventions will not amount to much more than 1 week of the 5 Congress is talking about taking. Congress is tired, of course, as who isn't? All the same it ought to stay it out just as the rest of us on both the home and fighting fronts.

Latest News of Lindbergh

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, I am inserting an editorial entitled "Latest News of Lindbergh," as printed in the Washington Times-Herald yesterday morning, June 15, 1944. In view of the fact that the same afternoon announcement was made of the bombing of Japan from 30,000 feet, this editorial is extremely interesting:

LATEST NEWS OF LINDBERGH

The New York Times yesterday published a letter from James G. McDonald on the subject of Charles A. Lindbergh which we think is of sufficient general interest to reprint in full:

"The news that Charles A. Lindbergh, who recently reported to Admiral Chester W. Nimitz for duty with the Navy, is teaching American aviators in the Gilbert Islands phases of high-altitude flying deserves comment.

"It is wholly typical of Mr. Lindbergh that he insisted that no publicity be given to the dangerous experiments in high-altitude flying which he carried on for many months in the Ford Motor Co.'s aircraft operation prior to his present work with the Navy. Those experiments, though privately made, were an integral and most important part of our country's preparation to win and to keep our airmen's present superiority over the enemy.

"Isn't the time overdue for frank acknowledgment that Mr. Lindbergh was cruelly persecuted by large sections of Americans because prior to Pearl Harbor he disagreed with them on questions of American foreign policy? Of course, Mr. Lindbergh then underestimated the danger from Germany and Japan; but do any of us have a clear record of prescience in the pre-war years? I do not know of one public man; no, or one editor, columnist, or commentator who can seriously claim that he was invariably correct in his analysis of the course of world affairs in the thirties.

"Surely Mr. Lindbergh's former critics have an obligation, at least to their own consciences, to admit that they never had any ground to impugn the patriotism or the complete loyalty of this brave and creative American."

We had known about a year ago that Lindbergh was conducting test flights in the stratosphere, and that he wanted no publicity on his part in them. We had also heard, though we cannot vouch for this, that Lindbergh in the course of these experiments had flown higher than any other American up to that time.

What Are Our Post-War Aims?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, at no time since we first violated our neutrality to help the Allies, and not even since Pearl Harbor, has there been an attitude of sincerity, honesty, frankness, and candor with the people on the part of the administration in defining either our war aims or our post-war aims. Mr. Roosevelt has led the American people to believe that the Atlantic Charter, with its "four freedoms," was enthusiastically supported by all the Allies, and that the instrument meant exactly what it said. Then, gradually, as has been the technique of the New Deal administration, the American people were allowed to learn, not from our own public officials, but from Mr. Churchill and Mr. Stalin, that the Atlantic Charter did not mean what Mr. Roosevelt had said it meant, and that its definitions would have to be changed from time to time to suit the changing views of the two nations.

The next Rooseveltian plan seemed to be that all the United Nations would have a voice in post-war plans. Meanwhile, Mr. Stalin suddenly had Russia divided up into 16 commonwealths which would give them 16 votes in any League of Nations arrangement to maintain the peace in the world.

Mr. Stalin is always tight-lipped. Mr. Churchill at least has more recently been frank and outspoken in his views. Mr. Roosevelt has, as some of the correspondents have noted, adopted an indirect and evasive method which, and I quote, "enables him to avoid direct quotation to whatever extent he may choose and, without challenge, withhold enlightening details."

Mr. Roosevelt in his latest change of attitude now appears to be adopting a more nationalistic policy which he and other administration spokesmen have so bitterly condemned in everybody else. This is not unusual, however, because the New Dealers usually condemn in others many of the things they themselves do with much finesse.

It is amazing, and speaks well for the good sense and the patriotism of the American people, that they have cooperated to produce a modern miracle of war production in spite of these misunderstandings, these subterfuges, the lack of frankness on the part of the administration, and the vague and poorly defined statements concerning the war aims and post-war aims of the United States.

Mr. Roosevelt apparently would have the people believe that he is coming around to the position adopted by the Republican Members of the House of Representatives back in 1942. At that time they, in a declaration of policy, in paragraph No. 3 stated explicitly that:

We recognize that the United States has an obligation and responsibility to work with other nations to bring about a world understanding and cooperative spirit which will have for its supreme objective the continued maintenance of peace. In so doing, we must not endanger our own independence, weaken our American way of life, or our system of government.

Mr. Roosevelt on Tuesday, May 30, declared for essentially the same thing when he said in his press conference that his peace project would involve no impairment of independence, integrity or administrative process. This declaration, for the moment at least, would appear to leave the radical internationalists out on the end of a limb. Their position has always been: "We must surrender some of our sovereignty."

The only thing the people know about Mr. Roosevelt's war aims and post-war aims is what he is reported by Forrest Davis as having said in two articles in the Saturday Evening Post recently. According to those articles, the President has a "great design." That "great design," it would seem to appear, originated in the mind of Mr. Roosevelt and calls for a council of powers and the maintenance of an international military police force, and so on. It would amount practically to a League of Nations backed up by a military force. The plan as outlined by Davis and as commented on by another Saturday Evening Post writer, Demaree Bess, in analyzing the Davis revelations, is identical with the plan of King Henry of Navarre, who flourished from 1553–1610, and his adviser, the Duc de Sully. They even called their specific and detailed plan the great design. So we find that even the post-war aims which Mr. Roosevelt is supposed to have in mind were not made in America in 1944 or 1943 or 1942, but were manufactured by Henry of Navarre back in the sixteenth century.

It is a very remarkable thing that the American people have stood as solidly and unitedly as they have in the war effort in the face of this confusion, contradiction, change of position, and dissembling by the New Deal administration on war plans. Only a people utterly dedicated to freedom, completely devoted to their country, could have gone ahead and, as a free people, met the challenge of the dictators, as the American people have met it.

The American people have been patient and long suffering in this matter, and they are entitled to frankness and fairness on the part of their Chief Executive and the administration spokesman as to what our war aims and our post-war aims are. The blood of American boys is being spilled on scores of battlefields. American women are dying across the Seven Seas, American homes by the tens of thousands are being filled with grief and agony over the loss of loved ones in this war. These people and the men and women in the fighting lines are entitled to know whether we are fighting only to guarantee the perpetuity and prosperity of the British Empire, and to help Joseph Stalin achieve his desires in middle Europe, or whether we are fighting for the great principles and the great human ideals which have always motivated the American people in their wars and in their peace. The Nation is entitled to know, its fighting men and women are entitled to know, its taxpayers are entitled to know, posterity is entitled to know, why we entered this awful war and what we are fighting for.

It is not enough to say that we are in this war because Japan made a treacherous attack on us at Pearl Harbor; we were in this war before that and everybody knows it. We had gone into this war on the side of the Allies long before the Japanese attacked us at Pearl Harbor. We had abandoned all semblance of neutrality long before Pearl Harbor. If we are in this war solely because the President and the clique surrounding him want to play world power politics, the American people ought to know that, and when they find it out, their wrath against those willing to spill rivers of American blood and to load this Nation with an astronomical debt for generations to come for such a gross purpose, will be something terrible to behold.

In the First World War, we were told that we were fighting to make the world safe for democracy. We were cheered on in our sacrifices by the assurance that it was a war to end all wars. The American people fought for those ideals. They asked for no territorial or other gains, and they got none. After the war was ended, we learned that there was not a scintilla of truth in either of these slogans. The nations owing us war debts defaulted on their debts, and called us Uncle Shylock because we even dared to suggest that obligations between nations should be assumed and discharged on the same basis of honor and integrity as obligations between individuals are assumed and discharged.

There is nobody in the United States today who can define, or at least who has defined, our war aims and our post-war aims. As one columnist has said:

> Mr. Roosevelt appears to be fired by a spirit of frankness with the American people only on those occasions when Prime Minister Churchill has made a radio speech or an address to the House of Commons in which he has given in detail important news for the first time. But apparently Mr. Roosevelt very quickly loses the spirit which moves him to tell the people something about the war. The rest of the time his attitude is pretty much that war aims are none of the people's business and that it is "theirs not to reason why, theirs but to do and die."

Much criticism has been leveled at the American people by administration spokesmen because of the alleged complacence which, these administration spokesmen assert, the people feel toward the war. It might be illuminating to some of these administration critics of the people that much of this attitude they complain about has not been complacence; it has been just plain confusion and bewilderment on the part of the American people as to what we are fighting for, as to how the war is going, and as to whether or not it is a war for high ideals or a war for power politics. This confusion and bewilderment are the fault of the administration and nobody else. Losses have been concealed; grievous mistakes have been covered up; waste and even worse have been hidden, all under the old threadbare, shopworn plea of military secrecy. The attitude of the administration has almost continuously appeared to be that it is presumptuous of the American people to want to know anything about the war, and that they should consent to do what they are told by political bureaucrats without asking why, and without objecting to any hardship that may be entailed. Had it not been for the demand of the American people to know some of the facts, and had it been possible for these cunning and conniving bureaucrats successfully to have concealed all the facts, the American people would now know next to nothing about any phase of the war. Administration spokesmen will, of course, never blame themselves.

A day of accounting is coming. There may be some who have been criminally negligent or dishonest or who have been inexcusably secretive, who will escape the public wrath. But the leaders of this administration who have led the people into this morass of bewilderment and confusion will one day have to face an outraged people. Historians of the future will put the blame for all this confusion and bewilderment where it properly belongs—on the New Deal administration—unless, indeed, some Office of War Information historians do the writing.

It is time for the American people to rise up in their might and demand an end of these concealments, and to insist upon a frank statement of the administration's war aims and its post-war programs. It would be a good bet at 10 to 1 that the administration cannot agree among its own bureaucrats as to what the war aims are, or as to what the post-war program is, except that Americans are to give away most of what they now have to other peoples in the world.

Eternal vigilance is still the price of liberty in America, and there has been no time since the days of 1776 when the American people were confronted with a greater need for that vigilance than exists today.

Address of Hon. James J. Davis, of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT L. RODGERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 16, 1944

Mr. RODGERS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from the address of Senator JAMES J. DAVIS, delivered at Grove City, Pa., in my congressional district on the occasion of the Flag Day celebration by the Grove City Elks, and also in connection with the Fifth War loan:

> It is always a source of great pleasure for me to come back to Grove City and Mercer County where I lived in the days of my youth.
> This country which boasts almost every type of industrial activity and which is well known for its agricultural pursuits is the home of many hard-working and patriotic Americans who are now devoting their full energies to the winning of the war.
> Grove City is indeed a center of American culture. The fine schools, churches, and libraries which you have developed here have stamped your city as one of the most progressive and your people as one of the most advanced groups in the great State of Pennsylvania. The college at Grove City has contributed much to the prestige and advancement of your community.
> You citizens may well be proud of Grove City—a real American city—and you may further be proud of the fact that you well oversubscribed your quota for the Fifth War Loan Drive.
> The ceremonies which we have observed here in honor of the American flag have been most impressive. The drill by this fine-looking group of marines, the flag ritual of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and the music rendered by the Grove City Band have all contributed mightily in bringing home to us the full significance of America and its flag.
> Today in this grave but determined hour of our history, we pause to commemorate the one hundred and sixty-seventh anniversary of the American flag.

This flag, which has always flown in the vanguard of freedom and human progress, now flies over the ancient city of Rome and upon the shell-torn beaches of wounded France.

Today this flag, true to its time-honored principles of justice, human decency, and peace, moves inexorably forward in that long, bitter march of liberation which is designed to restore the stricken and to free the enslaved peoples of the world.

This flag which now stands anchored in the soil of France will move across the world until the tides of aggression and tyranny which threaten all freemen have been conquered and dispelled.

But it will move not as the symbol of slavery and servitude which identifies the swastika, nor yet as heralding the dawn of the day of eternal darkness, as does the banner of the Rising Sun. The American flag will move across the world tolling out the liberation and the majesty of all men.

It will proceed in power and in purpose, as it has always done, to strike down the tyrant and the usurper, and to restore the vanquished and the betrayed.

In all the expanse of the world there is no flag more honored, and more esteemed, than this, the American Flag—for it bears legend to all men that in every recess where this flag is flown, right, justice, and human decency prevail.

All freedom-loving, all right-thinking men the world over pay homage to this flag which stands today an unfailing beacon of deliverance to a troubled and tormented world.

As this flag now flies above the shores of France, so, too, shall it fly again over embattled Bataan, over conquered Manila, and over bleeding Guam. This flag shall fly again over every inch of soil that is American; and no force, no power will say it nay.

Those gallant men, living and dead, who carried this flag into battle shall see its every bastion restored and its every desecration avenged.

This flag now flies in all the ramparts of the world—in Tunisia, in New Guinea, in Italy, and in France—and it flies there as a symbol of impending doom for the faltering Axis and all that it entails.

Those brave American men under arms, and those gallant, tireless Americans who labor long hours at home to produce the implements of war, working together in unshakable resolve and unity, shall be the means of carrying this flag to ultimate, complete and final victory.

The day is not far distant when our troops shall be quartered and this flag shall be raised in those rotten cores of Axis debauchery—Tokio and Berlin.

That shall be a day of deep thanksgiving for the world, for it shall make clear to all men that the principles of right, justice, and eternal progress which are woven into this flag are once again restored to all the peoples of the earth.

And as this shall be the flag of victory, so, too, shall it be the flag of peace. For in all justice to those gallant men and women who have served under this flag, in all justice to our own security, and in all justice to the civilized world, this great Nation must lend its full leadership and its full power to the creation of a just and lasting peace among the nations of the world.

This is no flag of conquest, of imperialism, or plunder. This is a flag of liberation, of justice, and of peace. And it is in man's eternal quest for peace that this flag and its principles can play a full and vital role.

If this Nation is to fulfill its international obligations in the post-war world, it must not be averse to full participation in an international organization to preserve the peace. Far from being averse to full participation in such an organization, the American Nation must assume a positive and leading role in its creation.

This organization must be open to the participation and support of all nations, including those nations who now stand pitted against us in this war—after these nations become adjusted to and accept the principles of peace. No organization for peace can possibly endure or succeed which is restricted in membership or which is concerned solely with the negative problems of policing the world.

The type of organization which the world requires is one which will be directed toward positive progress. This organization must foster all the peaceful methods for settling disputes—conciliation, mediation, arbitration, and full judicial process. It must provide agencies for the solution of economic and social problems of world-wide import. It must build institutions that depend upon popular support for their primary strength.

And if it should be found that a proper world organization must be supported by positive sanctions, we shall not fail to encourage their establishment.

Such an international organization as this is not incompatible with the traditional principles of this flag, and the freedom and sovereignty of this Nation.

The history of these recurring world wars has demonstrated the full need for an international agreement among the nations of the world to preserve the peace, as well as the need for a sound and workable organization to carry such an agreement into effect.

This flag has always led this Nation into the vanguard of human progress on all fronts. And it now stands ready to lead this Nation and the world into a freer, more purposeful, and more abundant life in the world of peace which lies ahead.

And while we are extending a helping and cooperative hand to the other nations of the world, we must never forget that this flag represents us and the principles for which we stand—the principles of justice, peace, and liberty for all men.

We must, therefore, never permit this flag to be used as an instrument of conquest to dominate and control the world. If ever such a course were permitted, the honor of this flag would be forever lost.

And as this flag should never be used in conquest, so neither should it ever be abandoned for any other flag—no matter by what name or what description it may be called. The American people shall always remain free, sovereign, and independent, and they should abide by this flag and its principles which have served them so faithfully and well throughout the years.

May it ever be, down through all the centuries of time, that when men inquire after our flag they will always be met with this same, this stirring answer: "'Tis the star-spangled banner and long will it wave, o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Leathem D. Smith Talks Sense for a Post-War America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, we hear much talk these days about post-war America. Many books and pamphlets have been written, many of which are too complicated for ordinary understanding. Seldom do we have a plan stated in simple and practical language and one based on common sense. Under unanimous consent, I insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a really worthwhile statement made by Leathem D. Smith, of Sturgeon Bay, Wis., about a post-war America in general and Wisconsin in particular.

WE CAN—WE MUST ADOPT A PROGRAM FOR POST-WAR AMERICA

(By Leathem D. Smith)

We hear much discussion these days on the necessity for preserving the free system of American life. We probably have too little conception of just what is meant and just what is required, in view of the changes brought about by the war to preserve this system of free enterprise, with all the freedom and advantages which it gives to the individual.

The great majority of our citizens I am sure are in accord with this desire, but do we all realize the threat to its existence which results from our inability to find a solution to the problem of unemployment prior to the beginning of all-out expenditure of public funds for the war effort? I want to discuss some of the factors which were responsible for the disruption of our economy and also measures which I believe will be helpful in restoring not only normal conditions of employment but also a safer, sounder system, profiting from the tragic depression experience through which we have gone.

There has been one fact clearly demonstrated by this war which should permanently squelch the ambitions of would-be dictators and parlor pink theorists in this country, and that is the definitely proven fact that our people, born and reared under the free system of American life, are superior in fighting, in individual workmanship, and in industrial management production to the mechanized robots trained under the rule of the dictators. Never again do I expect to hear it said that we must imitate the technique of these dictators in order to compete efficiently with them, either in industry or in war. The record of our young men in the fighting services, flying the big planes, navigating and fighting our naval ships, quickly adapting themselves to the art of mechanized warfare, proves the superiority of our system of stressing the training of the individual for himself and not as a cog in a machine.

The second great problem, and the one which I believe is foremost, next to the winning of the war in the minds of our servicemen, our people in war plants, and in fact all our citizenry is "What does the economic and employment situation of the country hold in the future for us all?"

Since real depression hit us in 1931, attempts have been made, largely through Federal spending, to correct the unemployment situation. Little progress was made, in spite of a rapidly increasing Federal debt, toward alleviating the numbers of unemployed.

Not until the country went all-out in spending, first on a defense program and then on a war-construction program, was this situation corrected.

NATIONAL INCOME MUST REMAIN HIGH

It should be apparent, however, to all of us that this program cannot be continued—that, at the rate the national debt is increasing we would be only a short distance in time and amount of expenditures from national insolvency. Rather, steps must be taken toward maintaining a national income from other sources that will meet the carrying charges and the gradual reduction of this indebtedness. We are all coming within the scope of the income-tax collections and becoming tax conscious. Many of us know, from this new experience, the cost of carrying the burden of national expenditure and debt.

This problem of restoring national prosperity and employment is not so difficult as it may seem if one will not be confused by the conflicting ideas of minority groups and special interests but will seek the basic factors which control and regulate our standards of living and of employment.

Basically, all employment rests upon the serving of the individual human needs of our people. Fifty years ago, before the great advances in mechanized and industrial production, our wants were comparatively simple and very few in number. Barter was used to a large extent for the exchange of goods and services. Farmers traded their products at the stores for their necessities. I can remember the store books issued by the old lumber companies to their workmen. Little money or bank credit was in use or in circulation.

With the development of inventions and mechanized production and the great specialization of employment which ensued, it was necessary to have an ever-increasing volume of money or medium of exchange to handle the increased volume and velocity of trade, so that unemployment would not ensue from an inability to distribute the products of manufacture. To finance the distribution of these products, the American unit banking system was developed. Soon every small town had its bank or banks, operated by men who knew the character, resources, and ability of its citizens, and who were in the best position to judge the ability for repayment of loans requested.

The devolpment of the American banking system, with credit available to the grass roots of the country, was as big a factor in the raising of the standard of living of the American people as all of their mechanical and inventive ability for without this trade-financing system the products of industry could not have been distributed and we would have encountered earlier the situation which prevailed in the 1930's—over-production in every line and under-consumption amounting almost to privation among a large percentage of our people.

WALL STREET MUST NOT RUN COUNTRY BANKING SYSTEM

A weakness of the banking system was that, through the correspondent banking method, it took its advice as to credit policies from a few large banks in New York. These banks were always closely identified with the stock market, and during the boom period of the 1920's many of the officials of these banks found that the easiest way to make money was by gambling on the stock exchange. After the stock-market crash in 1929 the market manipulators made several unsuccessful attempts during the year 1930 to run the market up, or "bull" it, but failed because the public, after their scare in 1929, could not be again interested in speculating in stocks.

Almost immediately after the first of the year in 1931 a decision seems to have been reached by those manipulators to "bear" the market, or run it down by short selling, a method whereby the short seller profits from every drop in price of listed stocks, and apparently to use the banking system of the country to aid this movement.

Word was sent out to every banker in the country, through his correspondent banks in the larger cities, to get himself liquid. That meant calling in his loans. This was promptly acted upon, and borrowers in all of the banks in the country began to feel the pressure to pay up the money they had borrowed. This forced the sale of stocks and bonds which had been put up as collateral for loans, and these were dumped on the stock and bond market, forcing the market down and paying off big profits to the manipulators, who were short-selling.

The result, as we well know, was a strong deflationary movement throughout the country which resulted in the closing of all the banks and the bank moratorium in 1933.

PLEADED FOR CLOSING STOCK MARKET IN '32

In 1932 I started a campaign, which was publicized in the Milwaukee Journal, attempting to close the stock market in order to stop the deflationary spiral and the withdrawal of outstanding working bank credit. This effort was forcibly commented on by the Milwaukee Journal editorially in June 1932 under the heading "Close the stock market."

Outstanding bank credit to individuals and small businesses shrank from about $40,000,000,000 in the 1920's to $20,000,000,000 during the depression 1930's indicating the withdrawal of approximately $20,000,000,000 from circulating credit which had been financing employment.

The banking system as it is now constituted will never again, under its present restrictions, place this credit in circulation. A new system must be devised, either in connection with the existing banking system or as an entirely separate institution, where people will invest their money to earn interest—money which cannot be withdrawn on demand and which can be loaned out safely to persons and small corporations, who have been suffering so acutely for lack of sources of credit since the bank failure. The replacement of this private capital in loans is the only method of curing chronic unemployment in this country.

Since this has loomed as one of the greatest problems in our history, I am stressing this issue, and I have spent a great deal of time, study, and investigation determining the causes of the bank failure and, conversely, the methods by which this credit can be reflated and this working money again put into circulation. The failure of the banks which we did business with and knew was not due to mismanagement by the bankers but to causes entirely beyond their control.

FARM LABOR AND MANAGEMENT MUST WORK TOGETHER

Farmer, labor, and management have all cooperated in a fine manner to insure the success of the war effort. Because of Federal indebtedness Federal expenditures must be cut to the bone for the future, and all of our productive classes must cooperate to solve these problems of the peace in the post-war period. My plea is for farmer, labor, and management to study these post-war problems together.

All of us who have been through the ups and downs of depressions and booms in this country know that there is very little prosperity for any one class when any of the others are suffering. When times are good we all prosper; when times are bad we all suffer.

In my talk on March 4 in Sturgeon Bay I stated that I did not believe in granting favors to any special group but that I was interested in working with the organized representatives of every group of our population, cooperating in a joint effort to increase our national well-being. In commenting on the problems of labor I stated that I wanted to approach the problem on a constructive basis, cooperating with the organized representatives of labor toward the end that there might be continued improvement in real wages and the standards of living, without the losses caused by labor warfare, often without any gain in real wages because of the increased burden put on the costs of production.

Increases in income to labor which do not increase the costs of production do nothing to upset the parity of prices between farm and manufactured products. Such increases, by increasing the buying power of labor, help to maintain a market at good prices for products of the farm.

Since I made this statement I have discussed with top-ranking members of labor organizations more specifically what I had in mind. In industry there has been a healthy development in labor-management relations, bringing them closer together in the study of their common problems. I now believe it is time to get down to specific ways and means of increasing labor income without increasing, and probably decreasing, the costs of production. Increasing continually the hourly rates of labor does not necessarily mean any increase in real wages, for all other costs of production tend to increase proportionately. The farmer is alive to this problem and is demanding parity for prices of farm products as compared to prices of manufactured products based on labor costs.

Since it is absolutely essential that farmer, labor, and all other productive factors in our economy get together on a program to work this country out of its financial and unemployment difficulties by private initiative, we must find a common platform or ground on which farmer, labor, and management can stand. This, I believe, can be brought about by the study between labor and management of methods of incentive pay, by which savings in the costs of production, which may be brought about by increased efficiency of management and increased energy and proficiency on the part of the workers, may be divided between labor and management and also reduce the cost of their product, so that, while labor income may be increased, the cost of the product will not be increased and may be substantially decreased.

I have recommended to my labor friends that they go seriously into the question of studying incentive pay plans, working with the employers and getting into their organizations in increasing numbers men who would be skilled in the analysis of time study labor operations in the various lines of industry. I have found considerable interest and a hearty response to these suggestions by top-ranking labor men who realize that we can accomplish much more working together for the general good of the American people. If this can be accomplished in industry, then truly we shall have done a good turn for the farmer and, in fact, for all classes of our population, for, if labor income is increased, the buying power of labor with which to purchase the products of the farm has thereby increased and that without increasing the costs of what the farmer has to buy.

Our farmers in distress, along with all other classes, because of the losses and unemployment caused by the unnecessary depression, could not be expected to turn down the relief payments in various forms doled out by the Federal Government from taxpayers' funds. There is no doubt, however, that almost all realized that the policy was unsound and could not be continued because of the mounting public debt.

FARMER MUST BE FREED FROM GOVERNMENT CONTROLS

One of the most healthful signs of the present times is to see our individualistic, independent farmer back on his feet because of war-stimulated markets, voicing his emphatic protest against the policy of subsidies. No more unsound policy than subsidies was ever proposed as a substitute for a firm stand against inflationary rises in prices and in all costs.

In talking with representatives of farm organizations and with individual farmers, who are giving more thought to reestablishing their industry on the sound basis of private initiative, I find that their sentiment seems unanimous in favor of being relieved of Government controls. They, more than any other class, understand that the old law of supply and demand is one that cannot be repealed. Only under emergency conditions, when the law of supply and demand is upset because of artificial scarcities due to wars, panics, or other abnormal conditions in our economy, should the Government undertake to fix floors or ceilings under or over prices.

If we mean what we say when we talk of a free system of American enterprise, we know that that does not mean regimentation or other artificial controls continued after the period of emergency is over. The farmers believe in the self-government of their industry through their associations, cooperatives, and other farm organizations. They realize that, to have a good market for their products, there must be something approaching normal employment of labor, for these are the people who buy the products of the farm.

There is no fear in my mind but that the intelligent farm element in our population will go along with sound economic programs based on the knowledge of practical experience. Under anything approaching normal conditions the farmer is the truest example of what we mean by "independent free enterprise." He works entirely on an incentive basis. He is independent in his method of life and the ownership of his land. He takes the risks of weather, crop failures, and fluctuating markets because he believes above all in this system of free enterprise, which would be lost if regimentation and regulation were to control his activities.

The farmer is vitally interested also in the development of foreign markets for his surpluses, particularly for the dairy prolucts of our State of Wisconsin. He is vitally concerned, too, with the development of economical methods of transportation in all lines—water, rail, and truck—so that he can get his products to market without unfair penalties and costs.

There are many other major questions of vital interest to the people of Wisconsin and the Great Lakes area. One of them is the long-proposed St. Lawrence waterway. At a meeting on this matter in Chicago between the United States Maritime Commission, the Great Lakes Harbors Association, and shipping and shipbuilding interests on the Great Lakes I spoke as a representative of the shipbuilding interests on the Great Lakes. I made the following statement on the St. Lawrence waterway:

"In analyzing the possibilities but also the difficulties and handicaps attendant to confining Great Lakes foreign-ship operation to vessels within the St. Lawrence or New York barge-canal limitations, we cannot help but have our imaginations drawn to the prospect of what the opening of the St. Lawrence deep waterway might mean to a State like Wisconsin.

"It goes without dispute to say that it would remove the only handicap to Great Lakes shipyard construction of ships of any size and type, and as a shipbuilder I am naturally interested in this. If we had had the St. Lawrence open, we would have had hundreds of ships to build, the same as the coast yards, and would have given Henry Kaiser and other great builders a run for their money. Opening the St. Lawrence later will insure more shipyard employment for the future on the Lakes.

"However, I believe that, because of the changes brought about by the war, many new factors have been brought into play to make the St. Lawrence development a vital necessity to the Great Lakes area in a much broader sense.

"The terrific program that the United States has been carrying on in the war effort, not only in supplying its own forces but, through lend-lease, acting as the arsenal of the United Nations, is going to leave a lasting effect on the industries and resources of this country.

"We are using our basic raw materials at a tremendous pace; our best grade iron ore and other ores and our oil supply have moved many years nearer depletion because of this greately accelerated consumption. Our future national policy, for many reasons, should be the greatly increased importation of raw materials from foreign lands and the conservation of our own resources to spread their life over a longer span. National security demands that sufficient reserves of ores and oils be assured to future generations to maintain a war effort if foreign supplies are shut off by hostile powers, as was the case in this war in rubber and tin.

"Secondly, foreign markets can be greatly stimulated for our manufactured products if we will take essential raw materials from the foreign lands which buy our products.

"Thirdly, to operate our new merchant fleet, freight must be provided, and this must be largely in cargoes to and from our ports. We have developed a fine force of merchant sailors, and their continued employment should be a major concern.

"The Great Lakes shipping interests have, as a rule, been opposed to the opening of the St. Lawrence deep waterway, largely because of its bringing foreign ships into competition with Great Lakes American shipping, and I have always partly sympathized with this attitude. However, Great Lakes shipping is largely owned by iron and steel and coal interests, whose major interest should be and is the maintenance of the leadership of the Great Lakes area in the production of steel and the prosperity of the great diversified industry which has grown up here because of steel production.

"We have seen many forecasts of the length of life of the Minnesota and Michigan high-grade ore supplies. It is beyond argument to state that war consumption has rapidly hastened their depletion. It is against all interests of national security to allow this program to continue without taking all reasonable steps to supplement our raw-material supplies on the Lakes with foreign imports.

"There is only one way in which the Lakes can import many war materials without being put to a serious freight disadvantage over seacoast centers, and that is by the opening of the St. Lawrence to deep-draft shipping. It is the responsibility of industry in the Great Lakes area to safeguard their future by long-range planning in this regard.

"The use of the ships of the new American fleet for this traffic would provide employment for many men and keep the supply of essential materials, even from foreign lands, strictly under American control."

I have attempted to touch upon some of the factors which I believe have to be understood to better understand the functionings of our free system of enterprise and the corrective measures which must be taken to save this system. The system can be saved only by holding up national income to a high level after the war by private business so that our whole structure will not collapse because of the overlying Federal debt burden and the loss of national income which would result from a return to depression levels of unemployment. The saving of our free system can be accomplished only by full cooperation of all the productive factors in our economy.

To these ends we must all work together. For these ends we must elect men to Washington with experience and understanding. There is no excuse why these things cannot be done. All that is needed is proper representation in Government circles.

And Now Finland

REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, thanks to President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull, the Republic of Finland will shortly be but a glorious memory. These two gentlemen have given the Russians a free hand to invade Finland and wage a war of extermination, which is as savage and barbaric as it is unjustifiable. The Finns are now made to travel a bloody trail blazed by countless thousands of Poles, Latvians, Lithuanians, Estonians, as well as Russians. Those who are not killed will be deported to the wastes of Siberia where they will either be exterminated or assimilated.

Today Finland is without powerful friends, but it was not ever thus. It is not so long ago that the officials of this administration pointed to Finland and the Finns as a shining example of honor, honesty, and rectitude. Of all the nations who owed us money, she was practically the only one who did not repudiate her obligations to this country. Finland met her obligations promptly, proudly, and gladly. Mr. Roosevelt and his administration may hold Finland up to scorn, but millions of Americans who have longer memories than Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull feel humiliated over the shabby treatment that this administration has accorded the Finnish people.

It is not pleasant for red-blooded Americans to reflect upon some of the foreign policies of this administration. It is not so long ago that Roosevelt and Churchill met and formulated the Atlantic Charter and its "four freedoms." Evidently this was not to be a world-wide charter as it placed no restrictions or obligations upon the United Nations. Under it Russia continued to have a free hand in the countries that are so unfortunate as to border on the Baltic Sea, while England will be free to continue her exploitations in India and other oppressed countries.

It is humiliating to Americans to know that Roosevelt and Huli have been most bitter in their denunciation of Finland for her refusal to commit national suicide by attempting to expel the Germans, who occupy the country in force. Just why we should expect greater sacrifices from Finland than from Russia is hard to say. Russia has not declared war on Japan, who is by all odds our most deadly and dangerous enemy. Then why should we insist on Finland declaring war against Germany? Roosevelt and Hull were not always bitter enemics of Finland. We recall what Mr. Roosevelt said when the Russians staged an unprovoked invasion of Finland. With righteous indignation he then said:

> The news of the Soviet naval and military bombarding within Finnish territory has come as a profound shock to the Government and people of the United States.

Despite efforts made to solve the dispute by peaceful methods, to which no reasonable objection could be offered, one power has chosen to resort to force of arms. * * * The people and Government of Finland have a long, honorable, and wholly peaceful record which has won for them the respect and warm regard of the people and Government of the United States.

It would be ironic and tragic if those memorable words were to become Finland's epitaph.

Program for Farm Stability

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an article from the June issue of the Country Gentleman entitled "Program for Farm Stability." The article was written by our colleague the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE]. Also included in this extension is an editorial from the same paper on this excellent article. Mr. HOPE is the ranking Republican Member on the important Committee on Agriculture. He has spent many years studying our farm problem, and agriculture has already received many benefits through legislation that he has sponsored and favored. His influence for agriculture on a Nation-wide scope will continue to increase as the years go by.

The articles follow:

A SECURE AND PROSPEROUS AFTER-WAR AMERICA

Next in importance to winning the war is the necessity for making this a fully productive and prosperous country after the war. Some of the decisions as to this issue must be made this year. For that reason we wish that the article, Program for Farm Stability, by Representative CLIFFORD R. HOPE, in this issue of Country Gentleman might be read by more than farm people. It concerns every interest in the Nation as much as it does agriculture.

One may disagree with some of the policies presented by Mr. HOPE, may feel that they go too far or not far enough, or may prefer other methods. But he has set out one basic fact that is vital to the prosperity and well-being of the country. This fact is the unity of our economic system. Neither industry, labor, nor agriculture can prosper alone. We are "every one members one of another" in a literal sense. If we are to go ahead toward a higher national level of living after the war, we must go together.

The memory of what happened after the other war should haunt every conference table. The failure then to count in the 40 percent of our people dependent upon agriculture finally almost wrecked our economy. If we have learned from experience, we should be able to avoid such a disaster after this war.

One practical principle determines whether we have a prosperity in this country that can be maintained. It is the simple principle that those who comprise our major groups must receive enough for their products and their labor that they are able to buy the products of the others on something like even terms. When that condition prevails we have an active demand for goods and food and work. It is the essential for that era of plenty that everybody is anxious to have after the war.

Farmers have always been willing and able to produce their share of such an abundance. But, because of their unorganized state and the long-time risks they must assume, they require a program that will reasonably safeguard them in doing so. This is necessary not merely for the good of agriculture. As Representative HOPE points out, "The future well-being of the Nation itself demands it."

We hope that the principle of economic unity, presented here by one of its leading members, is fully recognized by the Republican Party when it meets in convention at Chicago. We hope that the Democratic Party does the same thing. Whichever wins will then have a common support in establishing the basis for a secure and prosperous after-war America.

PROGRAM FOR FARM STABILITY

(By CLIFFORD R. HOPE, Representative from the Fifth Kansas District)

The United States must have in the post-war period an effective program for maintaining a sound and prosperous agriculture. The future well-being of the Nation itself demands it. Tragic economic experiences which followed the First World War have proved this. After expanding its production sharply to meet the needs of that conflict, agriculture was given little aid in converting to post-war conditions. The result was a serious agricultural deflation that created perhaps the most destructive farm depression in the country's history.

But that depression did not stop with the Nation's farms. It spread to urban areas to destroy jobs, to close factories and to produce bread lines and relief rolls. In forming its policies during the twenties, the country had overlooked the economic fact that it could not maintain prosperity while its basic industry, agriculture, was not prosperous.

So, in drawing its plans for the new post-war period, the Nation must make sure that the same mistake is not made again. The cornerstone of future economic policies must be a program designed to assure agriculture's well-being.

This being the case, what then should be the nature, character, and elements of an effective farm program?

It should, first of all, help agriculture meet its major responsibility—that of supplying the Nation with the food and fiber materials needed to provide all its citizens amply. Too, it should help agriculture supply a world market that has never had enough.

But, in meeting that responsibility, the farmer, in turn, should be assured of equitable prices and a fair share of the national income. A fair share, in simple words, is the same reward for the farmer's labors which society gives to those who perform services of like importance and requiring equal ability, training and skill in other industries and endeavors. Such a reward is not only economic justice to the farmer but an essential ingredient of national prosperity. Industry, business, and labor cannot be prosperous if those dependent upon agriculture have not the income with which to buy products produced by urban society.

Whether agriculture will be given the opportunity to produce abundantly at fair prices will depend as much upon future policies and programs affecting industry and labor as upon anything which can be done directly for agriculture. The war period has furnished further proof of what economists have contended for a long time—that farm prices and industrial pay rolls in this country go up and down together. Even under wartime rationing, the per capita consumption of food in this country has increased because consumers now have money with which to buy. As long as we have full employment at good wages in industry, farm prices will be good. Good farm prices, by maintaining the buying power of agriculture, increase the demand for industrial products and thus contribute to employment. The two go hand in hand.

Only through joint abundant output in both agriculture and industry can the Nation's living standards be raised.

Farmers do not have to be sold on the psychology of abundant production.

Such programs as we have had to restrict or control agricultural production have met with instinctive resistance from farmers, and have been accepted only as a temporary way out of an otherwise insoluble economic difficulty.

Yet, alone of all producers, the farmer has nothing to say as to the price of his product. At best, these prices are fixed by the law of supply and demand; at worst, they are fixed by buyers who are organized to buy as cheaply as they can. Likewise, the price of nearly everything the farmer buys is fixed by others. The transporation charges he pays in sending his products to market are fixed. The manfactured products which he uses for production and living are made by workers organized into unions which fix the price of labor. The industrial plants making these products base their prices on the cost of production, plus a profit.

Furthermore, these handicaps are, to a large extent, the result of governmental action. They are possible because of legislation covering tariffs, transportation, and utility rates; wage-and-hour laws and the legalized use of the corporate structure.

So, in formulating an effective post-war program for agriculture, we will have to consider what will be the general trend of our economic policies. Among other things, we must consider whether we are going to have abundant production in industry; what our labor policy will be; the relations between Government and business; and our general policy on foreign trade.

Fortunately it looks as if we would have some time in which to find the answers to some of these questions. For a year or two following the war we can reasonably expect that domestic and foreign markets will absorb all we can produce—at good prices. In the event that this should not develop, farmers would still be protected by legislation passed by Congress providing price supports for 2 years following the war.

We are fortunate, also, in having the benefit of all the political and economic discussions of agricultural problems which have taken place since the other war, and the programs which have been in effect since 1929. Between 1929 and 1939 we tried just about everything.

Irrespective of the value of any particular program, it is obvious, I think, that we cannot project into the future permanent programs based almost entirely on Government payments, of one kind or another, to individuals. Regardless of temporary results and benefits, the expenditure of billions of dollars and the creation of many agencies with their thousands of employees failed in the broad purpose of bringing about a more equitable relationship between farm prices and other prices.

Cold figures tell their own story as to whether the present administration's programs brought farmers fair returns. In no year before the war launched its demands did these returns achieve parity. They got up as high as 90 percent in 1937, due partly to drought and other factors outside the programs themselves. In August 1939 farm prices stood at 74 percent of parity, which was the average for the year.

All this does not mean that past programs have had no value. We have learned from them a great deal of what can and cannot be done.

NINE OBJECTIVES

Before discussing specific proposals, it might be a good idea to outline just what should be sought in a comprehensive post-war farm program. To my way of thinking, such a program should have the following objectives: 1. To promote and encourage the family-type farm. 2. To provide for the conservation of soil fertility. 3. To assure ample credit at reasonable rates. 4. To strive for an economy of abundance through expansion of markets at home and abroad. 5. To work toward improvements in marketing and distribution. 6. To make possible to the farmer an income equal to that given others for a comparable contribution to society. 7. To preserve as far as possible the farmer's independence. 8. To provide simple administrative machinery with a minimum of bureaucracy and red tape. 9. To localize control and supervision where possible, with emphasis on cooperation among farmers themselves.

The fundamental principle in formulating any agricultural program is that the basic cause of farm trouble has been price disparity. There is no substitute for fair prices in the market place as a solution for agricultural problems. The need for fair prices prompted the demands for farm legislation during the twenties and the thirties. The failure of the Roosevelt administration to maintain prices higher than 74 percent of parity after 6 years of effort was largely because it did not go straight down the road in the direction of fair prices. Instead it went off on a lot of byroads of social and economic reform.

Some of these social programs were no doubt desirable, but, given fair prices and stability of income, agriculture itself will solve many of the economic and social ills which Government agencies have tried unsuccessfully to cure by means of subsidies, regulations, and plans for remaking farming.

The extent to which the Government will have to use its powers to assure farmers equitable prices will be determined largely by policies adopted by industry and labor. If these policies promote abundance, the Government will need to do little in the field of farm prices. But, because we have no way of knowing the future policies of industry and labor, it is necessary, if we are to be assured of fair prices, that machinery be set up whereby the Federal Government can support and stabilize farm prices, or can assist farmers in doing so.

PLAN FOR PRICE SUPPORT

A price-support program could take various forms. It might consist in simply having the Government take off the market a small surplus which was depressing prices. This surplus might be disposed of in foreign markets or by making some use of it in domestic industry. It could be held until the market was ready to absorb it through normal channels. Or it might be that, through governmental assistance and expansion of markets either at home or abroad, we could absorb the surplus. In some cases price-supporting loans would be the best method. Just what program would be best at any particular time, or on any particular commodity, would depend upon circumstances.

It is well to recognize that any price-support program may reach a stage where some control of production or marketing is necessary. The Government can stabilize price but it cannot guarantee that there will be a market at the stabilized price for all that may be produced. If, for the lack of a market, surpluses pile up, it may be necessary as a last resort to put some restriction on production. We might as well face the question frankly and honestly.

The use of control measures in cases of emergency is not a political issue. Both political parties have advocated their use. After the experience of the Farm Board, the Republican Party, in its 1932 platform, endorsed control of production. The Democratic platform was silent on that subject and Democratic speakers during the campaign denounced control. Yet, when confronted with the responsibility of meeting a surplus problem, the Democratic administration enacted drastic legislation for production control.

Where should the control rest? In my opinion, with few exceptions, it should be placed on the marketing of products rather than on production. There would be less confusion, less red tape, less irritation and less bureaucracy under a system of marketing controls than under production controls, and the latter are bound to hamper individual initiative more than the former. Governmental control of any kind should be invoked only after all other efforts to dispose of surpluses fail.

Expansion of foreign trade may help to avoid the necessity of control. That means, of course, that we must import as well as export. Other countries cannot buy American agricultural products, no matter how badly they need them, unless they sell this country something.

In formulating post-war foreign-trade policies, the Government might well consider a number of proposals advanced in the past for encouraging farm exports—two-price proposals such as the McNary-Haugen and export debenture plans advanced in the past and the newer Pickert-Baerman plan. The McNary-Haugen and the debenture plans offered a means of maintaining export markets without permitting the export price to depress domestic prices. The Pickert-Baerman plan goes further than this in that it sets up machinery to stimulate and promote foreign trade, and to furnish other countries means of paying for our agricultural products. Under this plan foreign countries needing American farm products would be permitted to send to this country specified quantities of designated industrial products and have the tariff duty refunded on condition that they accept payment in American agricultural commodities.

The quantity of manufactured products imported under this plan would be controlled by a quota system. This plan need not frighten American industry, for insofar as it enabled farmers to produce abundantly and sell at a good price, the plan would help give agriculture an increased buying power for industrial products.

We can further avoid necessity for controls by authorizing the Government to give agriculture some assistance and guidance in making its program pattern fit the form of the market. A proper soil-conservation program can be helpful in making necessary adjustments and in preventing the accumulation of excessive surpluses. Land-use studies made by the Department of Agriculture indicate that, if farm lands were utilized as they should be for soil conservation and permanent productivity, the resulting pattern of land use would bring about some reduction in the acreage of crops which have in the past been affected by surpluses. The present soil-conservation programs can be coordinated and expanded to meet such needs. Conservation of our basic resource, the soil, is a national interest.

MORE MARKETING PLANS

One existing program which could very well be more widely extended is that providing for marketing agreements. This is of special value to milk producers, and to those engaged in fruit and vegetable production. These agreements work out especially well where the producers are strongly organized into cooperatives. Too much stress cannot be placed upon cooperative marketing as one way of avoiding the necessity of Government controls over production and marketing.

It goes without saying that the Government should continue and greatly expand its research programs, both along the line of developing new crops and new uses for existing crops.

Finally let me reiterate, we all go up and down together. We cannot have a successful agricultural program if factories are closed and men are out of work. We cannot have a successful agricultural program if our policies toward industry are such that capital will not take the risk of expansion.

Also, if our general post-war economic policy is along the lines of high wage rates, high industrial tariffs, high taxes, the closed shop, and other monopolistic or semimonopolistic practices, a Government-control program may be needed at all times. On the other hand, if the national policy is that of full production and plenty, then abundant and uncontrolled production can well be the policy of agriculture.

With full production on the part of all, the country holds limitless possibilities. We can win the post-war battle against depression, want, and unemployment only by such a policy.

The G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEAN M. GILLESPIE

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 13, 1944

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, the G. I. bill of rights is a document almost without parallel in the history of the United States, providing substantial Federal aid for the readjustment in civilian life of returning World War No. 2 veterans. It represents the carefully considered viewpoint of both Houses of Congress. It is not a hastily conceived document, but, on the contrary, it is the result of more than 3 months of hearings, debates, and conferences which have gone into the shaping of its manifold provisions. It embodies in concrete legislative detail, so far as possible, the intent of Congress to make adequate provisions for all foreseeable problems which may confront the men and women of the armed forces after they have returned to civilian life, which was disrupted completely for them as they went to our Nation's defense.

At no time in the history of other wars, which we were compelled to fight, has the Nation planned so fully and foresightedly and in advance for the welfare of the veterans who put their lives at stake in combat for their country. This time we are not waiting. I feel sure that if word could be flashed to our men on the far-flung battle fronts of the world that the Congress of the United States has unanimously passed the G. I. bill of rights, it would give them hope and encouragement.

When our boys return they will find that the provisions of this act provide hospitalization when needed, assistance in finding a job, resumption of interrupted education, guaranteed loans to give them a new start in business, buying a farm or building a home, and unemployment compensation if it is impossible to find a job. But the G. I. bill of rights is more than all this; it is the specific pledge of the Nation to its fighting forces that their country not only stands back of them now but is ready to come to their aid individually and as they may need it.

It is variously estimated by experts that carrying out the provisions of this act will cost somewhere between four billion and six billion dollars for a period of years not extending beyond 7 years after the end of the war. That, of course, is a staggering sum for this Nation to undertake to pay, but that is on the human side of the war ledger. Let us see what the other side looks like.

Our actual expenditures for the war effort from July 1940 through April 1944 amount to $184,000,000,000, as reported officially by the Treasury Department. In addition, probable expenditures of $16,000,000,000 through May and June 1944 indicate the total of almost $200,000,000,000 that the war has cost to date, and the war is not yet over. Experts say the total cost of the war will probably reach the staggering figure of $325,000,000,000, and we in Congress think that if it is prudent to spend that gigantic sum for war, then it is prudent to spend four to six billion dollars to take care of the men and women who are fighting the war.

By comparison, the large expenditures contemplated under the G. I. bill of rights are modest when we think of the total war cost, because the expenditures I have just stated are in money, while the greatest expenditure and waste of all is the loss of young human lives, health, and happiness.

We prepared long and carefully for D-day, the invasion, the final drive on Hitlerism, the bombing of Japan, and the end of the war. Here, in the G. I. bill of rights, is planning for victory—the end of the war. It is the pledge and the machinery to put the pledge into operation. It is not a mere resolution. It means that our veterans can come back home to more than cheers, thanks, and wild acclaim, but will have the feeling that we at home have not forgotten what they did. They will come home with a sense of security and the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness in a Nation of opportunity and private enterprise, where ability and peronal effort will allow them to build a free life to their own liking. May God bless them and bring them back to us safe and sound.

Reclassification of Federal Veterinarians and Their Lay Assistants

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, the effect of the Senate amendments is to approve the action of the Director of the Budget, the Civil Service Commission, the Department of Agriculture, and the War Food Administration in proposing appropriations to pay the existing salary levels to a specific group of essential employees whose present salaries, because of lack of funds are substantially below the standard authorized salary classification.

These appropriations would not constitute favorable discrimination with respect to these employees as compared with the entire group of Federal employees nor bring about justifiable demands for general increases throughout the civil service.

Instead it is a proposal to correct an inequity of long standing by bringing the salaries of this group up to the same level as those of other employees performing work of comparable responsibility as required by the Classification Act of July 3, 1930.

A vote to concur in the Senate amendments is a vote to do justice to these employees which has been delayed too long, and to permit the heads of the department to classify positions in the field service by the same standards as used to classify the departmental service as the Classification Act directed them to do.

I support the motion to concur.

Reclassification of Federal Veterinarians and Their Lay Assistants

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, the chief objection so far raised to concurring in the Senate amendments is that Congress by so doing will become obligated later to increase the salary of other field employees similarly situated.

The compensation of other groups may well be left for consideration when the facts regarding them are brought to our attention.

It is my judgment that all employees should receive equal treatment, and that was the judgment of Congress in the Federal Classification Act upon which the reclassification of the doctors of veterinary medicine and their lay assistants in the field is predicated.

Here we have a situation in which we have a request supported by the Director of the Budget, the Civil Service Commission, the Department of Agriculture, and the War Food Administration for enough funds to finance the reclassification which has been worked out by the administrative officials to which Congress delegated the authority to do so.

The facts presented at the hearings show conclusively that these employees are underpaid as compared with other employees performing duties of the same class involving like responsibility.

The average salary of the 3,449 employees involved in this reclassification including overtime under the War Overtime Pay Act is $2,573. They have been reclassified to receive on the average $2,862 as against the average of $2,573 they now receive.

These field employees perform the duties required to carry out the mandates of Congress as expressed in the meat-inspection law, the animal quarantine laws, and other laws passed for the prevention, eradication, and control of the diseases of food animals. Their duties are exacting and require constant vigilance of doctors of veterinary medicine and assistants trained by them and operating under their supervision and direction.

We owe it to the armed forces and the civilian population as well to make it certain that the inspection of meats and the control of animal diseases is maintained at the highest level of efficiency. Without reclassification the entrance salaries and prospects for promotion of these employees in the field service does not offer fair compensation for services rendered, and therefore are not inviting to young men who must replace those who must eventually retire with advancing years or for other causes.

Having held out to the men now in the service the promise of equal pay for equal work through reclassification, it is unfair to them now that this work has been done to refuse to appropriate sufficient funds to make the reclassification effective.

I support the motion to concur in the Senate amendments.

There Is Only One Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, in the light of the world's bitter experience in dealing with the German Empire in modern times, many thoughtful people are seriously considering ways and means of dealing with the German people at the conclusion of the present conflict that will prevent future wars and provide for peaceful and constructive advancement of the people of the several European nations.

One of the best qualified Americans to present a true picture of the German people and the German ideology is the eminent lawyer and diplomat, James W. Gerard, the former ambassador of this country to Germany, and the author of a number of illuminating books on the German Government and the German people.

There is submitted herewith an article entitled "There Is Only One Germany," by Mr. Gerard, taken from the May issue of the Monthly Bulletin of the Society for Prevention of World War No. 3:

THERE IS ONLY ONE GERMANY

(By James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany)

There are still people who believe in the myth of the two Germanys.

Rot!

People who believe that there are two Germanys—good and bad—tend to overlook the fact that, historically speaking, the country is not far from primitive. We think of German mechanical ingenuity and German music and forget that as late as 1817, when a man bought land in Prussia he became not only its owner but the owner of the persons who lived on that land. As time is measured Germany is not far removed from its days of serfdom.

The descendants of men who once owned their own white countrymen as slaves still rule Germany. The succeeding years seem to do little to temper their arrogance.

The German people are united as never before in their history—united for cruelty and conquest, with a whole generation educated in the belief that the Germans are the Herrenvolk, the lords of creation who are destined to enslave all other nations. The German people themselves are a hopeless problem for the world. Their progress toward a state in which they will no longer be a menace to civilization is as slow as evolution itself. They must be constantly watched or they'll follow new leaders into another war.

After the last war those who believed in the two Germanys prevailed. We kissed the Germans and gave them enormous sums of money, some of which they used not only to build all sorts of public improvements in Germany, but even to buy into American companies and make us a debtor nation to Germany, the original debts for money received from this country being, of course, repudiated.

I'm certain that this time the Allies will not make the mistake of stopping their armies at the German borders. Germany must be broken up into a series of independent states, but mere separation won't be enough. The separation must be permanent. This time we must certainly eradicate the Prussian ruling class, and continue the extermination well on down the line among the Nazis, and stop kissing the remainder, if we are going to render Germany too impotent to start another war.

I hope, also, that the Allies will not weaken and listen to the blandishments of such men as old Dr. Schacht, who is certain to tell the world that millions of decent Germans were terrorized and led into the war by the cruel Nazis. Hitler is a much more independent man than was the Kaiser, but Hitler in turn is now dominated by the General Staff, just as was the Kaiser, and the General Staff is always made up of Junkers who are descendants of the Teutonic Knights. The Junkers are the real power behind Hitler. The beer-drinking old-school German is just about as bad as the most fanatical young Nazi because both will eagerly follow any leader who promises them world domination. They have the common national trait of militarism. The women are as bad as the men. All Germans consent to be ruled from the top, instead of from the bottom.

The following sentences are from a book that I wrote in 1917, when we had just entered World War No. 1, and these sentences apply today with equal force:

"There must be no German peace. The old regime, left in control of Germany, would seek only a favorable moment to renew the war, to strive again for mastery of the world. This is the Germany that we face and will face after the war. Our great problem is how to change this Prussian militaristic state into a peaceful member of the family of nations."

Requirements for a Healthy Local Air-Line Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by William A. M. Burden, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, before the Feeder Airlines Association, Washington, D. C., June 15, 1944:

In his article in the June issue of Flying, which I am going to recommend that you read, if you have not already done so, George Burgess closed with the following paragraph:

"The benefits of expanded local airline service to the entire economy of the country, and to the public in jobs, convenience, and time, can be of tremendous post-war importance and are well worth every promotional effort on the part of the Government and of private operators and capital."

This goal is a challenging one and a real one—we all know the traffic is there—but it will not be easy to get costs down and the convenience of service up to the point where we can reach it.

It seems to me that there are four main lines of attack on the problem:

1. We must reduce the cost of local airline service.

2. We must increase its convenience to the passenger—which means higher door-to-door speed and great reliability.

3. We must establish the policy that reasonable Government financial assistance will be available for local services.

4. We must then concentrate the early development of local airlines in areas where they seem likely to become self-supporting in a reasonable period. (This does not mean that experimental operations on a limited scale should not be carried out in less promising areas.)

Although the economic development of local service is the province of the Civil Aeronautics Board, the provision of the ground facilities required is to a considerable degree the responsibility of C. A. A. and which matter is of such vital importance to American aviation as a whole that I am sure my friends and colleagues on the Board will not feel that I am stepping out of my normal role in speaking of it tonight—particularly as I am going to start by quoting their vice chairman.

The great possibilities of local air-line operation and the technical obstacles which it must overcome are outlined at some length in Dr. Warner's admirable paper in Aeronautical Engineering for February 1944.

You will remember that he stresses that the two greatest technical economic hurdles are:

1. The loss of time and increase of cost which frequent stops involve.

2. The tendency of unit-operating cost to rise with decreasing size of aircraft.

Taking everything into account, Warner estimates that with present equipment under present methods of operation it will cost 25 to 35 percent more per mile to operate a service which stops every 30 miles instead of every 300. He further figures that every minute saved per stop on a service stopping every 30 miles is equivalent to an increase of 20 miles per hour in cruising speed. Present air-line schedules are three to four times as fast as trains over distances of 1,000 miles or more and it is common to visualize that the local air-liner will have the same advantage of surface common carriers, but Warner estimates that allowing for substantial improvements over present practice, we will do well to average 95 miles per hour, airport to airport, with a 150-mile-per-hour airplane on a route where stops are 30 miles apart. If we add a substantial amount of airport to city time to this figure, we will find that our door-to-door time will be little faster than the busses. Obviously, besides improving runway design and airplane design, we must do a great deal of work on the airport problem.

Probably one of the most constructive promotional policies that the Government can and should pursue has to do with airports, for the accessibility of local air-line service is the most difficult hurdle that must be surmounted in order to capitalize on the one great advantage of transportation by air—speed.

Never in the history of aviation has there been such interest in airports, and we must not only encourage it but also must do everything we can to lend a guiding hand to prevent the morning-after effects of overindulgence that comes from lack of experience. For instance, in every "Middlesex village and farm" the chamber of commerce is "ready to ride and spread the alarm for the country folks to be out and to arms" for fear someone else will build a bigger and better airport. The country does not need a very large additional number of bigger airports for the exigencies of war have diverted all Government funds to just that kind for the last 5 years. In consequence, there are now some 750 class IV airports with runways of 4,500 feet or longer, as compared with 3 in January 1939.

In this regard the C. A. A., as you probably know, will soon issue its national airport plan which calls for the construction of some 3,000 new airports, doubling the number now in this country, and for the expansion of 600 of the existing ones. Upward of 2,900 of the new airports are class I and II, having maximum runway lengths of 3,500 feet.

There should be provision in the plans for these airports for the necessary zoning and for options on sufficient additional land to allow for future expansion. Where the convenience in location can be materially improved by using a site for the initial airport which is satisfactory except for limited possibilities for expansion, the possibility of constructing a second larger airport later rather than expanding the first one built should receive serious consideration.

A great difficulty facing all planners is the proper size of airports for various purposes. Unfortunately, contradictory advice is often given on this subject by people who are supposed to know the answers. Insofar as scheduled air-line operations are concerned, the plane manufacturer wants runways five to six thousand feet in length so that he can design for the maximum economy and speed possible in the state of the art without having undue restrictions imposed upon him by limitations in take-off run. Airline operations men have a similar generous approach to airport specifications for the same reasons. The traffic man, however, the man who is looking at the matter primarily from the point of view of how many people he can get to use the service, has a different approach; he wants to have the airport as close as possible to the town so that it may be convenient for the traveling public. His requirements must be given great weight in final selection, particularly as far as local service is concerned. If it takes a half to three-fourths of an hour from airport to town at each end of the trip, there just won't be any local traffic of distances of a hundred miles or less. The primary requisite for an airport to be used by a local short-haul air line—and this goes for the private flyer, too—is that it be not more than 15 minutes from the center of town, be served by some means of public transportation, and be convenient to residential sections.

In the case of local service, it is unlikely that the designers can save enough cents per mile in operating costs by using very long runways of offset the loss of traffic due to inconveniently located airports. In this connection, evidence was submitted at the Civil Aeronautics Board local air-line hearings last fall that while a local air-line transport would have the lowest operating costs possible in the state of the art if it were designed for 5,000-foot runways, the difference between 4,000 and 3,000 feet would add relatively little per mile in operating expenses.

However, the curve of operating costs per mile starts its upward course at a fairly steep angle as runway lengths decline below 3,000 feet. Thus it appears safe to say that airports for local air-line operation need have no more than 3,000-foot runways. They must have clear approaches permitting a 30–1 glide path. They must be drained but not necessarily paved.

We do not yet know the extent to which Congress will appropriate funds to implement the national-airport plan nor the extent, to which States and municipalities will be expected to participate in the expenditures. We do know, however, that without these airports no local air-line system of any size, and no personal plane industry of any size can exist.

I want to take this opportunity, therefore, to point this out and to solicit your cooperation, for your own sakes and the sake of the entire industry. While you are here, go in and see Charlie Donaldson and Bud Bayard, who have spearheaded the working out of this airport plan with the communities and States through our regional and district offices. Then when you get home, go to the C. A. A. regional and district offices and find out from there how you can best cooperate to get the communities and States which you individually serve to proceed with their plans and if necessary alter or expand them so that they will better fit into the service you are proposing.

Another major way on which the Government can assist in the development of local air lines is by the establishment of nonpremium air mail.

The carriage by air of all first-class mail, the delivery of which can be expedited thereby, would probably result in three or more times as much air mail for local air lines as with 6-cent air-mail postage, not to mention 8 cents. The air lines are currently carrying about 15 percent of all first-class nonlocal mail, although (excepting pick-up service) they serve only about 500 cities in the country. If 10 times as many points had pick-up or regular air-mail service and the postage differential was eliminated, there would almost certainly be an over-all increase of mail poundage carried by air to a point where roughly 50 percent of all nonlocal first-class mail would go by air.

The average haul of nonlocal first-class mail is about 500 miles as compared with nearly 1,400 miles for air mail. Obviously, if one-half of nonlocal first-class mail, or about 3 times the present amount, were carried by air the average haul would decline to probably less than 900 miles, while the average haul by surface carriers would decline to about 300 miles.

Giving effect to these two factors, it has been estimated, and I believe on a reasonable basis, that with (a) three times the current poundage of mail carried by air (b) some reduction in the standard three-tenths of a mill per pound mile paid to the tank lines, and (c) an extensive system of local lines being paid 1 mill per pound mile, the profit margin of the Post Office Department on air mail alone would change but little from the 1943 level, and the profit of the Post Office on first-class nonlocal and air mail together would be about equivalent to the record one in 1942 of $137,000,000.

In the years 1935 to 1942 air mail has resulted in deficits to the Post Office Department ranging from $6,000,000 in 1935, up to $9,000,000 in 1940, from which peak they declined to $3,000,000 in 1942. The trend was sharply reversed in 1943 to a profit of some $17,500,000. For the current fiscal year, the profit of the Post Office Department from air mail will probably exceed $30,000,000. Thus, the profit from air mail for the last 2 years after all terminal and distribution expense, applicable railway transportation costs and over-all, will approximately equal the losses of the previous 7 years. It is also significant that the estimated profit for fiscal year 1944 is sufficient to pay 25 cents a mile for 2 round trips per day on 80,000 miles of routes.

As you know, the C. A. B. examiners in their report on local airlines recommended an initial temporary mail rate of 25 cents per plane mile. This recommendation was based on the assumption that with two passengers and some express a line could break even with expenses of 35 cents per plane mile, which in turn coincide with estimates of expenses made by local line applicants at the hearings. In this way an opportunity would be provided to develop mail and express pick-up and passenger traffic to and from a large number of our smaller towns. At the end of, let us say a 3-year period, we would have definite information as to the rate at which passenger traffic was growing and further expansion might then be justified. It is quite conceivable that a local air-line system which could prosper and expand on a 1 mill per pound mile average would be well on the way to development, and advanced types of aircraft meeting the special requirements of local service be available in quantity.

The stakes are high for those who undertake the establishment and operation of local air lines and the responsibility heavy. It is a totally new type of transportation service embracing, as I see it, areas comparable to the 14 aeronautical trade areas of the country, as outlined by Rand McNally, rather than a relatively small retail or wholesale trade area.

If it can be made successful, it will provide tens of thousands of aviation jobs in the local air-line companies themselves, in manufacturing concerns, in the construction of airports, and perhaps most important of all in small sales and service businesses at the airports, once they are constructed. In many cases, local air-line service will be the primary motivating force in getting an airport built, in countless others it will be a contributing cause. In either case, the airports will stimulate or create private as well as local air-line flying and patronage and roll up a demand for more airports and aviation markets of all sorts.

Like every industry in this country that has grown, whether it be transportation, manufacturing, or wholesale and retail distribution, independent initiative and capital with faith in its powers to create a profitable business must be given the chance to develop and expand.

Many of the larger air transport companies have evinced little faith in the local air-line business except as a skip-stop service set up primarily to connect the small city of ten to twenty-five thousand with the big city and with the long-distance trunk air-line service.

This pessimism seems justified only if one assumes that local air lines of the future will be operated according to past trunk-line standards; that is, on personalized luxury basis with 20- to 30-passenger airplanes. It overlooks the fact that the past record on very short distance local services (30 to 100 miles) connecting sizable towns indicates that from 50 to 75 percent of the passengers have been local passengers.

Many air lines claim—and rightly so—that their figures demonstrate that, with marked exceptions, small towns do not use air-line service to any significant degree. It is true that the traffic potentialities of small towns remain to be proven. This is one reason for establishing experimental local service as soon as practicable and giving it a fair opportunity to build up traffic over a period of years.

In many cases the service now rendered to the 100 towns of 25,000 or less on the present trunk-line system consists of a very few stops per day at inconvenient hours. To date and almost inevitably so, small cities and towns have never had a set of air-line schedules designed to meet their particular requirements and no wholehearted attempt to do just that is likely to be made unless there are lines wholely or largely dependent on small-town patronage and operated by people who have enough courage, independence, and faith in the prospects of such service to bet their money and business careers on the outcome.

The years of most rapid growth of the intercity bus business were those during which it was claimed that the private automobile was ruining the railroad passenger business, particularly its short-haul and branch-line business. Actually, the private automobile and bus merely proved that the railroad train was not a unit adaptable to the small town short-haul surface-transport market. It is conceivable that the same may prove to be true of trunk-line type of service and equipment as applied to local needs.

The facts insofar as there are any that bear on the case, and the potentialities of local air-line service all point to independent companies which one would like to think of as the little fellow. As a practical matter, however, if costs are to be reasonably low, each one must be big enough to operate and finance a good many hundreds or even thousands of route miles of operations in order to keep 10 or more planes flying 8 to 10 hours a day on 2 or more round trips. Each operator must be prepared to face several years of tough going while he develops his market and demonstrates to the C. A. B. that the business can be brought to a point where it is practically independent of subsidy. If successful he will probably be required to increase schedules to 5 or more per day depending on the demands of individual routes whenever he begins to show a profit and before he really gets over the hump.

All this appears to suggest an operating organization that might combine the airport, and flight contractor, and pilot and mechanic training operator, and the progressive small town and city investor and banker in the territory.

We must not fail to get such people into local air-line operation and provide them with every opportunity within the power of Government and business to furnish. Such encouragement is essential to the establishment, growth, and prosperity of this new type of transportation service.

Leathem D. Smith in 1932

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, things started to go bad for this country in 1929 to 1932. It is interesting to note just who the people were who knew who and what was responsible for this national catastrophe. There were few leaders in our national picture who had the courage to expose those plotters in those dark days. For that reason I ask unanimous consent to insert an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal which tells of the fight Leathem D. Smith waged to save this country from unscrupulous manipulators:

LEATHEM D. SMITH IN 1932

With picturesque clarity, Leathem D. Smith, of Sturgeon Bay, speaks up for the "little fellow" in business, demanding the closing of the stock market to divert the Nation's credit resources back to the legitimate "little" businesses of the country. The market is primarily a shearing pen for the inside speculators, anyhow, as Mr. Smith sees it.

"The country has been run by the speculators and for the speculators," he says. They "let the little fellows grow a crop of wool—that is the inflation period. Then they drive 'em in and shear 'em down to the skin—that is the depression period. Then they start 'em growing another crop of wool."

It is a picture that will be approved by many a worried American who cannot fathom what has happened to him but who knows that, suddenly, without apparent cause, his income went down, his wages were cut, or he found himself without a job. Why, in a land of plenty, with high-geared factories, hosts of labor, and a Nation-wide desire to buy, should this be so? Why a sudden stoppage of everything when apparently business could be about as good today as it was a few years ago? Why this debacle, when people want as much as they ever did and as willingly would work for it? Why this sudden credit shrinkage when there must be, somewhere in the country, as much money as there ever was, since money doesn't evaporate or disintegrate or vanish into thin air?

Why? asks the average American, and Mr. Smith gives this answer: Because "industries have been bought out and expanded and securities sold simply for the bankers' profit." Because "the bankers held up foreign bonds on the market long enough for them and their friends to unload on the public, and then let them drop." Because this Nation is in the hands of speculators so unscrupulous that "now they are forming a $100,000,000 bond pool as a 'relief measure' to buy distress bonds that they've shaken their customers out of. The only relief that pool will give is to relieve their customers of good bonds at bargain prices."

The whole major financial structure in the United States, as Mr. Smith pictures it, is designed to let men make money out of fictitious values, forcing these values up or down by manipulations and bleeding white the arteries of real industry, which is the industry of the thousands of little fellows who run productive businesses or work in them. So, "close the stock market" demands Mr. Smith, on the theory that by shutting down this arena of schemes and scheming the money and credit of the country would be forced to the factories, warehouses, shops, and stores where men toil honestly and constructively.

Well, as the average American takes stock—realizes that he willingly worked until, suddenly, somebody told him that there was no more work to do; realizes that he was glad to earn and to pay until suddenly there was nothing more to earn and nothing left to pay with; in fact, as this average American dizzily shakes his head, trying to determine from whence came the blow that knocked him dizzy—he will be disposed to agree with Mr. Smith. Somehow, tricky speculation does seem to divert the fruits of American industry into the coffers of a few financiers. Somehow, the stock market, with its intricate systems of manipulation does seem to confuse, baffle, and ultimately mulct the American worker and the American businessman out of much that he toils for.

And the man facing modern realities, like the loss of his home or the problem of a next meal, certainly will be disposed to ask: "Why not close the stock market? What major effect could it have, except to stop the racket of the gamblers and turn the country's attention back to a resumption of constructive work?"

European countries do not hesitate to suspend the operations of their market on far less provocation than America has had. Perhaps it is too late now to close the barn door. Nevertheless, it is inconceivable that we shall come out of this mess without changing the market from a manipulator's heaven to something nearer a bona fide mart to which honest investors can go with their savings.

Reclassification of Veterinarians and Lay Assistants, Bureau of Animal Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the provision of funds for this reclassification of employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry would not constitute a discrimination as compared with the entire body of employees in the Federal service. Neither would such action justify demands for general increases throughout the Government. The estimated salary changes are not based on cost-of-living adjustments or any other wartime price-wage relationships. It is rather a proposal to correct an inequity of long standing by bringing the salaries of this group of employees up to the same level as that of other employees of the Government performing work of comparable responsibility, as recognized by the Classification Act.

Pay increases provided in the form of overtime under the War Overtime Pay Act have not improved the unfavorable salary situation of these employees but have in some respects served to heighten the basic inequity, since the overtime pay is provided for all employees on the basis of a sliding scale according to the original salaries.

Federal meat inspection and animal-disease control, the work of these employees, demands exacting performance of professional skills for long hours under trying and adverse conditions. Whether this work is done well or badly is of the greatest importance to the health and welfare of the people of the United States, for upon the quality of the inspection depends the healthfulness of the meat and dairy products supply of the Nation.

These employees have not and do not now threaten the Congress with desertion of this important work if the reclassification is not approved. They do ask that their loyalty and efficiency in carrying out congressional mandates to protect the health of the people be recognized with just compensation according to the pay scales prescribed under the Classification Act which have already been applied to other employees of the Federal service.

The long-range effect of paying these employees less than the grade to which they are entitled under the Classification Act has been to discourage doctors of veterinary medicine and well-qualified laymen from seeking employment in the Federal service. Unless the meat-inspection and animal-disease-control services are placed in a position to obtain well-qualified personnel as replacements for experienced employees who leave the service by reason of death, retirement, or otherwise, the inevitable result will be an impairment of the efficiency of these vital services.

I urge that the House adopt the motion to recede and concur with the Senate amendments.

A Way To Avoid Bankruptcy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES E. McKENZIE

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I inclose herewith a most excellent editorial from the Ouachita Citizen, West Monroe, La., under date of May 19, 1944:

The subject of the editorial is, or should be, close to the heart of every thinking man and woman in these United States, and I sincerely hope that this Congress and the citizens of this great country will weigh well the words of this outstanding editorial:

THE WAY TO AVOID BANKRUPTCY

More people would take more interest in the problem of the growing Federal debt if they were told frankly that unless the solvency of the Government is maintained, every War bond will be worthless. They should be told frankly that buying bonds will not save the country from bankruptcy. But there is a way to keep out of bankruptcy—by paying taxes and by rigid Government economy. Everyone who owns a War Bond, a life insurance policy, or a dollar of savings has a direct interest in this problem. It is no longer a matter for the other guy to worry about.

It is now estimated that before the present war is over the Federal debt may reach the staggering sum of $300,000,000,000. If this could be divided equally and spread over the entire population, it would mean a debt of about $2,300 for every man, woman, and child in the United States, a debt of about $4,700 for every person gainfully employed, and based on four persons to the family, a debt of $9,200 for each and every family of the United States.

This debt cannot be passed on to the other fellow or evaded. It can be paid by inflating the currency, and that would utterly ruin men and women with fixed incomes, but if the American people value their freedom, they will insist upon meeting the debt squarely—the hard way—by taxation, and frugality in Government.

Induction of Premedical Students for Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the ruling made by General Hershey, of the Selective Service Office, which denies deferment from induction into the Army of premedical students will have a far-reaching effect upon the health of the country. His order will place practically all premedical students in the Army as of July 1, 1944. The only individuals left in premedical training will be IV–F's, women, or individuals who are not now citizens of the United States.

Recognizing the seriousness of the problem, I have appealed several times to General Hershey for a modification of his ruling. To date there has been no change.

If no premedical students are permitted to remain in school, it will mean that no physicians will be graduating in the classes 5 or 6 years hence. It would seem imperative, Mr. Speaker, that the country ought to take steps to safeguard the future health of its citizens. If no students are permitted to take medical training, it will seriously cripple the vital affairs of science and imperil the health of our citizens. It is quite possible for another epidemic of influenza to appear which would kill and maim more people than is being killed or disabled in the many war zones in which we are now engaged.

There are some 4,000 physicians in the United States who die each year. There are about 6,000 premedical students who enter school. Does it not seem that these 6,000 students, as long as they meet the requirements of their several colleges, would be of more service to their country as trained medical men than serving in some branch of the military service?

It suggests a very serious problem. I am, therefore, inserting into the RECORD a letter which I sent to the President of the United States and Gen. Lewis B. Hershey in which I point out the threatened dangers to the health of our citizens by depriving them of needed medical care because these medical men of the future are now being inducted into the military forces:

JUNE 16, 1944.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR PRESIDENT: I hesitate to bring before your busy office a problem which should be solved by the Director of Selective Service, Gen. Lewis B. Hershey. I refer to General Hershey's order of April 11 which, in effect, will induct practically all premedical students into the Army by July 1.

I have had several conversations with General Hershey and his staff and it does not seem likely that they are willing to accept the responsibility and order a temporary deferment of men of military age who are now in our colleges as premedical students.

As a physician and surgeon of 25 years' experience, it is my considered judgment that men now in medical school should be deferred as long as they pass the required grades in college in order that the needs of society in the years to come will be fully met. If no premedical students stay in school it might have a serious effect upon the health of this country because of the lack of students graduating 4 or 5 years hence. The Army now has absorbed a large number of physicians to the extent that should an epidemic occur it might mean that lives would be lost because there would be a shortage of physicians. There are some 4,000 physicians who die each year in the United States.

It seems imperative, Mr. President, that the country take steps to safeguard its future. If the present rule of inducting premedical students stands we will be in imminent danger of undermining the health of this country.

Other countries, including Russia, England, and Canada, have recognized the problem and are keeping these premedical students in school. There are only about 6,000 premedical students. Surely they would be of more service to the country as trained medical men than serving in the Infantry or some other branch of the military. If they are taken from school it may well cripple the vital affairs of science and the country would lose their medical service. It certainly would not guarantee a safe future for science and for the citizens of the country.

Under the present ruling the draft boards are not permitted to consider a premedical student as exempt from military service.

I am appealing to you and to General Hershey because I feel it is imperative that we not make the blunder of permitting such a drastic regulation to continue in force and thus deprive this country of adequate medical care in the future.

Respectfully yours,

A. L. MILLER,
Member of Congress,
Fourth District, Nebraska.

A Memorial We Must Build

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by James Morgan, from the Boston Sunday Globe of May 28, 1944:

A MEMORIAL WE MUST BUILD—IT MUST BE A COUNTRY WITH A PLACE IN IT FOR THE UNWANTED YOUTH BEFORE THE WAR AND SUCH A PEACE AS THEY WILL BE PROUD TO HAVE WON

(By James Morgan)

On this Memorial Sunday we could not do better than recall to our thoughts the noblest of memorial addresses, delivered by Lincoln over the yet newly made graves at Gettysburg. He dismissed the suggestion that he and those gathered with him were endued with the power to hallow a ground already consecrated by those who had poured out upon it the last full measure of devotion. Rather, he dedicated the living to the great task remaining to be done, with the high resolve that "these dead shall not have died in vain."

That is the least and the most we can do in this memorial season for the thousands of Americans who have fallen in another war which is testing the endurance of a nation "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal," under a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people." Many of them lie in the seas and in far fields of white crosses, where their graves may not be decked with flowers by loving hands. They will not fail of remembrance in the bruised hearts of those dearest to them and in the sorrowful pride of their friends, their communities, and their comrades. It is for us all, for this whole country to strive to achieve and establish a peace that shall be worthy of the sacrifice we required of them and of the still heavier sacrifices we are about to ask of others whose numbers we dread to guess.

WHAT ONE FRONT SHOULD KNOW ABOUT OTHER

A rising tide is reported of dissatisfaction at the front with us at home. It is a pity if the men who are bearing for us the burden of battle should have to bear also the bitter suspicion that we at home are careless and forgetful of them. That their country is not ungrateful to them they would know if they could but search our hearts. Pains should be taken to make and keep them aware that never for a waking moment are they out of our minds. We are prouder and more confident of them than this people ever have been of any Army and Navy in our history. Nor have the American people ever been so united as they are behind them today.

In the inexperience of youth, the G. I. cannot suspect how distance distorts the view. Anyone who has traveled much in foreign lands can understand what a weird perspective the overseas servicemen get of their homeland.

I recall a visit to Europe while Dillinger was on the rampage over here. An innocent abroad would have got the impression from the cabled news that nothing else was happening in the United States and that all its millions of people were being held up by that lone gunman.

As it was in those lurid days of Dillinger, before he was trapped and shot in an alley like a rat, the G. I. should know that there has been something else going on at home besides strikes and profiteering and bootlegging in a new criminal underworld which the black market and its customers are breeding. A shabby fringe of chiselers, backbiters, and idlers, we have always with us, as the services also have their due share of shirkers and gloomy malcontents, despite martial discipline.

Nevertheless, the home folks are supporting the largest armed force ever martialed under the American flag, twice and a half larger than in the other World War. They have equipped, clothed, and fed it better than any other military establishment, and better cared for the health and diversion of its personnel. In consequence, their pay envelopes are carrying the heaviest load of taxation ever levied by Uncle Sam. They are doing eagerly everything asked of them, from donating their blood to oversubscribing bond issues and quotas for the upkeep of the Red Cross and the U. S. O. Men and women by the millions are giving their time to the volunteer, unpaid civilian services.

WHERE WE ARE FAILING THE FRONT

The country has not failed the servicemen in any material way. They have been trained to fight as no American troops ever were in the past. But we are hearing that they have not been told what they are to fight for. Insofar as that is true, they have been left at a cruel disadvantage in a combat with foes indoctrinated with a fanatical faith in their cause.

The great authorities on the subject agree that the moral element in war is three times more important than the physical. This expert testimony happens to corroborate Shakespeare's estimate that "thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just."

The efficient Army Medical Department is testifying to the same effect.

The psychiatrists have given the scientific name of "battle neurosis" to what was called cannon fever in days of old and shell shock in World War No. 1. They diagnose the ailment as a conflict within the soldier between his sense of duty and his normal instinct of self-preservation. This conflict, the doctors report, can be eliminated by instilling in the patient a knowledge of the cause he is asked to fight for and perchance die for.

We have trained the arms and hands and legs of the serviceman, but not his spirit. That instruction was omitted, it seems, out of fear of criticism for introducing controversial subjects into the training. This is a plain case of political or ballot neurosis, and the psychiatrists should prescribe a cure for such a lack of nerve among the higher-ups.

A PSYCHOLOGICAL CHASM

If those in authority are leaving our fighting men in ignorance of why they fight, it is all the more incumbent on the home front to demand that the victory they win shall bear fruits that will justify the war to them. We must not forget the psychological chasm that already divided the younger and older generations before this global war placed oceans between them. The servicemen grew up in the era of the great disillusionment after the other war and of the great depression that next smote them.

Really, this is another 30-year war for those whose only experience with life has been since 1914. Hard bitten by an economic system or economic chaos where youth has been unwanted except to fight unwanted youths of other lands, they accept few of the premises and slogans of those of us who looked upon the cardboard world at the end of the nineteenth century, saw that it was good, and thought the job was all finished. What is sentiment to the old is spurned as sentimentality by the young. These also have their brands of "bunk" and "hokum" to be sure, but they want to roll their own baloney, and they will have none that is handed out to them.

TWO GENERATIONS TO BE RECONCILED

The reconciliation of these generations is the most urgent and the most delicate of the problems that beset us. Shut up 10,000,000 young Americans in the regimentation of military discipline, to say nothing of plunging them into the savagery of battle, and it must affect their thinking and feeling ever afterward. Some of them have been overseas 2 years and more, and long are the years of youth when the boy goes to bed at night and wakes up in the morning a man. Distance and time and the problem of shipping have made furloughs difficult for them. Home recedes to a dim, far-off place.

An American flyer in England has been confessing that he has a kind of dread of coming home, and he explained, "I feel different inside. I suppose I've grown up rather suddenly. I've known fear. I've felt flak and panic. It does something to you. Back home, thank God, they've not been touched by war. But it worries me that they will be unchanged, and that I am not the same person—how could I be? They won't be expecting the difference and they may not understand."

There we have a pathetic gulf, and we must do our best to throw a bridge of understanding across it. It was by exploiting just such a division in their countries after the other war that enabled Mussolini and Hitler to rise to their evil power. That must not happen here, but it might unless we take care to prevent it.

With the cooperation of the censors we can combat the further estrangement of the two fronts in the war. Meanwhile we should be setting our house in order that those who are spared to return shall not meet us or we them as strangers. The best welcome we can plan for them is not a noisy hour of bands and banners. What these toughened realists will want to find is a country with a place in it for them and a peace that they can be proud to have won. That would tell them at least what the war was about and somewhat justify to them what they shall have endured and dared. It is the only adequate memorial we can build for the unreturning who shall have died that their comrades might come home.

The Electoral College Plot

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me, I include an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 14, 1944, suggesting an amendment to the Constitution relative to the electoral college. It follows:

THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE PLOT

Because Americans have failed to insist that one section of their Constitution be revised to keep up with the actual procedure in the Government's functioning, they are now faced with the threat of a scheme to defeat the popular will in the coming Presidential election.

This scheme grows out of that anachronism of American government, the electoral college, set up by the founding fathers for election of the President, but long ago reduced to uselessness.

Since, technically speaking, it is not the voters but the chosen electors who select the President, fourth-term opponents in several Southern States, notably Texas, have worked out a devious plot.

If the platform adopted by the Democratic National Convention does not contain certain planks demanded by these politicians, or if the nominations for President and Vice President do not suit them, the electors are to vote for some other person than the convention nominee, and thus disregard the mandate of of the people. Under the Constitution, there is no device, save their own sense of honor, to prevent such a course by the electors.

The possibility of such a weird happening comes about as follows:

The framers of the Constitution decided against direct election of the President by the people. Communities were isolated in those days, communication was slow, and it was feared the citizens could not become sufficiently informed on the candidates to vote intelligently.

Hence arose the ingenious plan for indirect election, "by judicious persons, specially chosen by the people for that purpose," as James Bryce explained it. Outstanding men were to be chosen as electors in each State. They were then to meet and, from the fullness of their knowledge, agree upon a President. It was provided that each State have a number of electors corresponding to the total of its congressional delegation.

The plan never was really used. In the first two elections, Washington was the unanimous choice. By the third election, party lines had developed, and the voters were thinking of the leading candidates, John Adams and Thomas Jefferson, not of the electors.

In most States the names of electors were long ago dropped from the ballot for the sake of simplification, though they still function in an obscure and purely ceremonial way. There is no longer any need whatever for the device, since the public now is fully enlightened about candidates and issues. Election of the President by State units is, of course, still a feasible plan. The provision for electoral votes as a handy means of tabulation might have been kept, while eliminating the electoral college rigamarole.

Yet, because this deadwood was never removed from the Constitution, a thoroughly unscrupulous scheme can be concocted for misrepresenting the people and causing strife in a wartime election.

Southern politicians have the privilege of opposing a fourth term if they wish to do so, or of repudiating the choice of the party convention. The legitimate way to do this is to form their own party, as the Theodore Roosevelt faction of the Republican Party did in 1912, not to depend on such a shyster conspiracy as this.

It is inconceivable that the plan can succeed. Citizens of Southern States will surely demand that their votes be counted as they cast them. And even shady politicians should find it difficult to find men to run as electors for the avowed purpose of misusing the election machinery.

Now that this peculiarity of our system has been fully brought to light, there should be no delay in starting the process of bringing the Constitution into accordance with usage.

What Is This Free Enterprise?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER C. PLOESER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, I have heard and read much on the subject of free enterprise, and I am a firm believer in the American competitive free enterprise system.

Probably one of the most human and clear articles written on the subject was published by the State Labor News, of Columbus, Ohio. This is a well-known labor paper and it gives the workingman's viewpoint. The article follows:

WHAT IS THIS FREE ENTERPRISE?

Joe Jones is my name, and I've got a question.

It's about this thing you call "free enterprise."

I go home at night and read my paper—much closer than you think. The editorials drone, "free enterprise." Some politician speaks and the headlines thunder out, "Free Enterprise." Big, full-page advertisements (nice pictures and words like honey): They're singing, too, about free enterprise.

I know you want it, boss. I know all industry wants it. The drums are beating and I don't have to put my ear to the ground to know the powers are rallying for a fight—for this thing called free enterprise.

I went to my union meeting just the other day and the big shot leader talked free enterprise. He was for it, too.

Then I wondered.

Industry wants free enterprise. My boss wants it. And the politicians who want high office.

But so does my union leader.

Maybe I do, too, but I want to ask my question, first.

The music's all the same; the harmony's swell. But how about the words?

My boss, my union leader—are they all singing the same song?

Or does the music drown out the words they sing?

That's all I want to know. I'm not suspicious, you understand. I just want to know some things, that's all.

It seems like yesterday that I went down the street and asked for work. "I need so much," I said. "I've got three kids and I can't live on less."

Industry laughed then, and said a thousand other guys named Jones would work for half of that, and twice as long. My friend, Bill Smith, could work for half of what I asked. He had no kids, and he could take the job. And so he underbid me.

We bid our labor, and Bill won out, but we knew we both were losers in the end.

Is this free enterprise?

The 30-cent wage, the 10- or 12-hour day? That wasn't long ago, you know.

If this is what it means, boss, then I'm against it.

I remember when first I joined my union. It was near treason then. My boss, he didn't like the unions, and he told me so.

There were labor spies beside my bench, and men were fired for saying what they thought. We met in secret. There was talk of union agitators and stories in the papers. Some men were beaten and some were driven from the town. There were alley fights and sluggings.

There wasn't any bargaining, men to men. The blackjack was the answer to a union from some industry.

And when we struck, we fought a civil war. There wasn't any peaceful picketing. There wasn't any management offers.

But there were strikebreakers by the carload, and sheriff's men with little, sawed-off guns. There was the militia at the factory gate, and machine guns on the roof.

This was free enterprise of a sort for certain kinds of industry, too.

But is this the kind you want? If it is, then count me out.

How about the blacklist? It branded union labor with a secret mark of Cain. Do you want it back?

How about the crooked piece-work systems and the speed-up it forced upon us? And the phony prices at the company stores?

How about monopolies which drove the worker's dollar down? How about the trusts and those bigger things they call cartels? You don't call those free enterprise, do you, boss?

There were many other things: The child workers, long hours for women, unhealthful shop conditions, a carelessness for workers' lives. * * *

This was freedom for enterprise, I guess, but for none other.

If this is industry's song, then I won't sing. Just dock my check, boss, and count me as an absentee.

What's that, boss? You say I'm off the beam? You say that you want none of that?

All right, then, tell me what you want. Tell me about your free enterprise.

Free enterprise, you say, is not against our humane labor laws; my right to organize; my right to bargain for my wage; my right to strike; my rights to hold by labor faith.

You say it stands against a bureaucratic theft of Congress power; against those who dream to fix your prices, profits, and my wage; against a govern ent where pressure yields the greatest good; against a loss of our democracy; against a power which would destroy us both.

It sounds good boss—tell me more.

Free enterprise, you say, wants no monopolies to fix an artificial price; to squeeze out the weaker plant; to conspire in restraint of trade; to enter into wage pacts; to use its greater strength to crush my union.

You say it wants only free and open competition for all business; that it believes monopoly is the death of competition; that it asks freedom only to open new markets, create new products, produce its goods in uncurbed volume and let the people fix its worth.

Well that's reasonable and I'll back you up.

Free enterprise, you say, wants lower taxes on its profits—but not for dividends, alone, not for the chairman of the board and 10 vice presidents. Nor does it want to shift the tax upon the worker, but to cut the spending.

You say that taxes must not bleed away all profits; you talk of "seed money" and you say that industry is like the farmer who must save seed to grow another crop—who must have a crop to give a harvest hand a job.

I can't deny it, boss, let's shake on that.

Free enterprise, you say, must have the "profit motive"; but does not seek to cut the worker's wage; it knows the workers must consume the goods they make; it knows there never was prosperity without high wage.

You say in profit lies our hope for progress, that chance for fair profit is all that brings investment into industry. Let's not divide the jobs, you say—let's multiply the jobs and thus make work for all. You want profit for your new machines, for your vital research, for new products. Better tools, you say, will lighten labor, will do more work in half the time, will leave more leisure for the worker—he'll have more time for better living, more time for education, more time to be a better citizen.

Profits? If profits do that for me, I'll help you make 'em, boss.

Free enterprise, you say, wants no high prices. It wants no long hours and tired workmen to run its cost list up. It doesn't want to ask, "What will the traffic bear?"

You say free enterprise thinks the lower price is best; that the faster it can make, distribute, and deliver goods to me, the lower price that I must pay. You say that then I'll have some money left for other things—and better living. You say that lower costs mean higher wages, incentives for invention and for leadership, inducement for more capital to start the cycle over again.

Then go ahead—I'm for it.

Free enterprise, you say, does not want the bureaucrat as his sole planner; it has no faith in public works and public spending; it wants no post-war W. P. A.; that milk delivered free to every Hottentot will bring no progress to the world.

You say it does want planning of another sort; plans for permanency by private capital and not by Government loans with money taken from the people; plans for jobs at honest pay and not a Government subsistence dole; plans to teach the Hottentot that by initiative and by enterprise he'll get his milk and progress, too.

So that's free enterprise.

Well, Boss, my question's answered—I guess we're not so far apart.

I want to call no bureaucrat my boss. I'll fight for your free competition; it sounds American to me. Your seed money is a fair request—I'll help you get it. I'll help you with your profit motive; if it means a better living. And, like you, I want my destiny planned by my own hands.

We know America got its freedom by placing Government in its peoples' hands. And together we can keep our freedom in our hands—the hands of those who work and those who want work done.

So call me if you need me, Boss. Just call Joe Jones.

Beaverhead County, Mont.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the House the sound thinking and forward looking plans of one of the counties in the district I have the honor to represent.

While we are talking back here the people of Beaverhead County are planning and acting. All groups in the county have worked together to bring into existence a post-war plan which will assure the returning veterans and war workers that when this war is over and they come back to the Beaverhead that there will be work and jobs for them.

I commend the following editorial and news story concerning this activity to you for your most earnest consideration. They are taken from the Great Falls (Mont.) Tribune of May 22, 1944:

BEAVERHEAD READY

In an interview with O. A. Bergeson, of Dillon, the Tribune learned Saturday that Beaverhead County is doing some practical, realistic post-war planning. They have more than a list of things they would like. They have made a survey of improvements actually planned and financed, both public and private, which will be started as soon as the men begin to come home from the war asking for jobs. Their plans are analyzed as to cost and the man-hours of work that they will furnish. The size of the employment problem has been set against the work available and the businessmen and ranchers there are confident that they will take care of their own people with the 2-year program they have worked out in detail. And there will be no leaf-raking expenditures in doing so. That is the kind of planning more counties in Montana should be getting under way right now.

BEAVERHEAD'S POST-WAR PLAN MOST DETAILED—RANCHERS, BUSINESSMEN JOIN IN SURVEY OF COMMUNITY NEEDS

Beaverhead County has submitted one of the most detailed post-war planning reports yet compiled in the State to Montanans, Inc., O. A. Bergeson, of Dillon said while here Friday and Saturday attending the air clinic sessions. Bergeson, who is chairman of the State welfare commission, headed the Beaverhead subcommittee on public works planning.

Ranchers and businessmen, Bergeson explained, joined in forming committees which studied in detail the post-war business and agricultural situation in Beaverhead. Lists were compiled of private plans for new buildings, improvements and purchases of durable goods, with careful estimates of the employment that would result, the probable expenditures and the bank financing needed. The bankers of the county assured the availability of funds for that purpose. The number of men who had left the county and of those who will probably return, were carefully estimated and a clear picture was obtained of the jobs needed outside of private employment already assured.

Actual local public works needs were surveyed for a 2-year period. County and city plans actually in the blueprint stage now and for which funds are available immediately when the war ends were listed and broken down into probable costs and man-hours of labor required. Other public works for which detailed engineering and financing plans are not completed, but for which the local authorities are getting ready, were also broken down into costs and man-hours of employment they would furnish.

The county, city, and school authorities would be ready tomorrow to start work on this 2-year improvement program if the war should end so suddenly, Bergeson said.

Other subcommittees are in touch with the State and Federal authorities, getting definite information on new road, water conservation, and reclamation projects that will be allocated to the county in the near future. These have also been analyzed as to the employment they will furnish and the portion of cost allotted to the local people. They believe, Bergeson explained, that they are down to brass tacks in their plans in Beaverhead County and can assure the people, whom war service or employment have taken from there temporarily, that there will be work and jobs for them when they return.

He's My Dad—And I Love Him

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by Dorothy Gilligan Bennett, from the Washington Post of June 17, 1944:

HE'S MY DAD—AND I LOVE HIM

He's happy or friendly, serious or gay,
A splendid companion on bright days and gray.
He's my dad—and I love him.

I'm his child, and I know he understands me well,
My dreams, my heartaches, my zeal to excel.
He's my dad—and I love him.

He knows my failings, my every temptation,
He counsels me, guides me without condemnation.
He's my dad—and I love him.

He's patient, long-suffering, discerning, and wise,
He fathoms my faults with soul-searching eyes.
He's my dad—and I love him.

He's deep and he's thoughtful, he's earnest and kind,
He feels a real kinship with all mankind.
He's my dad—and I love him.

He's sometimes discouraged, and he gets angry, too;
Oh, he has his faults, as all of us do—but
He's my dad—and I love him.

When he knows disappointment or worry or care,
I want to be with him, his troubles to share.
He's my dad—and I love him.

He's a Christian—the dynamic, practical way;
He tells me of God, he helps me to pray.
He's my dad—and I love him.

He's a real man, a good man, he's genuine and fine,
He's tops as a father, I'm proud that he's mine.
He's my dad—and I love him.

An Invasion at Home

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, on June 5, 1944, the United States Supreme Court handed down a decision which upset a 75-year precedent. The question involved was the right of Federal authorities to prosecute insurance companies for alleged violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act. It is of considerable significance, Mr. Speaker, that the decision was actually entered by a minority of the court. The Congress is now faced with an absolute mandate to correct this situation. For many, many years the States have exercised the right to legislate in matters pertaining to insurance companies and they have established workable rules and regulations governing them. If this decision is permitted to go unchallenged it will mean the start of another regulatory body under Federal contact—just another bureaucratic agency.

Mr. Speaker, Raymond Moley, in Newsweek for June 19, has hit the nail on the head in discussing this subject, and under unanimous consent I insert it in the Appendix of the RECORD:

AN INVASION AT HOME

(By Raymond Moley)

Feebly competing for attention with the tremendous news of the invasion was the account of a Supreme Court decision which, in peacetime, would claim first place. This decision, handed down June 5, involved an invasion of the right of the States to regulate insurance. It affects every American who is protected by any kind of insurance.

In 1869, in the famous case of Paul v. Virginia, the Supreme Court declared that the insurance business was not interstate commerce. Hence, it was subject to regulation by State law, not by Congress. A long train of decisions since has reenforced that position. Meanwhile, the States have slowly and effectively built up an enormous number of laws and regulations to protect holders of insurance policies. All this State machinery is endangered by the new Supreme Court decision.

The facts of the particular case are of small importance compared with the constitutional issue involved. They concern the Federal indictment at Atlanta, 2 years ago, of some 200 fire-insurance companies and individuals for a violation of the Sherman Act. The violation charged was an agreement on rates which, the defendants claimed, was directed by the insurance officials of the State governments. Such agreements under State direction are common and essential to the orderly conduct of the business.

The nature of the arguments as well as the circumstances in the case make it clear that certain New Deal lawyers, who tried futilely 5 years ago to make a case for Federal regulation in the T. N. E. C. investigation and who had no chance to get such regulation through Congress, decided to accomplish their purpose through the Department of Justice and the Supreme Court.

The majority decision was written by Justice Black, the dissent by Justice Stone. Justices Douglas, Murphy, and Rutledge agreed with Black. Justices Frankfurter and Jackson agreed with Stone. Justices Roberts and Reed took no part in the case. It might be remarked that the Justices with the most extensive legal experience in private practice are Roberts, Reed, Stone, and Jackson—all of whom either dissented or declined to participate in the case.

The precedents of 75 years were thus overturned by a minority of the Court—by judges whose experience in the practice of law before their appointment to the Nation's highest Court was exceedingly brief.

This case strongly illustrates how the Court can step, outside the law, into matters of public policy. In Black's opinion, he indicates that the States are not fully capable of governing insurance. In what way can a judge of the Court, on the basis of a single case, thus pass judgment on the effectiveness of the insurance laws and departments of 48 States? In the T. N. E. C. investigation, New Dealers tried, and utterly failed, for more than a year to prove that life insurance was not adequately regulated. The vast preponderance of evidence is that the States have fully protected policyholders. Millions of policyholders know that. Justice Black's statement is not an expression of law; it is an attempt to impose his own private and unsupported view of fact. This is not the exercise of judicial power; it is legislation by the judicial branch.

This decision breaks not only the 75-year insurance precedent, but a vastly more important one, which goes back 155 years to the foundation of the Republic. In all that time, no decision prior to this one has ever been made by a minority of the Court on a constitutional issue involving the overruling of a previous decision. During his tenure Chief Justice Marshall repeatedly refused to take up constitutional cases in the absence of a full Court.

The remedy for the new Supreme Court decision lies with Congress. A bill sponsored by Senator BAILEY is before it, which declares that insurance is a matter for State regulation, that there is no need for the displacement or encumbrance of the State laws by a Federal bureau or otherwise, that insurance is not interstate commerce and, so, as a result, is not subject to the Federal antitrust laws. This bill would reverse the decision. It should be passed.

In the old days the Court protected the States from Congress. Now, apparently Congress must protect the States against the Court.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, on June 29, 1939, I appointed a young man by the name of Maurice Martin, from my home city of Bluefield, W. Va., to the United States Military Academy at West Point. He entered the academy in the month following his appointment, was graduated in due course, and is now with our fighting forces overseas.

Within the past week, and for the first time since his graduation and entry into active service, I heard from Maurice Martin. There was no message direct from him, but my news came from a mutual friend who forwarded to me a clipping of an Associated Press release published early in the week in the Roanoke (Va.) Times. This item tells its own story of the daring, resourcefulness, and effective efforts of two typical American flyers, one of whom, I am proud to say, is a native son of West Virginia. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the news item from the Roanoke Times:

BLUEFIELD PILOT AND WING MATE KILL 200 NAZIS

Lt. Maurice Martin, 908 Highland Avenue, Bluefield, was one of two Thunderbolt pilots to trap a German column on a road south of Bayeux with well-placed bombs, according to an Associated Press release yesterday.

The other pilot was Lt. E. W. Sanders, 1034 North Shepherd Drive, Houston, Tex., and the two pilots estimated they killed about 200 of the Nazis in strafing attacks.

They dropped two 500-pound bombs in front of the column and then two in the rear, trapping the soldiers between two big craters.

"They tried to run for it, but couldn't get out," said Sanders. "We flew up and down over them, strafing with our machine guns. Very few got out alive."

Other pilots reported the Germans were using horse-drawn artillery.

Lieutenant Martin is the son of Mrs. Roger Martin, Highland Avenue, and the late Roger Martin, whose death occurred a few weeks ago. His father was formerly connected with the coal business, and Lieutenant Martin is well known in and around Bluefield.

Postal Employees Buy Bonds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, feeling that it was an outstanding achievement, I am calling attention to the fact that the employees of the St. Louis post office, whose quota in the present bond drive was $170,000, purchased $204,000 of these bonds. The quota was oversubscribed on D-day. As a result of this achievement, the Postmaster General wrote the acting postmaster in St. Louis the following letter, which I am including as part of my remarks under the permission granted me:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 13, 1944.

Hon. BERNARD F. DICKMANN,
Acting Postmaster, St. Louis, Mo.

MY DEAR MR. DICKMANN: The remarkable record of the St. Louis post office in exceeding its quota before the fifth war loan was well started calls for my heartiest congratulations to you and all of your supervisors and employees. St. Louis was the first large office to report raising its quota in the fourth drive. Then about a month was required to reach the goal. In the fifth drive a week sufficed. I am certain that other comparable offices will find that record hard to beat. It indicates an alert, enthusiastically patriotic organization. The entire Postal Service had an opportunity to read of this accomplishment in the Postal Bulletin of June 9 and beyond a doubt share our pride in this outstanding demonstration of a desire on the part of your employees to back the attack.

With best wishes to you and the entire personnel of your office,

Sincerely yours,

FRANK C. WALKER,
Postmaster General.

Bradley Taylor Explains in Detail the Whole WASP Situation—Says W. T. S. Men Got Raw Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter I have received from Bradley R. Taylor, vice chairman, Department of Wisconsin Legion Aviation Committee, which reads as follows:

RHINELANDER, WIS., June 13, 1944.

Hon. JAMES MORRISON,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The Appendix of the RECORD, on page A2937, carries the extension of remarks by the Honorable JOHN COSTELLO, of California, on H. R. 4219—a bill to commission women fliers—a group of women called WASPS.

As you know, for the past 2 years I have made a very thorough study of this problem of civilian pilot training, and War Training Service, a program designed by the Army and the C. A. A. to train men fliers for the armed forces. As the Congressman's discussion of the WASPS also carries a discussion of these men, I feel that I should point out some of the errors in his statements. I do not believe that Congressman COSTELLO has been informed by those who asked him to sponsor the bill.

As you will recall, on or about May 10 of 1943, a bill was passed under Public No. 50 for the payment of men in C. P. T. at the rate of $50 per month. This was called by the men the "McCarran pay bill." A special report went with this bill, this report is Seventy-eighth Congress, first session, Senate, Calendar No. 317, Report No. 311, to accompany H. R. 2397. This report states that "The committee was not willing to continue such a procedure (paying men on inactive reserve) throughout another fiscal year, and had numerous conferences with the military authorities and with the officials of the C. A. A. in an effort to reach a solution."

The solution, the report goes on to state, would leave funds enough to graduate some 7,200 pilots. The report continues, "That all of these men be brought into the Army by September 1, 1943, so provision is made that after September 1, 1943, no reservist on inactive status will be paid."

The report goes on to say that "The committee requests that the Secretary of Commerce make a report to the chairman of the Senate and House Committees on Appropriations, respectively, not later than October 1, 1943, the number of enlisted reservists called to active duty."

By October 1, 1943, some 5,000 former C. P. T. men had been called to active duty. These men were called to various induction centers, they were activated and they were given basic training, their I. Q. was taken, and records from various induction centers show that these men had the highest I. Q. of any group passing through the induction centers.

Congressman COSTELLO would like those who are interested to believe that when these men of C. P. T. went through the induction centers that they were not given a physical examination. If this be true, then the Army, in its induction centers was more than derelict in its duty. On the other hand, we are more than glad to state, every man who went through the induction centers was given an Army examination by Army doctors, and those of the 4,687 men that the Congressman talked about were then certified to noncombat flying programs. The examining boards found some 4,687 men fit for the programs of flying in which they had enlisted and for which training they had been called to active service, by Public, No. 50, passed by the Senate and the House and approved by the President.

Now Congressman COSTELLO would like the public to believe that the first medical examination these men had was after January 14, 1944—or at the time the training program was discontinued.

Either the Army Air Forces have not told the truth to Congressman COSTELLO or he is not familiar with the program. I have a copy of the medical break-down of the men who were examined after January 15, 1944. This report comes from Fort Worth, Tex., and it shows that a number of men were disqualified for flying because of flat feet. These men must have had the flat feet at the time they were examined by Army doctors prior to October 1, 1943. The report shows that men were thrown out of these flying programs because they were too tall or too short. The report shows that some men were over or underweight—these conditions must have been apparent at the time the Army doctors examined the men as of October 1, 1943.

Every man that the Congressman talks about in the group of 4,687 had also been given a medical examination by duly certified doctors of the C. A. A. If they could not have passed this examination by C. A. A. they could not have gotten into the program in the first place. Each individual man that the Congressman talks about had more physical examinations, by Government doctors than the average soldier would get in 3 years. These men got all of their examinations in a period of less than a year.

If this is not true and the Army took some 4,687 men into the Army and through regular induction centers at which basic training was given—then the men in charge of the induction centers should be relieved of their positions for taking a chance of loading the pension rolls with some 4,687 men who were not properly examined.

The public knows too well that this is not the case—the Army knows that they are not taking in any men without a physical—Congressman COSTELLO should know this—unless the Army has kidded him. We cannot believe with him that the men had no physical examinations from October 1, 1943, until after January 14 of 1944—a period of 3½ months.

These men were not called to active duty on January 14, 1944, as the Congressman states—they were called to duty on or before October 1, 1943, as a direct demand from the Congress of the United States, of which the Congressman is a Member. He must have voted for this, as did others, or the men of C. P. T. would not have been paid nor would this problem have come up.

I want to repeat again that the records of the various induction centers will show that the mental examinations of this group showed them to have the highest I. Q. of any group passing through any of the induction centers.

It is more than clear to me who prepared the material that the Congressman put into the RECORD on the date of June 10, 1944, page A2937. During the past year and more so in the past few months I have attended some hearings on the problem of these stranded fliers. Each time the Army Air Forces have the same story—the Air Force story is the story that the Congressman tells you in his defense of his program of the WASPS.

For example he tells you of the Chinese interpreter—I have heard this story a dozen times, given by the Army in testimony. The truth of it is that this man was a former employee of the Chinese Embassy—he earned $12,000 a year—he had had private flying experience—he wanted to do his part—he got into C. P. T.—where he thought that his experience in flying would be of help to the war effort—he was promised a chance at a commission—he never got the chance for when the program of W. T. S. broke up he was assigned as a Chinese interpreter. The man is now a private in the Army in Florida. He is 36 years old and too old for overseas service, yet the man was a volunteer and his enlistment was for flying, not Chinese interpreter.

Records also show what happened to some of the instructors who were released at the time the program of W. T. S. was discontinued. One contractor—who had run and owned a contract-flying school—took the Army at its word; they needed men for the A. T. C. This man and 44 others were sent to Memphis, Tenn., for training in the transport section. They were sent in early February to this station. Now it is found out that after 4 months at this station these men have had 4 hours of ground school, not a single hour of flying, and their pay has been $300 per month. For what? For doing nothing. Now these men are to be rescreened to see if they are fit for the transport section.

Any member of the trainee group could have picked the misinformation that the Congressman has given out. In fact the Congressman should have had the C. A. A. go over his report before presenting it, for any informed person would have told him of the untruths that the Army, in preparing his statement, have used. It is impossible for any person who has not followed this program to know all of the facts, but what I have stated is a matter of public record and can be proved without trouble. I might also call to the attention of any one who wants to know all of the real facts and history of this problem to consult hearings on House Joint Resolution 115, Public Record No. 85548, dated Monday April 10, 1943, or Report No. 311, Calendar No. 317, of June 14 (legislative day, May 24, 1943).

I agree with the Congressman that we should not "force" the Army to do anything, but we should "force" the Army to take care of its promises. Why is it that the Navy has had no trouble with the same program? The reason is that the Navy has kept its word to every man that they enlisted. The mistake was made in Public, No. 50, in forcing the Army, by legislation, to take these 4,687 men. The Army knew at that time that it would find some way to get rid of them. The Army has found this way. They found it on January 14, 1944, when they discontinued the program and forced these patriotic men into work that they had not enlisted for, work for which they were not trained, and work which they do not want.

In talking with these trainees and with the instructors, I do not find any great objection to training the women—but only when and after the men have been used and used in the capacity for which they were trained.

Congressman MORRISON, I want you to know that I have no quarrel with Mr. COSTELLO, but it does seem to me that an article that enters into the lives of some 10,000 trainees and instructors should be verified before it is published. Congressman COSTELLO should take the Army Air Forces to task for "ghosting" such an article that is filled with so many untruths. Any member of the groups that are under discussion could have pointed out the errors to him; it is unfortunate that those who wrote the article for him should "kid" the Congressman who is sponsoring legislation for them.

I trust that you will be able to put this into the RECORD so that those who know the problems and the truth of the programs may have some defense.

Sincerely yours,

BRADLEY R. TAYLOR,
Polar Bear Association.

Overtime Pay for White-Collar Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. CLASON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, in this morning's edition of the Washington Post for June 17, 1944, it is reported that—

President Roosevelt has described as fundamentally sound a recommendation that white-collar Federal employees be paid true time and a half for overtime work. His views were expressed in a letter to the National Federation of Federal Employees which was released yesterday by the white-collar union. These people now get 21.6 percent additional for a 48-hour week but they'd be paid 30 percent if they were paid true overtime.

The statement of President Roosevelt refers directly to an inequitable situation which prevails in the computation of overtime pay for thousands of Federal employees who receive their pay on a per annum basis. I have introduced H. R. 4406 to provide for the payment of true overtime compensation to Government employees. The main reason why the white-collar employees now receive 21.6 percent additional pay for a 48-hour week when other Federal employees who are paid on a per diem or per hour basis are paid 30 percent for their overtime work is because of a provision in the existing public laws.

Today, the basic week is 40 hours before overtime pay starts. Forty hours represent a work week of 5 days of 8 hours each day. Based upon 52 weeks in a year, there really are 260 work days. Unfortunately, under the present law and practice, overtime pay is, in fact, based upon a fictitious basis of 360 days in a work year. In the same Government building we now find some employees working overtime, and doing practically the same work as all other employees in the building, receiving overtime pay computed on a basis of 260 work days in the year, while others have their overtime pay computed on a basis of 360 days. My bill seeks to correct this inequity.

I am glad to note that President Roosevelt favors this legislation. I also wish to bring to the attention of the Members of the House in support of this bill the report secured by Chairman RAMSPECK from the United States Civil Service Commission in which President Mitchell of the Commission reports that the Commission definitely favors the change proposed by H. R. 4406 with respect to the divisor to be used in converting annual rates to daily and hourly rates for overtime pay computation purposes.

During the entire period of the present war while the employees of the United States Government have been engaged in overtime work, the white-collar workers on annual salaries have been the victims of an unjust, unfortunate and inequitable discrimination in their overtime pay.

I have brought my bill, H. R. 4406, to the attention of members of the House Committee on the Civil Service and I am hopeful that the committee will grant a hearing upon it in the near future. I do not know of anyone who opposes the passage of legislation which will correct this inequity and I will be pleased to agree to any amendments to the bill which I have offered which will restrict its application to the elimination of this inequity in the present law. I will appreciate the active support of all of my colleagues in the passage of this legislation.

The provisions of my bill and the terms of the report from the United States Civil Service Commission indicate clearly the means and need for this remedial legislation. They are as follows:

H. R. 4406

A bill to provide for the payment of overtime compensation to Government employees, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That public law No. 49, Seventy-eighth Congress, chapter 93, first session, is amended by striking out all of section 2, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. Except as provided in section 3, officers and employees to whom this act applies shall be paid overtime compensation for work in excess of 40 hours in any administrative workweek at a rate of one and one-half times their basic rates of compensation: Provided, That in computing the overtime compensation of per annum officers and employees, the base pay for 1 day shall be considered to be one-two-hundred-and-sixtieth of the respective per annum salaries, and the base pay for 1 hour shall be considered to be one-eighth of base pay so computed for 1 day.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1944.

Hon. ROBERT RAMSPECK,
Chairman, House Committee on the Civil Service, House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request of March 17, 1944, receipt of which was acknowledged March 20, we are presenting to the House Committee on the Civil Service our comments on H. R. 4406, a bill to provide for the payment of overtime compensation to Government employees, and for other purposes. This bill proposes a substitute for section 2 of the War Overtime Pay Act of May 7, 1943, Public Law 49, Seventy-eighth Congress. If enacted into law, it would—

1. Repeal the present provision that overtime pay shall be computed on only so much of an employee's annual salary as does not exceed a rate of $2,900 per annum.

2. Repeal the present provision that departments and agencies may elect to grant employees compensatory time off from duty in lieu of overtime pay for work in excess of 48 hours in any administrative workweek.

3. Substitute a divisor of 260 in lieu of the present divisor of 360 for converting annual rates into daily rates for overtime pay computation purposes.

The discontinuance of the existing ceiling of $2,900 for overtime computation purposes is primarily one of legislative policy. However, the discontinuance of authority for compensatory time off from duty in lieu of overtime pay for work in excess of 48 hours a week would remove an item of flexibility in the administration of the War Overtime Pay Act of 1943 which we believe should be retained.

The Commission definitely favors the change proposed by H. R. 4406 with respect to the divisor to be used in converting annual rates to daily and hourly rates for overtime pay computation purposes.

Government employees generally are paid at basic annual, daily, or hourly rates. There is no statute establishing a uniform rule for converting these basic pay rates into overtime pay rates. In fact, existing law requires inconsistency.

In order to compute overtime earnings, it is first necessary to determine the overtime rate per hour. Under Public Law 49 and under daily and hourly wage schedules, the overtime rate per hour is one and one-half times the straight-time hourly rate. An inconsistency occurs, however, in computing the straight-time hourly rate.

The statutory method for computing straight-time hourly rates from annual rates is first to divide the annual rate by 360 (to give the straight-time daily rate) and then to divide this daily rate by 8 (to give the straight-time hourly rate). This formula is predicated on the theory that annual workers are paid for 360 days' work in the year, or 2,880 hours. At present, however, the basic workweek for annual-salaried workers is 40 hours a week. Work above that is overtime service. The year's work corresponding to the year's basic salary thus in fact consists of a basic work period of 40 times 52, or 2,080 hours, or 260 days.

Although the same basic workyear of 2,080 hours is recognized in computing overtime pay for wage-board employees, it cannot be recognized for employees under Public Law 49 without new legislation.

An illustration will show the effect of the difference in the two methods.

A mechanic whose basic workweek is 40 hours works 48 hours in 1 week. For the 8 hours of overtime service he receives the equivalent of 12 hours' (8 times 1½) pay at his straight hourly rate, or an increase of twelve-fortieths of his basic weekly earnings. This is a 30-percent increase.

A stock clerk in the same plant whose basic workweek is 40 hours works 48 hours in the same week. For the extra 8 hours of overtime he is paid one-three hundred and sixtieth of his annual basic rate (1/360 times ⅛ times 8), times one and one-half. This is equivalent to a weekly increase of one-two hundred and fortieth of his basic annual earnings, or a weekly increase of fifty-two two hundred and fortieths of his basic weekly earnings. This is a 21.67-percent increase.

Thus the mechanic and the stock clerk under the same circumstances receive a 30-percent and a 21.67-percent increase, respectively, over basic weekly earnings.

This difference is also clearly illustrated in the case of employees whose annual earnings are substantially the same without overtime, e. g., a mechanical employee, paid at $1.20 an hour and a salaried draftsman paid at $2,500 a year. For working regular 40-hour schedules for 52 weeks, the mechanic would be paid $2,496 and the draftsman $2,500. For each hour in excess of 40 hours a week the mechanic is paid one and one-half times $1.20, or $1.80. The draftsman is paid $1.30 ($2,500 divided by 360, divided by 8, multiplied by 1½) for each overtime hour, or 50 cents per hour less than the mechanic, although their straight-time annual earnings are substantially the same rate.

We believe this inconsistency should be corrected. Consequently, irrespective of the retention or repeal of the $2,900 limitation on overtime pay computation, if H. R. 4406 were modified so as to retain the option of compensatory time-off for work in excess of 48 hours a week, we would recommend favorable action.

We are advised by the Bureau of the Budget that any proposal to repeal the present $2,900 ceiling for overtime computation purposes would not be in accord with the program of the President. In other respects the Bureau of the Budget advises that there are no objections to the submission of this report to your committee.

By direction of the Commission:

Very respectfully,

HARRY B. MITCHELL,
President.

Why Spend $100,000,000 on the WASP Program?—Read What Miss Cassini Says

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include therein an article which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald, entitled "These Charming People," by Austine Cassini. When you consider that the WASP program will cost $100,000,000 for 5,000 WASPS, notwithstanding the fact there are 10,000 men already trained in the C. A. A.–W. T. S. program, many of us wonder why such an expensive program of duplication.

Miss Cassini has her version, which is as follows:

THESE CHARMING PEOPLE

(By Austine Cassini)

The little people are the Irish ancestors of the more recent English gremelins. Right here in Washington, pattering around in places like the Pentagon, are plenty of little people. They know more than anyone suspects and sometimes open valves letting leaks out into Washington. Some of the best inside news comes from irked or mischievous little people:

Miss Jaqueline Cochran, flying organizer and head of the the WASPS, has been trying for some time for a commission as colonel, which would equal Oveta Hobby's. Up until recently the slim, brown-eyed "Jackie" kept two telephones busy from her suite in the Statler Hotel, rushed around hopefully, but not very successfully. Although there was much talk and even printed publicity her chances looked skimpy.

However, in Washington it isn't how you win friends and influence people, it's how you or your friends win influential people. Meeting the right person can help even the most lost or strayed causes.

In the last week the shapely pilot has seen her coveted commission coming closer and closer. * * * One of the highest-placed generals, it seems, gazed into her eyes, and since then has taken her cause celebre very much "to heart" * * * She's such an attractive composition of wind-blown bob, smiling eyes and outdoor skin nobody blames him.

It's whispered he's battling like a knight of olde, or olde knight, for "the faire Cochran." So the announcement can be expected any day that Jackie's commission has been approved, if the captivated general is victorious in his tournaments.

Bees to Alaska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, the late Frank Bacon in Lightnin' used to assure us that he had herded a swarm of bees across the plains from St. Louis to California and "never lost a bee."

That is not the way we bring bees to Alaska, but we bring them just the same, as indicated by the following news release of June 16, 1944, of the Pan American World Airways:

BUSY BEES WING WAY TO ALASKAN NORTHLAND

The bees are winging to Alaska.

A major achievement in air cargo operations was scored by the express department of Pan American World Airways' Alaska sector when 10,000 bees were flown successfully from Seattle to Fairbanks, Alaska, recently.

Transported from California more than 2,270 miles in 3 days by railway express and Pan American Lodestar plane in special containers the bees were delivered to a prominent Fairbanks attorney, Julian Guy Rivers, whose hobby is bee raising.

It was one of the few successful attempts ever made to ship bees to Alaska. En route, utmost care was required to hold to a minimum the loss of life among the bees, highly sensitive to rough handling, changes in climate, and high altitudes.

The shipment, weighing 37 pounds, consisted of three fine-screen cages constructed to provide a maximum of fresh air and feeding facilities for the thousands of winged "passengers."

Now Alaskan sourdoughs can enjoy their hotcakes with honey from local hives and the new bee population will aid materially in the pollenization of Alaska's plants and flowers.

The Citizen's Court

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, if there is one branch of government in which more than any other the people have had confidence, upon which they have relied for protection, it is the judicial branch. The right to a trial by jury, in a court presided over by a judge who was respected for his ability and integrity, we thought would never be taken from us.

Perhaps unconsciously but indubitably in the back of our minds has always been the thought that here we were certain of "equal justice under law"; that every citizen would be judged by and in accordance with the law, rather than by an arbitrary administrator. Between the dictator—the petty official or the exalted administrator or executive—and the citizen, protecting him, was the court.

More than 700 years ago, in June of 1215, in the meadows of Runnymede on the Thames River, the barons by force won from King John Magna Carta the great charter of human liberty. Not until our forefathers were some 3,000 miles from their home did George III forget the lesson.

The Declaration of Independence called his attention to his denial of justice through an accessible and impartial court. By 8 long years of cruel warfare the right was reestablished. The Constitution was written, once again guaranteeing to citizens government by law, trial by a free and an independent judiciary.

For 160 years, the citizen was safe, secure in the exercise of his rights and privileges. Not until the coming of the New Deal did anyone attempt to interfere with the integrity of our courts. Then an impatient President, determined to impose his theories upon the people, surrounded by advisers who brazenly proclaimed that our form of Government was outmoded, that America should be remade, attempted to pack the Supreme Court.

Although thwarted in that plan by an outraged public sentiment, the President has appointed 296 of the 318 sitting Federal judges. Many of the appointments were political, were undoubtedly made with the idea that the judges held, and would in their opinions, give expression to, at least some of the political and economic theories held by the President.

Next, Congress fell under the Executive influence to such an extent that it was known as a rubber-stamp Congress. Laws were enacted and so construed as to give administrators the power to govern the daily conduct of millions of our citizens by directives, each order but another name for decree; each in effect a law promulgated, not by the legislative, the lawmaking, branch; enforced, not by the courts, but by the executive, or law-enforcing, branch.

Boards and administrators have usurped the functions of the legislature, the judiciary. By Executive order, the plant of Montgomery Ward is seized, a railroad is taken over, and for more than a year has been operated, by the Government, as have industrial plants.

Within the past few days, the War Manpower Commission has told the citizens that hereafter men will be required to work where told. W. L. B. has told employers what wage they should pay. Workers, like employers, are no longer free. W. M. C. classes their labor as merchandise. Merchants have been told at what price goods must be sold, even though the order was oppressive upon the consumer. Farmers have been told how much wheat to grow; fined for every bushel produced in excess of the Administrator's limitation. Eggs are sold by the Government at $30 a carload—one-sixth of a cent a dozen—for hog feed.

Last week, when the continuation of the O. P. A. was before Congress, it required a bitter struggle in the House to incorporate in the act a provision giving the individual citizen the right to a court appeal from the arbitrary order of the Administrator. That law has many an amazing and incredible provision. Let me cite just one: The Administrator charging a citizen with a violation of an order or directive may make his own independent investigation, and the citizen is denied the right to prove the inaccuracy of the data which it is said shows his guilt.

Not only is the citizen denied his day in court; he is not even given the privilege of knowing what evidence has been adduced against him. It remains to be seen, when the bill comes back from the upper branch, whether Congress will insist that the rights gained by Magna Carta, won by the Revolutionary War, guaranteed by the Constitution, will be restored to our citizens.

Unless the Members of the present Congress protect the rights of the citizen, they should be replaced by representatives who will carry out, no matter what the cost, the people's will, in accordance with constitutional provisions.

Representative Fish Meets His Opposition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 23, 1944

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune of June 15, 1944:

REPRESENTATIVE FISH MEETS HIS OPPOSITION

The Rockland County Republican Committee in New York endorsed the candidacy of Representative HAMILTON FISH by a vote of 127 to 63 the other night, but only after a bit of maneuvering that illustrates how desperately the internationalists and New Deal fellow travelers would like to remove Representative FISH from Congress. A group of so-called Republican leaders who oppose Representative FISH tried to get the committee to endorse the candidacy of Augustus W. Bennett, a Newburgh, N. Y., lawyer. After Representative FISH won the Republican endorsement, the Rockland County Democratic Committee endorsed Bennett as the Democratic candidate.

Representative FISH has earned the undying hatred of a small group of people in his own party because he believes that America ought to be governed by and for Americans and not for the benefit of European aristocracy. These people hate him so much they would try to ring in a Democrat on the Republican ticket if it would displace him. This dodge, of course, was no more successful than any of the other conspiracies and smears of which Representative FISH has been target.

Representative FISH returned from the First World War with a remarkable battle record. He kept a reserve commission in the intervening years and was ready to set forth again in this war. He even took a refresher course at an Army camp a few months before Pearl Harbor. Representative FISH has been a congressional leader in the move to keep American attention focused on American interests. It is hard to traduce the patriotism of a man like Representative FISH, but the internationalists haven't failed for lack of trying. They failed because the people know how dishonest and despicable their attempts were. Representative FISH was returned to Congress in 1942 and there is no reason to believe he won't be reelected this November, the antics of Rockland County's pseudo-Republican minority notwithstanding.

Sense in Nonsense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, there is food for thought in a booklet that has recently come to the desk of the Members of Congress from A. W. Lafferty who I am told was a former Member of Congress who now resides in the historic Calvert mansion at Riverdale, Md., suburban to the city of Washington. This mansion was one time owned by the late Senator Caraway. Mr. Lafferty has a novel way of presenting his views on national and international issues. There is inserted herewith an article from his book on current topics:

WINGS WIN!

(Peace conference, ad interim, before Chief Justice Hughes, wherein Churchill and Hitler have it out.)

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

High Cockalorum	Churchill
Low Cockahirum	Hitler
Chief of Protocol	Daladier
Horse Sense	Hull
The Chairman	Chief Justice Hughes

AGENDA

1. Money.
2. More money.
3. Much more money.

ROUND 1

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed, you birds; and no punches below the equator.

Mr. CHURCHILL. Mr. Chairman [takes long drink of water]. The war may be long, and it may be short; it all depends on General Gort.

Mr. HITLER. Herr Chairman, I would not deceive for the world, but Herr Colonel-General Wilhelm Goering has told me, confidentially, that it will be a blitzkrieg.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Colonel-General disclose the winner?

Mr. DALADIER. Oh, Monsieur Chairman, you have placed one digit directly on the point!

Mr. HULL. Brass tacks, gentlemen, what's the row all about?

Mr. HITLER. England has it. Germany wants it.

Mr. CHURCHILL. Englishmen must make money or perish.

Mr. HITLER. Germans must make geld or they die.

Mr. DALADIER. Frenchmen must make argent or croak.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, your crystal logic and keen analysis has clarified the atmosphere.

Mr. HULL (in aside). (The most sensitive nerve in the human body is the one leading to the pocket book.)

ROUND 2

The CHAIRMAN. What is this, a sit-down war?

Mr. CHURCHILL. It might be so designated, Mr. Chairman, for both sides expected to sit pretty and let the aviators fight it out.

Mr. HITLER. And when the first British airmen fell, German aviators buried them with full military honors, draped in the Union Jack, hastily fashioned by the nimble and sympathetic fingers of German hausfraus.

Mr. CHURCHILL. And British airmen immediately reciprocated.

Mr. DALADIER. It seems, Monsieur Chairman, that there is a deep fraternity between men of wings, which has not been taken into full account by any general staff. The hazard of flying satisfies their chivalry. Their heroes are the great civilian fliers.

Mr. HULL. Is it not off-color, gentlemen, for any belligerent to expect its naturally chivalrous airmen to drop death bombs upon defenseless men, women, and children?

Mr. CHURCHILL. In the long stretch of human experience many things go by contraries——

Mr. DALADIER. Plans back-fire, so to speak, Monsieur.

Mr. CHURCHILL. And while the world predicted that this war would be fought from the air, it now turns out that the boys who go up into the clouds in ships may make it a "blitz peace" instead of a "blitzkrieg."

(Bell.)

The CHAIRMAN. Wings win, in this round.

ROUND 3

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, the subject is still money.

Mr. HULL. And how to make it without murder.

Mr. HITLER. Germany must have living space. Even the caveman had a little privacy——

Mr. DALADIER. And he needed it, Monsieur.

Mr. HULL. Politicians, the world over, are barely tolerated. Do you gentlemen realize that?

Mr. DALADIER. True, Monsieur Secretaire, whilst constructive men, the world over, are venerated.

The CHAIRMAN. Now you're getting somewhere. Let me read you from Two hundred and eighty-five United States Code, page 262: "The advances in the exact sciences and the achievements in invention remind us that the seemingly impossible sometimes happens. * * * To stay experimentation in things social and economic is a grave responsibility."

Mr. CHURCHILL. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree, in principle, with the text just read.

Mr. HITLER. Ja, here too, Herr Chairman!

Mr. CHURCHILL. The British Empire has always held that sympathy and understanding come from concerted effort in solving mutual difficulties.

Mr. DALADIER. Bravo, Monsieur Churchill!

(Bell.)

Mr. CHURCHILL. After a cup of tea, I move that we take up the Yankee proposal for a uniform world money.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUND 4

The CHAIRMAN. The subject is still money.

Mr. HULL. Latin America has recently proposed a common money for the Americas, and it is under study.

Mr. CHURCHILL. Why can't we better commercial welfare for all by an identical world monetary unit, a coin of gold and silver, at a fixed ratio of silver to gold?

The CHAIRMAN. The Republicans professed to favor silver's remonetization by international agreement in the Bryan campaign of 1896.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Borah introduced a proposal January 5, 1932, for a universal silver ounce coin, to be called the quanto, divided into 100 quantimes.

Mr. DALADIER. Monsieur Chairman, the fees of money changers, plus the hazards of exchange fluctuations, constitute what seems to be a removable drag on twentieth-century trade.

Mr. HITLER. Some travelers by air now need to get their money changed several times daily——

Mr. DALADIER. And they get gypped with every change, Monsieur!

Mr. HITLER. The airplane, in utter disregard of distance, has already crowded all countries together as neighbors, in a geographical sense.

Mr. CHURCHILL. And the impact of the airplane's influence on civilization may yet force all countries to be neighbors, in a real sense. Only recently did God trust this mighty power to the hand of man.

Mr. DALADIER. Monsieur Chairman, it is obvious that we must all henceforth reside together, as neighboring states, on one very small planet, whether we like it or not. And the Paris modes next year will be irresistible!

Mr. HITLER. Herr Chairman, I am an artist. I can visualize the wings of peace fanning the fingertips of the world!

Mr. CHURCHILL. A good reach for that bird would be a grand finale.

Mr. HITLER. Where there is a will there is a way, Herr Churchill!

(Bell.)

The CHAIRMAN. Ladies and gentlemen, meet the winners! Wright brothers, of the little bicycle repair shop, Dayton, Ohio!

(Curtain.)

4–H Clubs and O. P. A. Exemptions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY O. TALLE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter containing information of interest to 4–H Club members, as follows:

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., June 16, 1944.

Hon. HENRY O. TALLE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: This will acknowledge your personal interest in the correspondence you received from Ed F. Stout, county extension director, Maquoketa, Iowa, in which he inquires as to whether or not there has been any change in the regulations governing the sales of 4–H and F. F. A. groups.

Many of our regulations have been amended so as to provide certain advantages to 4–H Clubs which have not been made available to others. For example, M. P. R. 469 which establishes maximum prices for live hogs specifically exempts 4–H Club hogs from the maximum-price provisions of that regulation. Likewise, R. M. P. R. 169 which imposes a liability on slaughterers who custom kill animals purchased at excessive prices excludes 4–H Club cattle from these custom-slaughter restrictions. Moreover, the ceiling prices prescribed by the cattle-stabilization program do not apply to 4–H Club animals.

It is not anticipated that there will be any change in the handling of 4–H Club sales. You may wish to advice Mr. Stout that the situation remains the same as it was last year.

Assuring you of our desire to be of assistance whenever possible, I am,

Very truly yours,

JAMES L. HARRISON,
Congressional Liaison Officer,
Office of Price Administration.

Church's Challenge to Totalitarianism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, I am inserting a copy of a speech made by John Towle, Topeka, Kans., to the members of the St. Paul's Lutheran Men's Club. Mr. Towle is State historian of the American Legion, a prominent and patriotic citizen of Shawnee County. I know others will be interested in this fine address:

Members of St. Paul's Lutheran Church Men's Club, I wish to thank Rev. Mr. Biel for his invitation to address this gathering this evening. I assure him and each of you present that I am happy to be here and to speak to you on matters which you, as good Americans and good citizens, hold dear.

Religion and patriotism—two virtues essential for man—one for the salvation of his soul and the other for his existence upon this earth; these two influences, which should be dominant in the lives of all of us, seem to be on the wane, on a decline. Godlessness has taken the place of religion in America today, and selfishness, a desire to put a few days or months of false prosperity to the front and to relegate real patriotism, a real love of country, to the background.

In a country scourged with the virus of Nazi-ism, the world has for its example that outstanding Lutheran minister, Niemoller, the Catholic archbishops of Cologne and Munich, and the bishop of Berlin, men who have brought upon their heads the vengeance of Hitler and his cohorts because they refused to beckon to expediency, because they put justice in its proper place, and that, of course, is in the first place; because principle to them was more than the smile of friendship of tyrants. The need for men of courage such as these men have exemplified in the face of persecution during the past several years is needed in our own country.

Our soldiers have it, our sailors have it, in fact all members of our armed forces have it—they are displaying it daily—the invasion of Europe which began early Tuesday morning of this week will prove to us that we need never be ashamed of the gallantry of our boys. June 6 this year will go down into history as the momentous day of our century; it will leave its niche in the annals of the human race because it will be the dawn of liberation of the conquered peoples; however, as Milt Tabor stated in the Capital editorially on Wednesday morning, the elation over our initial success should be tempered with the sobering thought that this is a time to pray, and not a time to cheer—Americans, our own flesh and blood, are fighting in the air and on the sea and on the beaches—men who were boys only yesterday are enduring a fiery baptismal which civilians at home can never have the capacity to understand. We can only pray that the Lord God of Hosts will be with them, giving them strength to sustain them during the ordeal—we on the home front must not fail them by not possessing the same qualities of courage which they have.

Abraham Lincoln once said, "What is morally wrong can never be politically right." It never pays to adopt the expedient attitude because one might suffer politically or otherwise who adopted an attitude contrary to the dictates of his conscience. Someone once said, "Expediency is the wisdom of man. Doing right is the wisdom of God."

Perhaps never before in our Nation has the need been so great for outstanding leadership—men who put first things first and there is no reflection on us when we put our religion and our country in those places.

When we do so, when we put religion in first place we are ridiculed by these so-called modern pagans—when we put our country next to our faith we are called isolationists, by the same clique. They are more concerned about establishment of a world empire—and it matters little to them whether that superstate will be controlled by Communists or imperialists; perhaps because there is so very little difference between these two theories.

We have all been touched by the Biblical account of Christ who went to one of the hills bordering Jersualem and there wept for the unfortunate inhabitants of that city who were steeped in sin. While Jesus loved all mankind—and was weighted down by the sins of the entire world—yet we read, "And He wept." He would today be branded as an isolationist because He wept over the sins of His own—He should, according to the New Deal crowd, have been more concerned about the sins of Rome and Babylon. There is an old axiom, "Charity begins at home." That is true, and I challenge these new false patriots to show us why we should be more concerned about another nation than our own. If they are right, then Washington and Jefferson were wrong.

In an address delivered before the Young Men's Lyceum, at Springfield, Ill., Abraham Lincoln said, "If danger is ever to reach us it cannot come from abroad." "If destruction be our lot we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen we must live through all times or die by suicide." The Great Emancipator surely uttered prophetic words in that memorable address. We do not stand at the crossroads any longer—we have already gone down the road to the left leading to chaos and destruction—we now have to turn back—that is the challenge confronting us today. Do we lack the courage, are we entirely devoid of principle? If we still possess these virtues which made us a great nation, we will demand a halt and a backward course on the road so that we can again enter the road which will lead us to a free nation—to a nation envisioned by the founders of our country and given us through their blood; unless we again assert our rights, we have allowed them to have bled and died in vain. We have allowed the millions of our boys who have died in the Revolutionary War, the Civil War, World Wars No. 1 and No. 2 to have died ignominiously.

I appeal to you as good Christians and loyal Americans to take a firm and positive stand for justice and to see that the isms which have ruined practically all of Europe are not allowed to do the same to our beloved land. Encroachment upon our liberties has already gone too far; are we going to allow this evil to slowly creep upon us until it has finally strangled us, or are we going to see that bureaucracy is abolished? It is not the American way of life; it is to our country what communism is to Russia, what nazi-ism is to Germany, what imperialism is to England, and what fascism was to Italy. We know what these tyrannical systems have accomplished in those unfortunate countries; we know the havoc and destruction they have wrought; are we going to profit by asserting our rights to see that we are not shackled by a system just as vicious, because it is identical, or are we going to allow ourselves and our children and their children to exist, not live as we have known life, in a vast country where liberty and freedom once our happy possession were? If we fail, we will have brought shame upon our heads and the malediction of all future generations. These are somber thoughts, and we must realize that to our generation has befallen the lot to choose the heritage we must give our children; will it be the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution and the Bill of Rights guaranteeing to them life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, or will it be a despotic, tyrannical government—a government not by the people and of the people and for the people, but a centralized government, existing for the exploitation of the masses, a government not deriving its powers from the governed, but a government existing for the few at the cost of enslavement of the many; a government which undertook to destroy hogs about to give birth to a litter of pigs, a government which plowed under every third row of crops while starvation ravaged the land—a land which had so-called overproduction while the people throughout the land were starving, a government which sanctions the starving of Hindus who worked for 6 cents a day as agricultural workers in India, and 12 cents a day as skilled workmen and mechanics in Bombay, Singapore, Calcutta, and other great oriental cities?

The anger of God will descend upon us unless we work and strive as Christians and Americans to correct injustice and alleviate suffering. The starvation of millions of children in the occupied countries of Europe will be a stern rebuke to us; while some effort has been made to send food to these unfortunates, Churchill has not consented to this humanitarian act. Our Lord Himself spoke in the deep anger of love of those who abused children. "Better a millstone around his neck," He said, "than that anyone injure one of His little ones." Unless we as a nation act to feed these poor starving children of Europe, can we hope to have His blessing? This is the only kind of interventionism that Washington and Jefferson and Madison would approve.

Clif Stratton, the able Capital's Washington correspondent, described the situation in our country in a few words when he stated May 8, 1944, that we do not want the lives of our boys divided into three pens—breeding pens, feeding pens, and slaughter pens—and that the nationalization of youth can be carried too far.

Our Nation today is infested with modern Judases and Pilates—men who are willing to sell the birthright of posterity for a mess of pottage for themselves. These betrayers of Christianity and civilization are in high places. They exist in both church and state. No church is blessed to the extent that it cannot say it has none of them. Every political subdivision has more than its share of these contemptible rascals.

These things should not dishearten us but should give us greater impetus to see that wrongs are corrected. We have to fight only harder when we are betrayed. Christ had twelve apostles—one sold Him for 30 pieces of silver, another denied Him, another had such little faith that he would not believe in the Risen Saviour until he could touch the wounds in His side, His hands, and His feet; none would pray with Him in His hour of agony at Gethsemane.

While the future looks dark, we must not despair; we have in our country, in our midst, men who are courageous and who are willing to sacrifice political gains for principle. A great statesman once said, "I would rather be right than President." Harry Woodring has exemplified that by rather being right than Secretary of War.

While some of you may not always agree with our Congressman, the Honorable WILLIAM F. LAMBERTSON, we must all admit that he has consistently fought the nullification of our Constitution and those who wish to make us a part of a vassal state, knowing that he would lose a few votes—our present Governor, Mr. Schoeppel has displayed the same virtue—and so we can derive some strength in the knowledge that all men in public office are not corrupt; that we still have many who are for our Nation first, last, and all the time. Both political parties have enough courageous men in their ranks to lead our country to sanity if only the masses will follow. We must see that the two tickets this fall when Presidential election will be held will be men of higher caliber than 4 years ago.

We must see that on one ticket a man is nominated who will not make solemn promises that will not be kept and who will defend the Constitution and the Bill of Rights instead of using every means to nullify them.

On the other ticket we must see that the man who receives the nomination will not travel the length and breadth of the land, making long and loud promises and then later say with a shrug, "That was only campaign oratory."

Woodrow Wilson was elected President on the promise that he would keep us out of war, and his Fourteen Points went out the same way the "four freedoms" are disappearing today. "With what little wisdom the world is ruled," Oxenstiern said about 300 years ago. If true then, it is never so true as now. Milt Tabor last Sunday stated, "As we interpret the stories now being printed about the Teheran Conference, Churchill and Stalin whittled down Mr. Roosevelt's 'four freedoms' until they disappeared. They substituted 'one freedom'—freedom for Britain and Russia to do as they please after Germany and Japan are licked. Looks as if we were taken upon a mountain and shown green fields, and instead of resisting the temptation we fell down and worshiped the wrong gods."

Congressman SHORT, of Missouri, in an address in Chicago last week, stated that we are fighting a war both here and abroad, but that the domestic foe will be the hardest to lick. We must have a reformation in our country or revolution will be inevitable.

The encroachments upon personal liberty have only started; consider the proposals now in the minds of the "brain trust" for the federalization of schools, the socialization of medicine; in fact, the usurpation of power to control the hands and minds of all—consider these facts and then resolve to see that you and your children and your children's children will live as freemen; unshackle the chains of slavery which are already being felt around our necks; break these chains while yet breakable. Unless we do so now, the links of that chain of bondage will become so strong they will be unbreakable and we will fall under the yoke of serfdom.

Chester Bowles on Post-War Office of Price Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Chester Bowles to the New York Times on post-war price policies:

[From the New York Times of June 18, 1944]

POST-WAR PRICE POLICIES—FLEXIBLE RECONVERSION CONTROL IS HELD NECESSARY

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

I must express my appreciation of your recent editorials concerning extension by Congress of the Emergency Price Control Act. I am confident that this country will never abandon price stabilization and embark on an inflationary course with its eyes open. The danger that it would make this decision with its eyes closed has been significantly diminished by your stand.

In the editorial of June 6 you expressed some concern about the problem of reconversion pricing; that is, the pricing of peacetime products which will become necessary as plants are converted to peacetime use. You are fearful that a policy of tight pricing by the O. P. A. might, on many products, seriously hamper the resumption of peacetime production.

During the past 2 years our primary attention has necessarily been given to current pricing problems. We have also, however, considered at great length the problems of price control that will emerge during the reconversion period, problems that must be solved wisely if our economy is to make a smooth transition from war to peace. Although it has been impossible to prepare an exact blueprint, I think we know pretty well the general principles along which our future pricing policies must develop.

MUST CHECK INFLATION

Our first objective obviously must be to continue to hold inflation in check. Both in the months which lie directly ahead of us and in the months of reconversion which follow we must see that the general price level does not get out of hand. We will be wise not to forget the fact that 40 percent of the inflation during the period of World War No. 1 actually occurred after the armistice. The price rise did not reach its peak until May 1920—18 months after the guns ceased firing in Europe.

War Production Board officials have stated that reconversion on any major scale will be impossible until after the defeat of Germany. This means that our present manpower shortage and the general shortage of goods will continue to cause heavy pressures on the present price level until after the European armistice.

It seems essential to me that this pressure be met and the present price levels maintained. This will require a continuation of tight pricing in the immediate future.

RECONVERSION PROBLEM

When reconversion really begins in earnest, however, we will be confronted with a quite different situation. Billions of dollars of Government war contracts will be eliminated. Purchasing power will begin to drop. A return to a normal work week averaging 40 hours will itself through the elimination of overtime, cut purchasing power by $12,000,000,000 a year. This reduction of twelve billions is wholly apart from any changes in current levels of employment and wage rates or from current concentration in the heavy and high-wage industries.

If we are to avoid a serious dislocation of our economy it is obvious that our pricing policies during this difficult reconversion period will call for skillful handling. Our pricing policies must be designed to encourage the fullest possible employment and quick transition to full peace-time production. If we are to avoid a further dangerous drop in producing power they must also encourage the continuation of high hourly wage rates.

As quickly as supply in each field now covered by price control comes in line with demand, price ceilings must be eliminated. In the final analysis, it is only through adequate supplies that we can hope to eliminate the forces which seek to push prices upward.

PRICE-CEILING ADJUSTMENT

There are, however, many industries in which, during the reconversion period, price ceilings must be adjusted upward. For example, there are many industries whose peacetime goods have been out of production for 2 years or longer. In many cases these goods cannot profitably be brought back into production at the same prices which prevailed in 1941 or 1942. Costs have not stood still and prices cannot ignore the movement of costs. If we were to insist upon holding to the prices of 1941 or 1942 for these goods there is no question but that production would be hampered, unemployment increased, and wage rates lowered. This is a relatively simple case and one in which there would be no question on the part of O. P. A. as to how we should proceed.

Let me take a somewhat more difficult case. There are many industries which are operating today under very favorable profit conditions, largely because of the war business they receive. The wide margins on these war items enable these industries to operate with low margins on civilian goods. Sometime or other these industries must convert back to peacetime production. When they lose their profitable wartime output, prices of their civilian-type items must be increased. If this is not done the result will be powerful deflationary pressure upon wages and upon prices of the raw materials purchased by these industries.

In this case, too, our position is quite clear. There will, of course, be some question as to exactly when the adjustments must be made and just how much prices are to be increased. But when the time comes we must move to adjust prices where necessary and to avoid bringing positive deflationary pressure to bear upon prices and wages.

In other words, our price policy in the reconversion period must be a flexible policy which will foster full production and full employment at high wage rates. It is our hope that during this period our basic supplies of food and textiles will be sufficient to allow us to remove ceilings on these items with reasonable speed without resulting increases in the retail prices. It is also our hope that with increased building construction and the gradual redistribution of war workers it will be possible for us to eliminate rent control, area by area, as tenant vacancies begin to increase.

There are certain areas in our economy, however, where inflation will continue to be a serious threat. I am thinking of consumer durables, such as vacuum cleaners, washing machines, and automobiles, where supplies for a considerable period will be running far behind. If price controls are removed too quickly from these items we would soon see a repetition of the dangerous inflationary boom that we experienced in 1919, perhaps on a far greater scale. I am also thinking of the building industry, where millions of citizens with substantial savings accounts will be only too willing to bid high for the materials and the equipment to create the homes to which they have long looked forward. In other words, I see in this period a system of selective price control in certain areas, with relatively rapidly decreasing controls on easy-to-produce consumer items and on rent.

MASS PRODUCTION NEEDED

There is one final principle involved in our reconversion and post-war pricing problem which lies very close to my heart. During the war our economy has demonstrated more convincingly than it ever did in times of peace how magnificently it can mass produce. It is a primary and fundamental requirement of this characteristic of our economy that industry price its output low enough to tap mass markets, for it is only these markets that can keep our vast productive capacity in operation.

Unless industry follows this policy vigorously there is very little prospect of maintaining the level of national income and production whatever we may do in other directions.

This will take courage and vision on the part of industry, but it is utterly essential. If industry as a whole or any significant industrial sector is going once again to price on the basis of breaking even at 50 percent of capacity, we are going to find ourselves operating at just about 50 percent of capacity. I think we are all agreed that that is an intolerable condition and one which the country will never accept. But, in my opinion, if industry is to recognize this fundamental requirement and is to price for mass markets and full production, there must be firm guaranties provided that the bottom will not be permitted to drop out of the price and wage structure. I hope those guaranties will be forthcoming.

What I have said falls far short of a blueprint, but I believe the principles themselves are clear and that they will be widely accepted. We must continue to seek stabilization of the general price level. But this does not mean stabilization of every individual price. There must be flexibility in the price structure.

Today, I believe, the price level as a whole is in reasonable balance with costs. If this balance is maintained during the reconversion and post-war periods, production can go forward on a profitable basis. This is what we have been seeking all through the war years, and in achieving it I think we have helped to lay the basis for a sound economy in the years that lie ahead.

CHESTER BOWLES.

Analysis of Vote in General Election of 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, the following material was prepared by W. L. Forrest, of Madison, Wis., and, at his request, I am inserting it in the RECORD:

The material for this analysis was taken from the Congressional Directory of January 1943 and the material dealing with the vote cast in the general election of 1940.

The columns under No. 1 show the standing of each State based upon the number of Congressmen elected, population, and vote cast. The columns under No. 2 show the standing of each based upon the total vote cast in each State and the unfair representation in Congress by the poll-tax States.

[1] Poll-tax States.

Texas drops from fifth place to fourteenth; Georgia from fourteenth to thirty-second; Tennessee from fifteenth to twenty-sixth; Alabama from seventeenth to thirty-third; Virginia, nineteenth to twenty-ninth; Mississippi, twenty-third to forty-second; Arkansas, twenty-fourth to fortieth; South Carolina, twenty-seventh to forty-seventh.

The material for this analysis was taken from the Congressional Directory of January 1943, and is based upon the votes cast in the general election of 1940 for Congressmen from congressional districts in various States.

For this group comparison, the 8 poll-tax States, with their 79 congressional Representatives, is the first consideration, then the vote cast by each and the total vote cast by the group. The population is secondary.

We have heard a lot of talk about minority representation for minority groups in our Nation and if you will compare the various States and the group of States with the poll-tax States on the basis of the votes cast in the general election of 1940 you will find that the minority voters of the several States have representation in a very big way.

The repeal of the poll-tax law will be a step in the right direction but not the solution of the small vote cast in the elections.

I would like to offer a few suggestions that would help to improve our understanding of political democracy and our complicated election machinery. (1) Amend the provision of congressional representation and instead of using the population of the State as the basis, use the vote cast for Congressmen in the Presidential election year as the basis for State representation in Congress; (2) reduce the age of voting to 18; (3) simplify our election ballots by confining the election to legislative, executive, and judiciary; (4) by State law make it a mandate upon all public and private grade and high schools to teach political democracy in the schools and upon each election day there shall be created from and by the school children the complete election machinery as used in the adult elections, and that each city or county furnish to each school district duplicated ballots to be used by the school only and to be so marked and printed on paper different in color as a safeguard.

By and through our school we should be able to teach the children of this Nation the value of safeguarding the privilege of political democracy.

Source: Food Distribution Administration

There has always been an effort to mislead the farmer into thinking that this plan was a method of disposing of his surplus. The amounts of food involved by this method of distribution has been insignificant when compared to the total United States production, and also when compared to imports of agricultural products. Without going into the merits, demerits, or needs of such a program, I wish to call your attention to the fact that the economic conditions of the people do not appear to be factors taken into consideration. Part of this program has been used intentionally or unintentionally to depress farm prices. When the first Price Control Act was under consideration Milo Perkins, chief food distributor of that period, said in answer to a question propounded by Representative MERLIN HULL of Wisconsin, that they bought butter at the cheap summer prices, and put it on the market when it got up toward 30 cents per pound. This 30 cents per pound was below cost and the result was that butter prices were adversely affected during the entire year. It has always appeared to me that it did not make sense having one agency of this administration giving out Federal checks to farmers as parity payments because the products did not bring enough in the market place and then see another agency of the same administration carrying on bucketshop operations with the farmers' surplus and really preventing the farm products from reaching the much acclaimed goal of parity in the market place. I also again remind you that thousands upon thousands of farmers lost their farms from 1930 to 1940 at a time that Milo Perkins and his little helpers were spending their time and someone else's money in their attempt to show the great humanitarianism of the present administration. This humanitarianism was not evident to the countryside. In fact, in many cases, the Federal agencies were the toughest collectors at that very time.

When you realize that the United States Department of Agriculture reports show that over one-quarter of the producers in many sections received less than $300 per family total gross income in 1939, I am sure you see why all programs should have careful scrutiny or we will see a program of Santa Claus to the few but Shylock to the many.

The merits of a food distribution program that would provide this food to foster homes would be above all criticism. This food could be distributed on the basis of enrollment. There are 2,240 foster homes with an enrollment of 240,000 children in the United States. Accusations of using these food commodities for political purposes could not be made as the foster homes would have no votes and would control practically no votes.

Corp. Raymond Schammel

OF

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article from the Baltimore News-Post regarding one of my constituents, Corp. Raymond Schammel, of Baltimore, Md.

Corporal Schammel, with Yankee ingenuity and his own brand of psychological warfare, routed six Nazi tanks on the Italian battlefield, despite the fact that the tanks were out of range of his shells. We have every reason to be proud of our boys.

The article follows:

YANK FROM HERE ROUTS NAZI TANKS

WITH THE FIFTH ARMY, ITALY.—Using his own brand of psychological warfare on the enemy, a Baltimore gunner routed six Nazi Mark VI tanks, despite the fact they were out of range of his new weapon.

Corp. Raymond Schammel, son of Mr. and Mrs. George Schammel, 2437 East Federal Street, Baltimore, is No. 1 gunner on a massive tank destroyer now making things miserable for the enemy on the Allied Fifth Army's Anzio-Nettuno beachhead south of Rome.

The situation which gave the corporal the opportunity to wage his own psychological warfare was this:

The tank destroyer was hidden in dense foliage and the job was to protect an infantry battalion command post. Suddenly, far in the distance, the six Nazi monsters came lumbering along and headed in their direction.

OUT OF REACH

Sgt. Lawrence Rhoads, of Columbus, Ohio, and the gun crew were amazed to find such a good target in front of them. But the sad part was that they couldn't reach the tanks with their own gun.

Sergeant Rhoads gave the order to fire, anyway, and Corporal Schammel went to work.

He purposely fired a few rounds short of maximum range. Then he increased the range slightly and dropped a few more shells in the direction of the Nazis. He kept up this creeping fire until he fired 22 shells and his gun had reached maximum range.

MAKE FAST RETREAT

The last shells fired still were far short of their targets, but Schammel's psychology worked. The enemy tanks saw the shells bursting in front of them, each one getting closer. As they could not see the well-hidden tank destroyer, they had no way of knowing that it had exhausted its range possibilities. They stopped, turned around quickly, and high-tailed it back to their own lines, hastened on their way by 12 more shells belched from the tank destroyer.

The rest of the crew who aided Schammel were Pvt. (1st cl.) Peter Castellano, assistant gunner, of New Haven, Conn.; Pvt. Albert Brousseau, driver, of Nashua, N. H.; and Pvt. (1st cl.) Albert Povlina, radio operator, of Whiting, Ind.

Corporal Schammel has one brother in the service. He is Pvt. John F. Schammel, now stationed in California.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Whereas hearings are to be conducted by the special St. Lawrence subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee May 15 or thereabout for the purpose of hearing all matters pertinent to the development and completion of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project; and

Whereas this matter is now before Congress for their consideration and decision; and

Whereas this development will open up a new shipbuilding resource of great capacity in Manitowoc, which is in close proximity to raw material and will make it possible to turn out large numbers of naval craft, merchant vessels, and auxiliaries of all types on the Great Lakes. Likewise, it will provide low-cost water transportation for the agricultural and industrial produce of the Middle West and thereby open new markets in Canada, Europe, and Latin America; and

Whereas we likewise deem this development to be of paramount importance and to the best interests of our Nation for defense and commerce: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the mayor and Common Council of the City of Manitowoc, That we go on record unqualifiedly in favor of this development, satisfied that it will result in great and lasting benefits to the Nation as a whole; be it further

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend that construction of this waterway be commenced as soon as labor and materials are available; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Hon. John H. Overton, chairman of Senate Finance Committee; Senator George D. Aiken, Senator Robert M. La Follette, Senator Alexander Wiley, Congressman La Vern Dilweg, and H. C. Brockel, secretary of Great Lakes Harbors Association.

Washington, D. C., June 17, 1944.

The Honorable JOHN W. McCORMACK,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. McCORMACK: I was greatly disturbed to learn yesterday that, before the renewal legislation has even come out of conference, a new and sweeping restriction upon the Administrator's powers to control prices has been attached to the O. P. A. appropriation for the coming year.

The restriction, as approved by the Appropriations Committee, is as follows: "Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used to pay the salary or expenses of any person fixing maximum prices for different kinds, classes, or types of a commodity which are described in terms of specifications or standards, unless such specifications or standards were, prior to such order, in general use."

In the more than 2 months of hearings and debate on the renewal of the price-control acts, no such proposal as this was advanced or considered. The effects of the rider, if approved, would be far-reaching, and of the utmost seriousness. I am writing this letter as the only available way of explaining what these effects would be in the hope that you will make the facts known to the House.

I am sorry to say that it is going to be necessary to burden you with a long letter. The simple truth is, however, that the proposal touches upon such a complex problem that it cannot be explained briefly. Something of what is involved is indicated by the fact that more than three-fifths of the outstanding maximum price regulations—to be exact, 322—make use in some way of specifications or standards; and that the validity of at least 70 of these would be put into question if the proposed rider became law.

First of all, let me make perfectly clear that the proviso has nothing whatever to do with grade labeling. The Administrator is now prohibited by law from requiring grade labeling, and no price regulation does so or will do so as long as the prohibition remains in the law.

The proviso deals with the fundamental question of how you go about describing the commodity for which a maximum price is being established. Obviously a maximum price does not have any meaning unless the article to which it applies is properly identified. Frequently it is impossible to do this without making use of specifications or standards.

Congress considered this question last year when it approved the Taft-Andresen amendment which is now section 2 (j) of the Emergency Price Control Act. That subsection authorizes the Administrator to make use of specifications or standards in three types of situations:

1. When the specifications or standards were previously in general use in the trade or industry affected;

2. When their use has previously been lawfully required by another Government agency; and

3. Where the Administrator finds that there exists no practicable alternative for securing effective price control of the commodity involved.

The proposed rider would allow O. P. A. to refer to specifications of standards for the future only in the first type of situation—where the Administrator was able to find that the specifications or standards had been in general use in the trade or industry affected. Perhaps it would not invalidate outstanding regulations of the second or third type but obviously it would raise a serious question whenever a change was made in the existing prices established in such regulations.

It may seem at first blush that O. P. A. ought never to make use of specifications or standards which the industry itself has not generally used. It takes only a little reflection, however, to realize that this is a tremendous oversimplification of the problem. Take, for example, the frequent situation in which wartime scarcities—requiring changes in materials and methods of manufacture—have made pre-war standards obsolete. In these cases O. P. A. has no alternative but to devise, in conjunction with industry, new standards to meet present conditions, or to make use of standards newly devised by the War Production Board or some other Government agency. Often industry itself has come in and asked O. P. A. to do this. Obviously, this problem is going to continue to be of the utmost importance in the reconversion period as industry returns to the manufacture of durable goods similar to pre-war models but differing more or less materially. Again, it will be of major importance in connection with forthcoming War Production Board programs for increasing the production of critically needed low-cost clothing items.

Another extremely common situation is that in which O. P. A. bases ceiling prices upon standards or specifications which have long been in use by industry but which cannot be said to have been in general use. This happens whenever there are several sets of standards familiar to the trade and a choice has to be made among them. Another closely related situation is that in which the trade standards are too informal or general for use in a maximum price regulation and have to be developed and made more precise.

I wish to make very clear that O. P. A. does not concern itself with setting up specifications or standards to replace those used by industry. The specifications used in price regulations are based as closely as possible upon the standards that are already found in business life. They reflect, therefore, the varieties of products being produced. They do not, as has sometimes been suggested, result in a deadly uniformity of products. Pricing on the basis of standards and specifications is in no sense a new development in American business. It permeates the business world.

The disastrous effect which the proposed rider would have can perhaps best be illustrated by a mere list of the regulations which could not have been issued under it. Time does not permit the preparation of a complete list. As of last September, however, there were at least 57 such regulations. A list of them appears on the attached press release on pages 7 and 8.

In my best judgment very nearly all of the industries affected by these regulations would rise in almost unanimous protest if it became necessary to rewrite and reissue them.

Sincerely yours,

CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator.

Communist Strategy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith a statement taken from the column of Frank R. Kent in the Evening Star, of Washington, D. C., of June 16, 1944.

It will be noted that in a speech made on October 29, 1934, by William H. Murray, Communist leader in the State of Washington, the claim is made that they had infiltrated the Democratic Party. It should be further noted that Mr. Murray claimed then that the Communist movement was receiving so much help from the chief aides of President Roosevelt that he advised his Communist Party to put aside their desire to achieve their program at one major stroke and cooperate with the Democratic organization.

The satisfaction expressed by the Communists with the present administration's policies undoubtedly accounts for the fourth-term endorsement by Earl Browder and the Communist organization.

The statement follows:

The fact is that the New Deal spending policy always has been dearer to the heart of the Communist than to that of the New Dealer, because, as the former's leaders so frequently declared, it leads straight toward their goals—one of which is economic chaos.

But, what especially grieves the New Dealers is the charge that the immediate objective of the Communists is to do to the Democratic Party what they already have done to the American Labor Party and the C. I. O.

Nevertheless, that has been true for a long time. In support thereof is offered here extracts from a speech by William H. Murray, Communist leader in the State of Washington, made on October 29, 1936, and published in the Seattle Times. Mr. Murray, addressing his fellow Communists, was urging the election of the Democratic candidate for Governor, whom he declared, "while not an ideal candidate, will, if elected, be compelled to yield to the support which he will receive from the entire progressive movement."

In this speech, Mr. Murray made these interesting statements:

1. "We are making real progress in this State, but we must not be impatient. We must avail ourselves of every forward-looking movement that leads in the direction of the ultimate Marxian goal."

2. "The recent success of liberals and progressives at the Democratic State convention is of tremendous significance. The Democratic Party adopted there the entire program of the Washington Commonwealth Federation."

3. "Only through much effort has it been possible to revitalize the Democratic Party in this State, where it is now recognized, because of many Marxian principles, as a real progressive movement. Many of the Democratic candidates are either members of the Washington Commonwealth Federation or its parent organization, the Communist Party."

4. "I recommend to all progressives and liberals in this State to register a consistent vote for the entire Democratic ticket. This, in fact, is what Earl Browder, our candidate for President on the Communist ticket, has repeated on many occasions."

5. "We are not going to elect the Communist ticket here or in the Nation, but just as the movement is receiving so much help from the chief aides of President Roosevelt, so must we in this State realize that the Marxian goal can be reached only by furthering just such progressive movements. As Communists, we must put aside our desire to achieve our program at one major stroke and cooperate with the Democratic organization in building a real people's front. Let no one divert us from our real objective."

ILLUMINATING WORDS

Now, these earnest words of a leading Communist are genuinely illuminating. They prove that the infiltration of the Democratic Party has been a settled and consistent Communist policy for 8 years. The facts attest the progress made and make it clear the 1944 effort is the strongest yet made—and with the best prospects.

It is true, of course, that the Russians are our valued allies and we intend to live amicably with them after the fighting is over, but that should not blind us to the beautiful boring-from-within game, which American Communists have been playing here for 8 years, and the degree of success which they have achieved.

Perhaps it is all right to regard this lightly and to dismiss those who do not so regard it as having political nightmares.

Nevertheless, these facts cannot be disputed—to wit, that in some States, like Washington, the Communists have successfully infiltrated the Democratic Party; that in New York they control the American Labor Party, which claims to hold the balance of political power and polls as high as 400,000 votes; that they have great influence in the C. I. O., whose leaders are closely linked, personally and politically, with Mr. Roosevelt; that Browder, the Communist leader, is the original fourth termer, and a Roosevelt reelection would rejoice every Communist in the country.

Nine Companies Sued Over Navy Cable

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. MAY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of June 18, 1944:

NINE COMPANIES SUED OVER NAVY CABLE—UNITED STATES NAMES SIX OFFICIALS ALSO IN RECOVERY ACTION, CHARGING COLLUSIVE BIDDING

United States Attorney James B. McNally filed civil suits in the Federal Court yesterday against nine corporations and six individuals who, he said, submitted collusive bids to the Government in the sale of patented cable used in the construction of ships for the Navy.

Although Mr. McNally seeks to recover for the Government $2,000 damages for each sale based on alleged collusive bidding, the total amount of possible recovery, he said, "might run into millions." He said the sales were made under approximately 365 contracts with the Navy Bureau of Supply and Accounts.

The suits are against the Rockbestos Products Corporation and Arthur G. Newton, its president; General Electric Co.; Okonite Co., and Frank C. Jones, its president; Collyer Insulated Wire Co., and Robert C. Moeller, its secretary-treasurer; Phelps-Dodge Copper Products Corporation; the American Steel & Wire Co. of New Jersey; General Cable Co. and Dwight R. G. Palmer, its president; National Electric Products Corporation and William C. Robinson, Sr., president; Anaconda Wire & Cable Co. and W. E. Sprackling, vice president.

According to Mr. McNally, the civil suits grew out of an action, brought in 1942, in which the corporate defendants paid $77,500 to the Government. Mr. McNally added that he filed the suits to forestall an informer suit brought against the same defendants by Israel Beckhardt, of 12 East Forty-fifth Street, who filed a complaint in this district on August 26, 1942. Mr. McNally added he would file soon a formal motion for a stay of the Beckhardt suit.

The complaint of the Government in the present action says that the Rockbestos Co. licensed the other defendants to sell an insulated electric cable, on which the Rockbestos held a patent and "did conspire and agree to submit collusive bids for A. V. C. cable at predetermined and unreasonably high prices."

The Government alleges also that when questions arose among the defendants as to prices contemplated, said questions were submitted to the defendant Rockbestos for its decision. The complaint charges that the defendants received contracts from the Navy Department in excess of $40,000,000, and that the defendants used bills and receipts knowing they contained fictitious statements and entries.

How Women Shall Share in Post-War Policy Making

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech delivered by me at the White House, June 14, where representatives from womens' organizations over the country and especially appointed observers from Government departments and agencies met to discuss how women shall share in post-war policy making:

If post-war planning was ever academic, it certainly has become a realized necessity since D-day, June 6. Now that the second front has been established and the liberation of Europe started, there is less time for post-war planning. This is the real beginning of the end, which is not so distant that we can leisurely prepare for post-war problems.

With this in mind, this particular meeting should be aimed at having women at the peace table and at the many important conferences of the future. Women should be at these conferences from a standpoint of practical necessity rather than the insistence of a fair share of influence. The desire of women to help solve these problems is much deeper than self-interest.

In the past women's rightful participation has been denied through sex discrimination. This war has exposed the fallacy of such discrimination for women have filled innumerable jobs traditionally occupied by men.

Women should be called in to assist in post-war planning—not just because they are women, but because of the knowledge and understanding that they have of certain problems.

As a member of the House Naval Affairs Subcommittee on Congested Areas, I have had an opportunity to observe personally the accomplishments of women everywhere. I have been amazed to learn the high percentages of women workers. I saw them in hospitals, in shipyards, aircraft plants, torpedo factories, and many other war activities all over the country. All of this has made an indelible impression upon me. Many of these women have become experienced and skilled workers and have replaced men who are fighting the war.

There will be the problem of readjustment when these people return from the congested war areas to take up normal activities, all looking for work which will not be of a war nature. This presents a very difficult problem.

Time is short. We cannot be leisurely in finding a solution for these complicated problems. As the men who have been fighting the war return there will be some inevitable conflicts as to whether the jobs are to be retained by the women or returned to the men. In order to approach the solution of such a problem with proper balance and equity it will obviously be necessary to have representatives of women as well as men to make final decisions.

It has been my privilege as a member of the House Naval Affairs Committee to visit naval establishments over the country, to see the work the women in the services—the WAVES, the SPARS, the MARINES, the WAC's, and the nurses. Here, again, is a problem—the orderly demobilization of these women from the services and their return to civilian life.

It was my recent work at the I. L. O. conference which gave special emphasis to my study of post-war problems. While I was greatly honored in being the only Representative from the House, it was a greater satisfaction to me to see proper recognition given to women. Women from several nations were representing government, industry, and labor.

I believe that splendid progress was made not only in crystallizing the rights and duties of labor, but in maintaining the right of women to equal opportunity and reward, and in cementing the international friendship that comes from personal meeting between people of different countries.

Actually, it was a conference attended by officially appointed representatives of each member government, and each country's organized workers and organized employers. The I. L. O. was founded in Washington just 25 years ago, and its purpose has been to standardize and improve protection which can be given by local and national legislation to workers, especially women and children.

The Philadelphia conference went into new territory and recognized the importance of international cooperation to meet the common, social, and economic problems of ordinary people—all men, women, and children in this country and all over the globe.

An I. L. O. recommendation of great importance deals with the organization of employment in the transition from war to peace. It directs attention to the problems involved in the redistribution of women workers in each national economy which has been disrupted by the war.

This broad recommendation is intended to promote full employment with a view to satisfying the vital needs of the population and raising the standard of living throughout the world. It points out that the redistribution of women workers "should be carried out on the principle of complete equality of opportunity for men and women in respect of admission to employment on the basis of their individual merit, skill, and experience, and steps should be taken to encourage the establishment of wage rates on the basis of job content without regard to sex."

As a primary responsibility in carrying out the objectives set up at the Philadelphia conference, it is our duty to see to it that women have a share in transmitting these ideals into practical action. Our women have shown that they can make a valuable contribution in setting up the program. It ought to be obvious that the execution of the program needs their thought and action.

The foundation on which the peace will be built is being laid in these international conferences, the I. L. O. at Philadelphia, the Food Conference at Hot Springs, the Monetary conference to be held in Bretton Woods, N. H., in a few days, and others.

The presence of women at all of these conferences illustrates the increasing participation which women are taking in the planning of a post-war world. More than that, they are evidences of a recognition that women have much to contribute to that planning.

The recommendations and plans made at these conferences can be translated into positive action only through the legislative and executive branches of the various governments of this world. Obviously such recommendations and plans will include problems best understood by women. Because of this it is of the utmost importance that women be adequately represented in Congress and in the Executive Department.

We shall need women who have been trained in special fields, to sit on decisive bodies, and that is where a list of women whose backgrounds fit them for various services will be helpful. At least this would eliminate the excuse that appointing officials didn't know where to find competent women.

There are many varied fields in which women's influence should be felt, and there are many qualified women in these fields. While qualifications gained from training and education are of great value, it is experience in the field of human relations that is the most valuable asset of women.

Most women are wives and mothers, and their great demand is for a Nation and a world in which their families may be prosperous and live happily. That demand should be represented at every meeting in which decisions are made—but the demand should be made by women of intelligence, courage, and experience or their cause is lost in sentimentality.

It is not enough to have the desire to help. Women must be qualified to serve well, because unqualified and incompetent women forfeit their own opportunity and discourage the appointment of other women.

We must be constructive in our cooperation and as we continue to urge recognition we must at the same time realize that we are asking for jobs that carry with them tremendous responsibility. Women are ready and willing to accept the resulting burdens along with the privileges of the authority.

Wasted Paper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. ANTON J. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a large brown envelope 12 inches by 16 inches, made of heavy good-quality paper. This envelope containing a single small thin sheet of printed information relative to patents listed with Office of Alien Property Custodian. Any regular-sized letter envelope should have sufficed very efficiently.

I quote part of a letter from a businessman. No wonder he was incensed:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am enclosing herewith a large expensive envelope that was received in our office this morning; and also a very small thin circular that was enclosed in the large envelope.

Just after this envelope, with enclosure was received, a representative from the carton manufacturer from whom we obtain our supply of shipping cartons, called on us to explain a recent ruling that was made by a department in the War Production Board whereby the allotment on shipping containers was cut a further 15 percent due to shortage of materials of which cartons are manufactured.

Both in our factories and in our office we have been saving every scrap of paper that we could accumulate and delivering it to our local junk yard with a view of making an effort to increase the supply of scrap paper.

It certainly burns one up to be doing all of this and be deprived of cartons in which to ship your products and then to find out the very great extravagance and waste that some of our very unimportant bureaus are practicing as in the case that I am referring to you. We can understand waste and extravagance in the prosecution of the war when it saves the lives of our young men in the services, but for unimportant bureaus of our Government to practice such extravagance and waste as is shown in the instance I am calling your attention to—we cannot understand.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. [1] Preliminary.
[2] Includes cattle and calves, hogs, sheep and lambs, milk, chickens, eggs (chicken), turkeys, and gross income from commercial broilers.

While there appears to be a rather questionable distribution it must be borne in mind that many factors are involved. Soybeans were sent to cottonseed mills for processing, but the resulting meal was not returned to the point of origin or where grown. The imports were not included which might have been beneficial to border States such as Texas, close to the cottonseed-meal supply of Mexico.

In addition: Wisconsin is now receiving sufficient urea (made from the nitrogen of the air) in a quantity that is equivalent to make 1,000 tons per month of protein feed, according to the letter of transmittal accompanying the data obtained from the War Food Administration.

One fact is evident. This protein feed was not diverted nor was it allocated in keeping with the livestock food produced in the various States.

Development of the St. Lawrence River

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER FERGUSON

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] before the Lions and Rotary Clubs of Rutland, Vt., on May 8, 1944, in relation to the St. Lawrence waterway.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am glad of the opportunity to talk to you folks in Rutland tonight about the world's greatest natural; undeveloped resource and the bill which I have introduced into Congress, which would develop it for the benefit of the people of the United States and Canada.

Interest in the St. Lawrence seaway dates back 300 years. Way back in colonial days a canal 2 feet deep was dug around part of the International Rapids section to facilitate canoe transportation. Later a 6-foot canal was dug and still later on one with a depth of 9 feet. Finally the Canadian Government constructed a canal with a depth of 14 feet so that ships could bypass the International Rapids between New York State and the Province of Ontario.

Most of the shipping on the Great Lakes, however, is now carried in ships that draw a depth of 20 feet or so and, likewise, most of the ocean shipping is carried in ships of greater draft. Therefore, only a limited amount of freight tonnage is carried through the present 14-foot canal.

A generation ago officials of the United States and Canada began to talk about the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin. In 1909, the Boundary Waters Treaty was negotiated by Elihu Root for the United States and Ambassador James Bryce for Great Britain. This treaty provided for an investigation and report on projects for the further improvement of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system. It also provided means by which special agreements regarding the improvement of this great water system might be effectuated by concurrent legislation of the United States Congress and the Canadian Parliament.

Although every President from the time of Woodrow Wilson has recommended the improvement of the St. Lawrence waterway, yet it remained for our own President Calvin Coolidge to make the first earnest request of Congress for the development of the great power and navigation project of the St. Lawrence River.

As an effective reply to those who say that we cannot afford the money for this project, I wish to quote further from President Coolidge's message to Congress on December 6, 1923:

"This is not incompatible with economy, for their nature does not require so much a public expenditure as a capital investment which will be reproductive. * * * Upon these projects depends much future industrial and agricultural progress. They represent the protection of large areas from flood, and the addition of a great amount of cheap power and cheap freight by use of navigation, chief of which is the bringing of ocean-going ships to the Great Lakes."

The reference to protection from flood evidently refers to the program for the improvement of the Colorado and Mississippi Rivers, which President Coolidge urged in the same message.

President Hoover and President Roosevelt have both consistently recommended the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway to the Congress, but opponents have so far been strong enough to prevent the approval of this development.

Three years ago, the House Rivers and Harbors Committee approved the project by a two to one vote, but we got into the war about then and before action was taken by the House that Congress expired.

The bill which I have introduced is now considered purely as a post-war proposition and, I may say, appears to have a better chance of being accepted by the Congress than it has had up to this time. Several Members who have previously been unalterably opposed to the seaway have indicated to me their intention of supporting it now. Therefore, it is well that everyone should know just what the seaway development is and what it will mean to us here in northeastern United States.

The bill which I have introduced gives the approval of Congress to an agreement entered into on March 19, 1941, between the United States and Canada. This agreement provides for the construction of a large dam at Massena, N. Y., and locks and canals which will provide a minimum depth of 27 feet. This will permit all but the largest ships of our Navy and merchant marine to pass to and from the Great Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean. This, of course, will permit ships to load at any of the ports on the Great Lakes and to transport their cargoes to the markets of the world without the necessity of unloading these cargoes, transporting them overland, and then reloading them at seaports on the Atlantic coast.

It will also mean that raw materials and other goods used in the great industrial and consuming areas of the Great Lakes Basin can be loaded on ships at any port in the world and brought through the St. Lawrence River and canal to the Great Lakes ports at the same saving of time and expense which would otherwise be lost in the unloading, transshipment, and reloading procedure.

I will not attempt to go into detail tonight concerning the saving which would be effectuated in transportation costs. That is a highly technical matter. Midwest shippers testify that there would be a saving of 8 to 10 cents a bushel on grain shipped to the export trade, and a corresponding saving on many other classes of freight.

The St. Lawrence waterway would be used largely for the transportation of bulk cargoes consisting of grain, meats, oil, coal, automobiles, iron and steel products, and other goods and crops produced in our great Midwest area. Imports using the canal would very likely consist of coffee, rubber, citrus fruits, cottonseed meal, lumber, sulphur, and other items imported from other parts of our country and other countries of the world.

The maximum additional increase in the amount of United States freight which could be borne through the canal is approximately 10,000,000 tons a year, which, as I will point out later, is only a very small part of the anticipated increase in the amount of freight tonnage for which transportation must be found in the near future.

The dam at Massena, besides being used for the improvement of water transportation, would also be used for the development of electrical energy. The installed capacity of the power development will be 2,200,000 horsepower, one-half of which would belong to the Province of Ontario and the other half to the State of New York.

There is no question of States' rights involved in the St. Lawrence development because the right of New York and Ontario to this power is clearly recognized.

Army engineers tell us that because of the even flow of the St. Lawrence River, the production of electrical energy at Massena might reach a total of over 13,000,000,000 kilowatts a year or three times the capacity of the great Dneiper Dam in Russia.

The power development, when completed, will be turned over to the State of New York and the Province of Ontario to be operated by them. In return for this, the State of New York will be required to repay to the United States the sum of $93,375,000, with interest at 3 percent, over a 50-year period. I presume that the Province of Ontario will be required to do the same for the Dominion of Canada.

The total cost of the seaway and power project, as estimated by the War Department, is $421,474,515, of which the United States is to pay $277,056,515 and Canada $144,418,000. Deducting $93,000,000 chargeable to the State of New York, the estimated cost of the project to the United States would be approximately $184,000,000.

The reason for the United States being required to bear the greater share of the cost of the project in this. It appears that back in 1926 American and Canadian officials entered into a gentlemen's agreement concerning the improvement of the St. Lawrence seaway. By this agreement, which, so far as I know, was never authorized by the legislature of either country, each country was to match dollar for dollar the cost of improvements which might be made by the other country. Canada reconstructed the Welland Canal and is being given credit for that in the agreement signed March 19, 1941, to the amount of $133,000,000.

Thus, by constructing the seaway and power development at the same time, the great inland empire of the United States is furnished with access to the sea for ocean-going vessels, while New York and Ontario will get harnessed the largest undeveloped water power in all North America, but which they will have to pay for over a period of years.

The greatest objective of the St. Lawrence development is the elimination of the 48-mile bottleneck which landlocks our inland empire with its 45,000,000 population.

The second objective is the development of 2,200,000 horsepower to be used for the benefit of people and industry here in northeastern United States and adjoining Canada.

Now, some of you may ask why the people of Vermont should be interested in this great development when we have so little water shipping and when New York and Ontario are to own all the power that is developed.

There are many reasons why Vermont should be interested in the St. Lawrence seaway. First and foremost is the over-all fact that it is the creation of great wealth for our entire Nation and that, of course, helps every State. But, to be a little more specific, I will say that my bill provides that inasmuch as the power development is to be constructed by the Federal Government in connection with the seaway development, New York must agree to share that power with neighboring States and those neighboring States would be Vermont and New Hampshire.

Northwestern Vermont is within the hundred mile radius of Massena. All Vermont, except Brattleboro and a few towns in Windham County are within a hundred and fifty-mile radius. All of Vermont, nearly all of New Hampshire, nearly half of Massachusetts, and a portion of western Maine are within the 200-mile radius. In fact, all of our State is nearer to the great power development than is the city of Buffalo or the city of New York.

St. Lawrence power will probably be the cheapest power in the world. It will be developed for about 1 mill per kilowatt-hour. It can be delivered in Burlington and St. Albans for about 2 mills per kilowatt-hour, and in any place in Vermont for approximately 2½ mills.

It would enable the northeastern part of this country to hold or attract industry which we are otherwise surely going to lose. During the war, we have had to use all industrial facilities wherever located, but after the war industry will be found principally where it can produce cheapest and best.

We have had a shortage of electricity here in the north country and industrial plants in the St. Lawrence Valley have had to use steam power generated on the Atlantic coast and transmitted 300 miles to the very place where two and a quarter million horsepower rushes by unharnessed. This electric power used for the manufacture of aluminum at Massena, N. Y., costs between 6 and 7 mills per kilowatt-hour as compared with 2.2 mills per kilowatt-hour which the aluminum plants on the Pacific coast pay.

We also loaned to the Aluminum Co. of Canada a hundred million dollars for the construction of a power plant and aluminum plant on the Shipsaw River in Canada.

We often hear it said that we will not need this power after the war. I want to call your attention to what happened after the First World War.

In 1915 the total production of electricity in America amounted to 16,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours. In 1916, when we were preparing for war, the production jumped to 21,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours. In 1918 this had increased to 33,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

The war ended that year. Did the use and production of electric power decrease It most certainly did not. In 1919 it increased still further to nearly 39,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours. In 1920 it went up to 43,000,000,000. It dropped slightly in 1921 and then shot up to 47,000,000,000 in 1922. From then on production increased steadily until in 1929 it had reached the enormous total of 95,925,000,000 kilowatt-hours. There was a slight drop during the great depression years when our industrial plants were idle and then production climbed upward again. By 1940 it had reached the total of 144,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours and in 1943—the latest figures availablee show that the United States produced a grand total of 220,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity or nearly 10 times the amount which was used during the First World War.

There isn't the slightest doubt but that this power will be needed and used at the close of this war provided it is made available to the American people at reasonable rates.

We are becoming more and more dependent on electricity with each passing year, and there is no indication that the saturation point is yet in sight. Every farm, every home, every industry in America will use more and more as time goes on.

We are entering the age of nonferrous metal production and use. The production of aluminum is now measured in billions of pounds. It requires 10 kilowatt-hours of electricity to produce a pound of aluminum.

Magnesium has entered permanently into the field of commercial metal production and will be used more and more where the lightness of the metal used is important. We have plenty of material with which to manufacture magnesium right here in Vermont if cheap electric power is available in quantity.

The electric torch will be used on public works, shipbuilding, and construction projects to an extent not dreamed of before the war. The tremendous chemical industry with its scientific advances necessitated by war will continue as the peacetime servant of the people.

Farmers today are using low-cost nitrate fertilizer as a result of new discoveries which can only be utilized if electric power is plentiful and cheap. The farmers of America will never willingly go back to the days of high-priced nitrogen. If perchance they are forced to do so, then they will be unable to compete with the rest of the world in the production of crops.

Since the war began thousands upon thousands of farms in our north country have been equipped with electric milking machines and water coolers. Barns have been wired for lighting. Only through this increased use of electricity has the American farmer been able to produce the enormous crops which have been demanded of him. During this past year, in spite of the scarcity of material, the emergency has been so great that the War Production Board has authorized the extension of electricity to 78,000 farms on the rural electrification systems alone. How many more farms have been connected by the private utilities I cannot say, but the number must be very great.

There are still millions of rural homes and farms in America that are not served by electric light and power. We cannot consider our rural life in America very near perfect so long as this condition prevails. Many countries of Europe are far ahead of us in this respect. The countries of South America and other parts of the world are rapidly catching up. We must not be content until every farm home in America is equipped for electricity.

As I look into the future I see millions of rural homes where farm families live richer and happier lives because of new electrical appliances. I see electric hay dryers making the farmer independent of weather conditions. I see on every farm and in every village home and even in the apartment houses of the cities quick freezing facilities and storage which will tremendously cut the cost of living.

Farmers will be living on fruit and vegetables and meats of their own production the year around. Town and city people will be buying food in quantity in surplus seasons at low prices and storing it to use in seasons of low supply and high prices. They will use a great amount of electrical energy in doing this.

There will be no surplus of power for long after this war. There may be a year or a year and a half when consumption of electric power will drop. Then history will repeat itself and consumption will become greater than ever before. We will need not only all that is being produced now, but a great deal more that must be secured from new sources.

Now, I want to say just a word about Vermont and water transportation. You all know that most of the gasoline and oil used in Vermont is brought in by water via the Hudson River and Lake Champlain. Because we have a lot of storage for oil and gas is one reason why Vermont farmers did not suffer from a shortage a year ago as did the farmers of some other States.

Lake Champlain is connected with the Hudson River by a canal of 12-foot depth. It is also connected with the St. Lawrence by canal, but this canal part of the way has only 6½ foot depth thus being usable only by light draft boats and barges.

Since I have been in Washington, I have been very seriously urged to request legislation authorizing what is called the Champlain cut-off. That would consist of deepening channels and reconstructing canals so that vessels of greater draft might navigate from New York to the St. Lawrence River.

I have not introduced such a bill for the simple reason that it could not be passed through the Congress at this time, but if the St. Lawrence seaway is developed, the Champlain cut-off will inevitably follow. My Midwest colleagues assure me that they would not only support this Champlain cut-off, but insist upon it because it would add 1 month to the open water season for shipping from the Great Lakes to the sea and would also save some 1,100 miles in distance in shipping from New York City to points on the Great Lakes. I have no hopes of the Champlain cut-off becoming a reality until the St. Lawrence seaway development is completed.

Opponents of the St. Lawrence development have employed the usual arguments against it. I will not attempt to answer them here, although none of them which they offer are very sound.

We hear most frequently the objection that the St. Lawrence development would injure the railroads and private utility companies. Instead of answering this charge myself, I will read to you a statement made by Leo T. Crowley, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, testifying before a House committee on July 3, 1941. Mr. Crowley said:

"It has been contended that the opening of this seaway would harm the railroads and public utilities of the Northeast section of the country. If this were true in any appreciable degree, the security obligations of these businesses would suffer. Since the banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation hold about $850,000,000 of railroad security obligations and $625,000,000 of public-utility security obligations, I could not support this legislation if I thought that the railroads and public utilities would, on the whole, be affected adversely. Fortunately, the evidence indicates that the great advantages of opening up the Great Lakes to ocean traffic will not bring corresponding harm to the railways, and that the energy developed in the St. Lawrence will not hurt the utilities but will rather fit into the long-term growth of our need for power.

"There is, therefore, little possibility that the investment character of railroad and public-utility security obligations will be harmed by the legislation under consideration. Indeed, it may well be that their investment quality will be enhanced. * * *

"It is entirely reasonable to conclude that the eastern roads will be gainers rather than losers on balance."

Then Mr. Crowley goes on to say:

"What I have said relative to the effects of the St. Lawrence project on the railroads applies equally well to the public utilities. The power development will not hurt them and may indirectly benefit them. I have already pointed out that according to the predefense estimates some 2,500,000 more horsepower of energy will have to be made available to the people of New York State in the next 10 years. Inasmuch as the American share of St. Lawrence power, about 1,100,000 horsepower, would provide less than half of this increase in anticipated demand, it is obvious that the hydroelectric development at the International Rapids constitutes no competitive threat whatever to existing public utilities."

These remarks which I have quoted are not taken from the speech of any Socialist orator, but from the statement made by one of America's hardest-headed businessmen and who is responsible for the protection of billions of dollars worth of bank deposits, a large percentage of which are invested in railroad and public utility holdings.

The arguments used to kill the seaway project are quite ingenious. One of the latest is to refer to it as President Roosevelt's baby. It is true that President Roosevelt has indorsed my bill. It is true that Secretary Hull emphatically approves it as does Secretary Stimson and other members of the cabinet, but it is equally true that among its enthusiastic supporters are found such prominent Republicans as Herbert Hoover, Alf Landon, Harold Stassen, Governor Dewey, and others.

It is not a partisan effort in any sense of the word, nor are all utility and railroad interests opposed to it. Many of them see clearly the great advantages which would come, not only to their country, but to themselves and to their businesses as a result of this great development.

Years ago Henry I. Harriman, then president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and formerly president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, had this to say about it, and I quote:

"I am convinced that the St. Lawrence seaway is of the greatest possible importance to the entire North Alantic seaboard as well as to the Middle West, and that New England should unitedly and heartily support the project because it means—

"1. Lower transportation costs on food supplies, hence a lower cost of living;

"2. Lower freight rates on many of the raw materials required by New England's industries; and

"3. Lower freight rates to many markets for New England finished products."

Nobody ever accused Mr. Harriman of advocating any development that would injure New England industry.

I said a short time ago that the capacity of the seaway would be 10,000,000 additional tons of United States freight a year. Based on a study made in 1940, the Department of Commerce estimated that the "average tons of freight originating in the decade of 1950 will probably be between 242,000,000 and 374,000,000 greater than the average of 1930–39. The 10,000,000 tons of additional American traffic which may use the St. Lawrence at maximum utilization would be but a fraction of the expected increase in railroad activity."

This estimate of the increase in freight tonnage was made in 1940 and based on a normal peacetime increase in freight tonnage. Since that estimate was made, America has engaged in the greatest war in history. As a result of this war, there will be an expansion in world commerce that defies the imagination.

I would like to talk to you about this some day, but I know I should not take time tonight, but this estimated increase of between 242,000,000 and 374,000,000 tons of freight in the decade of 1950 will fall far short of the actual increase.

To handle the tremendous volume of national and international trade, America must have a coordinated transportation system consisting of airways, highways, railways, and waterways.

The 10,000,000 tons of additional bulk freight carried through the St. Lawrence canal will be a great help in meeting our problem, but it will not be enough. We must have expansion of other forms of transportation, including railway transportation.

Let us not be blind to the fact that here in New England and New York we can share in this great increase of national and international trade. We shall have to get it from a competitive world, however. It will not be handed to us on a silver platter. The St. Lawrence seaway and power development can be the biggest factor of all in helping us to maintain our economic balance.

America's Opportunity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD H. BURTON

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "America's Opportunity," which I delivered at the fifty-seventh annual convention of the Oregon Newspaper Publishers' Association at Eugene, Oreg., June 17, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

America's opportunity is at hand. It is a priceless opportunity for helpful leadership in the world's greatest war and the world's greatest peace. Our success in meeting this opportunity will be the measure of our fitness for the destiny to which our forefathers so nobly dedicated this Nation. I welcome, therefore, this chance to discuss it with you newspapermen, whose constant duty it is to discover opportunities and to help your communities, your States, and your Nation to rise to meet them.

We are at the crisis of this war. We and our allies must win this war completely in both hemispheres as quickly as we can. All that we say or do must be so said and done that it will help to win this war At our firesides, on our farms, and in our factories, as well as on every fighting front, each of us must do his full share. Our fighters have set the standard at perfection. Our farms and our factories must equal or exceed their already extraordinary records. No hour of production can be spared. Each hour must be a tribute of service worthy of the high price of our front-line victory.

Our first opportunity is to bring into our own homes a unity of spirit worthy of America's highest hopes and dearest dreams. Sound homes are a nation's greatest strength in war as well as in peace. It is for us to develop the full wartime value of cordial, vigorous helpfulness in our homes and of cheerful, frequent, personal letters to the front. The heartbeat of the home makes the pulsebeat of the world.

Winning the war calls also for unwavering unity throughout our Nation and among all of our allies. As long as the peace-loving nations were divided they were losing the war. As long as they faced the Axis separately the Axis crushed them. Almost at the last possible moment they joined hands and the tide of battle turned.

The United Nations are winning today because of their unity everywhere—on the battle fronts, economic fronts, political fronts, and within their own borders. The principal problem of the peace will be to preserve and extend this war-born unity with the greatest possible fairness, freedom, and stability for all.

While America is fighting this war it must also prepare the way for the peace to follow. A just and lasting peace calls for at least as many months of planning and preparation as does a major military victory. While our soldiers fight for us at the front, it is our duty to make sure that when this war is won it shall stay won. To use a military term, it is for us "to consolidate the gains" they shall have made.

TWO FUNDAMENTAL NEEDS

In America's opportunity to help establish and maintain such a peace, there are at least two propositions that should be made clear:

1. That international peace and stability is a domestic necessity—for America's own recovery and progress.

2. That America's recovery, progress, and cooperation is an international necessity—for the peace and stability of the world.

The important thing is to look squarely at the facts of the post-war world and to act on those facts with the same speed, intelligence, and cooperation as that with which we fight the war.

Looking at the facts, we see that America will face post-war recovery under the greatest handicap of taxation in her history. We shall have to convert our wartime economy of governmentally financed and dominated industry to privately financed competitive enterprise under a debt 10 times what it was before the war. This debt of $300,000,000,000 will be evidenced by bonds of the United States held by every church, trustee, insurance company, and practically every family in America. Defaults on them or their interest are unthinkable. Such defaults would mean an economic collapse in America that would make the last depression look like prosperity. It would lead to such scarcities and to such a regimentation of our lives that we would wonder whether we had lost, instead of won, the war against totalitarian government. There must be no such defaults. Yet, so as to pay the taxes to meet the interest on these bonds, our taxpaying public will need to earn a national income far greater than before the war. To do this we must produce, distribute, and sell more useful products than before the war. I am confident that if American industry, labor, agriculture, and government work together this income can be earned, this interest can be paid, and America's program of increased and fairly distributed opportunities for all can and will survive.

We can do all this because we now have the plants, the machines, the skilled workmen, the skilled supervision, the record of wartime production, the raw materials, the transportation, and the demand for the goods that make it possible. This new wealth is available in such new developments as those in aviation, radio, electric power, Diesel power, automotive power, electric welding, plastics, chemistry, electronics, new uses of wood and glass, housing improvements, sulfa drugs, and countless other developments that have sprung from recent research.

This program calls for the intelligent handling of Government contract terminations and for the prompt clearing out of wartime machinery and materials to make room for peacetime production. It calls for easy financing of the reconversion and for prompt disposal of Government surplus property. It calls for reasonable unemployment compensation and for the well-planned direction of war workers and soldiers into new work in which they are needed.

It will not be easy, but such a well-ordered program will be possible on one condition. That is the all-important condition of international peace, international stability, and a reasonable assurance of international stability for a substantial number of years ahead. If there be no such stability, we shall be forced into deficit financing of armaments instead of balancing our Budget. When private capital should be moving into creative industry, it will be drained off in taxes. Individual initiative will be training troops in mechanized maneuvers instead of plowing the productive fields of peaceful prosperity.

THE SENATE'S RESOLUTION

Our own domestic recovery, therefore, calls for vigorous American leadership in helping to establish international stability. To this call, the Senate of the United States has responded with its resolution on international policy. This resolution was adopted last November 5, by a vote of 85 to 5. It was adopted so as to advise our President, our people, and our allies of our policy.

I invite your attention to four points connected with it: First, it speaks not only for the Senate of the United States, it also has the official approval of Great Britain, Russia, and China; second, it calls for action at the earliest practicable date; third, it calls for the inclusion of all peace-loving states, large and small; fourth, it calls for the establishment of a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security. It thus provides for a living and flexible organization of all peace-loving states, rather than for a static alliance among a few of them to the exclusion of the rest.

Let us be true to it, for peace and stability depend as much upon the integrity and firmness with which nations keep faith with one another as upon the terms of the policies they adopt. It was upon his integrity and firmness that George Washington established our Nation. It is upon our integrity and firmness that the peace of the world will now depend.

The language of the Senate which states our policy is as follows: "Resolved, That the Senate recognizes the necessity of there being established at the earliest practicable date a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security."

The phrase, "based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states" refers to a condition familiar to Americans. It is illustrated by the sovereign equality of the States of New York and Rhode Island. They are equally sovereign but quite differently represented in one of the Houses of Congress which determine the policies of common concern to both.

From the point of view of the simplest common sense, the first step to maintain international peace and stability will be to keep together the combination that made it possible.

This does not mean that any superstate must be organized. It does not mean that there must be a single "superarmy." We know this because it is not taking such a superstate nor such a superarmy to win the war.

It does mean, however, that our minimum degree of post-war unity should at least equal that which shall have won the war.

ONLY A FAIR DEAL IS A GOOD DEAL

The problem will not be the creation of a particular form of union as much as it will be the retention of that all-inclusive world-wide unity of purpose that the war has given us. It must be cordial, practical, and fair. Only fairness to all can be supported by all.

Only a fair deal is a good deal.

While the separation of any one of the United Nations from the rest probably would not at once mean war, it would at once substitute uncertainty for certainty. It would mark a point where a break might later come. It would suggest the pattern of another war.

From two world wars in one generation should come at least one great benefit. We who have been forced into this second and greater war at least should agree not to take again the same road that led us from the first war to the second. Millions of dead hands warn us away from that road of attempted retirement from the responsibilities of modern civilization. However attractive its entrance may appear, we now know that it leads only to war.

MILITARY POINT OF VIEW

From the military point of view, the first condition of allied stability is that the championship military team of the United Nations remain readily available. This team will not need to be something strange and new. It will not be a Gestapo nor a force of men separated from their usual citizenship and loyalties. Its members must not be separated from ready resources of food, equipment, and supplies behind them.

The size of our present military forces will be greatly cut down to match the needs of peace. As long as the Allies all remain on the same side they can well afford to reduce their forces to those needed only to insure the maintenance of international order against gangsters of the future who may violate the terms of the peace.

Such international police power is an essential arm of international law. The enforcing officers will not be making war. They will be maintaining peace. They will be "peace officers" on an international scale. They will make the inspections agreed upon by the treaty of peace. In some fields they will be authorized to act at once on the basis of overt acts violating the peace. The safety of the world will be increased by enabling these forces to extinguish international blazes while those blazes are small. In other fields they will need the order of an international court, board of arbitration, or policy-forming body to put them into action.

ECONOMIC POINT OF VIEW

From the economic point of view, international stability will call for a program of access, on reasonable terms, to the trade and raw materials of the world. It will call for orderly encouragement and development of such world-wide activities as those of civil aviation, cable and radio communication, water transportation, petroleum supply, availability of funds for international trade, and some restriction of armaments. There will be need for protection against economic dictatorships as well as against political dictatorships. There also will be need to recognize the value of certain home industries to the respective nations, especially in fields affecting national defense and some such essential commodities as those of food, clothing, and shelter.

POLITICAL POINT OF VIEW

From the political point of view, the simplest common sense calls for the decentralization of as many as possible of our international problems. If afforded the opportunity to do so, many nations will be attracted to one another within the natural regions of their common interests. The Pan American Union represents our attempt to separate the problems of our region from those of the Eastern Hemisphere. Such a policy removes many conflicts of interest from a global to a regional area. It further reduces the need for an administrative superstate to administer the affairs of the 2,000,000,000 people of the world.

This program encourages nations to use their sovereign powers to enter into regional agreements with one another to their mutual advantage and at the same time establish the all-important world-wide international organization, with specific and limited authority, which is the central feature of our Senate resolution.

Such a use of sovereign contracting powers corresponds to the use which individuals make of their individual powers to enter into mutually beneficial contracts. This is the foundation of civilization. The underlying ethics of it are those of the Golden Rule, "Whatsoever ye would that others should do to you, do ye even so to them."

AMERICA'S INTERNAL POLICIES

Turning to our second proposition, America's recovery, progress, and cooperation is an international necessity for the peace and stability of the world.

Assuming that we shall secure the international stability necessary for civilization to survive, America still will face the critical problems of her own internal recovery and development. Our success is vital to our allies and theirs to us. No nation should forget the world, for the economic recovery of the world is essential to the survival of peace and stability.

Within America, there are at least five lines of progress calling for our vigorous support. These are those of greater production, fairer taxes, fairer relations with one another, better standards of living for all, and deeper faith in God and man.

GREATER PRODUCTION

Greater production and sale of American products is the key to the greater national income we must have to pay our post-war debt and taxes. A successful program of great production will mean prosperity in place of depression. It will call for the development of improved sources of mechanical power, improved means of transportation, and the study of every field of new productive knowledge—from the spaceless range of the radio to the invisibly small electron. It will encourage small business and large. It will restrain the abuse of monopoly. It will guide our national transition from our economy of war to our economy of peace. It will reduce the hardships of unemployment by providing employment. It will lessen the present restrictions on agriculture.

FAIRER TAXES

As to fairer taxes, our first need is to stop governmental waste. Our second is to adjust the Federal, State, and local tax burdens to a fairer distribution of them. Our third need is to announce a proposed schedule of Federal tax reductions in ample time so that it may be made the basis of production schedules.

FAIRER RELATIONS

Fairer relations with one another have to do with teamwork in industry, in agriculture, and in our lives in general. Fairness is the key to all sound human relations. It should apply to the relations between labor, management, and the public. Equality of opportunity is the answer to most complaints of economic discrimination. A widespread purpose of mutual helpfulness is essential.

BETTER STANDARDS OF LIVING

Better standards of living for all will come from such greater production, fairer taxes, and fairer human relations. There is need, however, for governmental understanding that the best road to better standards of living is the road of increased earnings rather than that of increased subsidies. The Government, however, should continue to recognize the value of insuring its people against major losses in their earning capacities. Old age, social security, and unemployment compensation are well worth the payment of advance premiums both by the individual employee and the Government. The needs of the returning veteran and of his family are a special trust of the Federal Government. The veteran's service was rendered to the Nation as a whole and should entitle him to equal recognition everywhere in the Nation.

DEEPER FAITH

Deeper faith is needed in God, our fellowmen, and ourselves. Our Nation was founded upon faith in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. We need to guide our increasingly important policies toward humanity by the will of God in its broadest application. The nearer we can see with His perspective the clearer will be our view.

Our Government was founded also upon firm faith in the people of America. We need to practice that faith today. This means full faith in the ability of the people of America to choose their own public representatives. It means faith in the devotion of those representatives to the public interest. It means observance of the constitutional reservation of certain powers to the people and to the States. It means recognition of the distribution of all Federal powers among the three branches of our Government. It means an increased faith in the loyalty and dependability of American citizens whether they be at the front, in the factories, on the farms, or at the firesides of this Nation. "America is not so much a place as it is a people." Its people have come from all over the world to make America the realization of their hopes for humanity. Faith in the people of America is the key to the understanding of America.

LINCOLN'S ADVICE

Finally, let us turn to Lincoln for advice in this time of crisis, for he faced issues comparable to ours and we can learn much from him.

He stated his governmental philosophy in these words: "As I would not be a slave, so I would not be a master. This expresses my idea of democracy. Whatever differs from this, to the extent of the difference, is no democracy." He thus set up a true test of faith in self-government. No one wants to be the slave of another but until he also reaches Lincoln's conviction that he does not want to be the master of someone else who shall be his slave, he has not caught the spirit of America.

America is dedicated to the principles that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, and that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. America should remain so dedicated. It should be careful, therefore, to see to it that its Government be always a Government of, for, and by all the people. It never should accept a dictatorship by any minority or by any group of minorities or even by any majority seeking to govern the Nation for themselves rather than as trustees for all the people. Our Government should be a representative government freely chosen by the people under their constitutional processes and serving as a trustee for all the people, rich or poor, employer or employee, farmer or office worker, regardless of race, color, or creed. There must be fairness to the minority, even though it be a minority of one, as well as fairness to the majority. America to be true to her purpose must be a Nation dedicated to a fair deal to all.

As we face these critical days of war we turn instinctively to the words of Lincoln in 1865. These words from his second inaugural address are cut into the eternal stone of the Lincoln Memorial and have become a part of the creed of America. His determination to press the war to a decisive conclusion was as fixed then as ours is fixed now. Yet through it all he held clearly before this Nation its fundamental faith in God and man, and he gave to America this statement of America's eternal post-war policy, to which I now urge all to repair:

"With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the Nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

Address by Hon. Burton K. Wheeler, of Montana, at Economic Leadership Conference, New York City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a speech delivered by me at the economic leadership conference and dinner in New York City on June 15, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUND AMERICAN POLICY

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a distinct honor to have been invited to speak before this economic leadership conference and dinner, sponsored by the American Tariff League. After all, it is no secret that I am regarded by some people in this country as a provincial from the back country, a man of narrow nationalistic views, an isolationist. It may even be that the thought behind my being invited here was to look over a specimen of genus Americanus. But let me assure you that more than a quarter of a century's experience in public life convinces me that not infrequently I react to public questions in pretty much the same manner as do very substantial numbers of plain American people—people who do little talking or writing, but whose franchise is largely determinative of what final American policy shall be.

This evening I intend to speak to Americans about American policies—foreign and domestic. I fully realize my shortcoming in this field—I am not a silk-hatted, spat-wearing diplomat; I do not speak a half-dozen foreign tongues; I do not agree that fascism is good in some places and bad in others, or that communism is fine when its adherents are our friends and dangerous only when they are our enemies. I think both are bad for the people's liberties and freedoms. I am just a plain American citizen whose ancestors have lived here for more than 300 years, and I confess that in my old-fashioned way I believe that this country and its Government and institutions are better than any other on earth. I shall try to express to you how I see the problems that now face the American people.

You people here, of course, are interested vitally in American foreign policy because today our domestic policies are so dependent upon our present and future foreign policies. Ours is the greatest industrial nation, and I understand that your organization represents those industrial interests in our land who are concerned with selling American goods and services. I have read, with a great deal of interest, your declaration of principles. I doubt if there can be any basic disagreement with its four major tenets. But the problems of unfair competition, monetary policy, international exchange stability, the provisions of the reciprocal trade agreements, or tariff rates—all these sink into insignificance compared with what we do in the way of a foreign policy.

These matters can be adjusted to the betterment of national welfare when a secure and stable peace comes to the world; without such a peace they are merely words on the sands of a beach washed away with each rise of the tide.

Since America's entry into the war, I have not taken part in much public speaking. I have felt that the first job was to win the war—to win it fast with the least expenditure of life and treasure.

But now it is time that the United Nations did something definite and concrete in the way of hastening the end of the war by diplomatic as well as military measures—and something definite and concrete in the way of planning for the peace.

And if the United Nations cannot at the moment reach complete agreement, that fact should not deter our Nation from itself doing something.

The foreign policy of a Nation is ordinarily dictated and motivated by the national aims of that state. This being so, it is relatively clear why Germany fights, or England fights, or Russia fights, or why Poland and Finland and Greece fought. What are our national aims and what are we fighting for? It is not enough to answer—kill or be killed. That, like all half-truths, is misleading. We stultify our national heritage if we regard this merely as a war of survival. We betray our sacred honor and the lives of thousands of our countrymen if we admit for one moment that our objective is solely to whip the aggressor. That theory leads to the conclusion that war is inevitable. It may be—none of us can be certain about that—but surely the military subjugation of the enemy must be only a means to an end if this Nation's principles and objectives are not to become suspect all over the world.

Are we spilling blood of American boys up and down Europe to crush national socialism, or monarchism, or limited democracy, and pave the way for the establishment of communism? Have we changed our role from that of protector of the weak to destroyer of minorities? What do we demand of the enemy before we stop killing him? What kind of governments do we want in Europe and Asia after the war? Are we to continue to fight interminably—exhausting our financial and economic and natural resources—and even more important, the flower of our young manhood, until we have become a nation of women, old men, and cripples, bankrupt in men and materials? Isn't it time that we should do as Pope Pius said last week, and I quote:

"It is * * * of the greatest importance that this fear (of a war of extermination) should give way to a well-founded expectation of honorable solutions; solutions that are not ephemeral or carry the germs of fresh turmoil and dangers to peace, but are true and durable; solutions that start from the principle that wars, today, no less than in the past, cannot easily be laid to the account of peoples, as such."

These questions bring sharply into focus, it seems to me, the fact that we have failed to exploit a means of speeding the successful conclusion of the war.

It is the absence of a simple, clearly understandable policy of what we fight for—what are our peace aims. Our war aims are clear enough—to destroy the enemy's will to resist—to uproot Hitlerism. Fears exist that new dictatorships will replace the old. What everyone desires is the disappearance of all forms of autocracy. That is the earnest prayer of distressed and police-ridden Europe! It is the prayer of the people of the United States as well. But it must be evident that there is no coordination between these war aims and the peace aims, and that lack of coordination may cost this Nation and our allies precious lives that need not be lost.

It must be realized, of course, that it is no easy thing to bring quickly into being agreements on such major matters as the future fate of a conquered enemy. I am not unmindful that the leaders of the Allied governments face tremendous difficulties in solving mutually acceptable compromises. But throughout the world, among friendly and enemy nations alike, it is the United States of America which is regarded as the leader, the pace-setter, the arbiter, and above all, the friend of the down-trodden and the enslaved. We have a duty therefore, I believe, to speak—in concert with our Allies if possible, alone if necessary—but to speak forcefully and unequivocally on what our policies are and will be for victor and vanquished alike.

Regardless of the outcome of the war, there still will be German people in Europe, probably a German state. The war is not going to bring death to 65,000,000 Germans. A very substantial number of that German people are probably no more in favor of fascism than we are. The last free elections in Germany proved that conclusively and everything that Hitler has done since must have convinced many millions of Germans that he has brought them to disaster. Just as in France, Poland, Italy, Rumania and all the countries in Europe, there is doubt and worry and wonder as to their post-war government—so in Germany there must be ten times that sort of speculation.

Will there be a nation? Who will govern it? What territories will it comprise? Who will control its political and economic and social policies? What will be expected of the people after the war? These are only a few of the questions that come instantly to mind. And from the Allies, the liberators from the yoke of fascism, are heard two words—"unconditional surrender." Beyond that—ominous silence. What choice do many of these enslaved people have under those circumstances, except to fight on, bitterly and endlessly?

And what will happen in Europe the moment hostilities cease? Will there not be a vacuum—the most tremendous vacuum in government of all recorded history? Most governments in Europe are puppets. They will fall with Hitler, and even the others will totter in the political convulsions that will follow. What an opportunity for power-hungry men—either within those lands or from other lands—to seize control. Under such a situation, war will never end; there will be revolution after revolution; the life and treasure we have expended so fabulously to end dictatorship may well result in the creation of a series of dictators all over Europe, if for no other reason than to bring stability.

That is a result that we must at all costs avoid. We can do much to avert its initial coming into being by taking action now—which will make clear to all the people of the world—the occupied lands, the enemy himself—what we propose to do. And the first immediate effect of any such action will be a definite weakening of the enemy's will to resist, despite all of Hitler's and Goebbels' propaganda.

That is the first problem. Now, what about the second—what do we expect in Europe—what kind of governments can reasonably be established with a chance of successful survival? It is not a question of what we desire—we may desire much, but we must face practical realities of what is possible, what will work in that conflicting religious, social, political, and economic cauldron which is Europe.

It must be abundantly clear that, as Mr. Sumner Welles has said, the future of Europe is something which affects the future of every country. And it also follows that to bring stability, continental Europe must be represented in the decisions which affect the future of Europe.

What we in this country are most interested in is the establishment of some kind of world order in which it will be difficult—I do not say "impossible"; because nothing is impossible—the establishment of a world order in which it will be difficult for nations to become enbroiled in warfare with each other.

Today the United States still is the most powerful Nation on earth—militaristically, economically, financially. Six months ago we had the unquestioned power and prestige to formulate the kind of peace program which we believed would stabilize Europe. Some of that authority and prestige has been frittered away, but it is not yet too late for this Nation to use its authority to convince our Allies of the kind of peace we want.

There are honest and conscientious people here and abroad who believe that such a world order is possible only through a single world government.

But I do not believe that the American people will yield their sovereign right as a free people. I do not believe we want to be ruled, directly or indirectly, by any person, or any council, or any world government not under our direct control. The price we paid for our own freedom was too dear for that.

There are also other honest and conscientious people here and abroad who believe that a stable world order that will keep us out of future wars is possible only through a military alliance of the large allied nations—Britain, Russia, possibly China, and the United States.

But alliances of major powers in all history, and particularly since the Holy Alliance, clearly negates any such contention. Alliances, if history is any judge, tend rather to breed wars. Moreover, an alliance is bound inevitably to involve us more and more deeply in European and Asiatic power politics.

The answer in my opinion, is a federation of European states, a sort of United States of Europe. It is an answer that is buttressed by experience both in the United States and Europe; it is an answer that is practical and workable for Europe and holds out the best guaranty against future involvement in European affairs by this Republic.

Let us explore this idea of an economic federation of Europe—a United States of Europe; let us understand why it is necessary, and why it is more likely to work than any other plan yet considered.

When I returned from a European trip in 1923, after 5 months, I said that the solution for the problems of Europe rested in the establishment of a European federation patterned after our own Government. I thought then that it was an original idea—I learned later that many statesmen had advocated it—notably Briand of France. Today I find myself in the company of such men as Winston Churchill, Anthony Eden, Clement Atlee, and Sir Archibald Sinclair, all of whom both before and after the war, have strongly urged the creation of a federated European state.

Before we look at Europe, let us consider these United States. What do you suppose would have been our history if each of our 48 States maintained exclusive sovereignty with the tariff barriers and business restrictions that flow from sovereignty. We have here the peoples of all Europe; we have customs, religions, social problems and ideas, economic and industrial situations varying from State to State, and certainly from region to region. Yet, we have made a success of union largely because the social, political, and economic problems are considered and treated as national problems.

Basically the problem in Europe is not greatly different. The geographical area is far smaller; the agricultural and industrial problems are more homogeneous; even the ethnic and religious differences are no greater than in our own country.

I see here in America the faces of people from all European countries. I cannot believe that only the good people from those countries have come here and only the bad remain there. I believe these people can get along with each other as well on European soil as they do on American soil. I want to see them try to do so. I want to help them do so for the good of the peoples of Europe and for the good of the peoples of America.

I said a moment ago that we had experience to guide us in Europe as well as in the United States. The future organization of Europe could well be patterned after that of Switzerland. It is well to understand this seeming miracle of Switzerland—a nation made up of 25 little states with different nationalities, languages, traditions, customs, and religions united into a pacific and democratic union in the very heart of boiling and exploding Europe. Like Switzerland, there is no basic reason why the countries of continental Europe cannot be united democratically into a single political and economic entity. I have said this before and I shall say it again—the stabilizing effect upon a world that would be created by a great free-trade area in Europe as a counterpart to the great free-trade area of our own country cannot be overemphasized.

Such a federalized Europe would negate the possibility of a new and resurgent Germany threatening the weaker neighboring states or even obtaining hegemony in Europe.

In such a state, Germans would make up scarcely 20 percent of the total voting population; within it the vast majority of non-German Europeans would be an effective democratic check against Prussian or Yonker control of national policies. Moreover, neither the army, the armament industry, the foreign policy, the currency, nor the national economy would be Germany's, nor that of any other single European state. Germany, or any other European state, would cease to be a threat to the peace and security of the continent and of the world.

Men of great vision have dreamed for years of collaboration between nations—of peaceful adjudications of their differences. How better can this be achieved than through the creation of a great federalized state within Europe, which may bring peace to lands—soaked for centuries with the blood of mankind in futile wars? When the European state reaches stability and strength and experience but not before then possibilities will then ensue for the formation of an international organization of nations juridically able to maintain world peace simply because the hothouse of most wars will have been eliminated.

The longer we wait to openly espouse the idea of such a democratic federation or United States, the more difficult and dangerous will the situation become. Already there are evidences that this policy of wait and see will bring us into troubled waters by war's end. While we wait and see, Russia has not remained idle. I should, perhaps, interpolate here, that I am not criticizing Russia or its leaders. They are pursuing policies which they deem best for the welfare of the Soviet Union. From a purely Russian standpoint, its policy of a weak and disunited Europe with many of its states leaning heavily on the Soviet for economic and military support is readily understandable. What Russia's policy will finally be—whether a Soviet-dominated federation, or an alliance of the border states with Russia, or complete integration within the Soviet of many of the smaller nations may depend largely upon whether we exercise the power we now have to bring about a peace that is in the interest of our people.

Britain's problem is not dissimilar to that of Russia's, although in England there is already a substantial body of public opinion which favors a sort of United States of Europe. Britain, like Russia, throughout her history has been threatened by continental nations. And throughout history she has used the balance of power and disunity in Europe to save her. In Britain, as in the United States, there are men who oppose the impairment of British sovereignty by membership in a European union. The idea of the British Parliament being under the direction of a majority of continental nations is repugnant to them. And there is the even more ominous argument that such an involvement would lead to dismemberment of the Empire, simply because Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa are unwilling to bind themselves to the European continent. These men in Britain are not unwilling, however, to sponsor a European federation which would not include Britain. There are, of course, others in Britain who fear the future with a united Europe and prefer a post-war Europe divided by a new balance of power. It is this segment of British public opinion which, if followed, must inevitably lead to a clash with Russia over the extent of the balance of power to be exercised by these two great States.

Unless the people of Europe are willing to accept some form of federation and work together for a solution of their own economic, social, and political problems then I see no reason why we in the United States should be called upon every 20 years to give of our material resources, feed them, and soak their lands with the blood of American boys.

But there is hope in Britain for the more realistic and practical course. A year before the outbreak of the war, Churchill wrote:

"Why should Europe fear unity? As well might a man fear his own body. * * * I believe that Europe will be driven, sooner or later, to question the monstrous absurdity of her own organization. * * * The conception of a United States of Europe is right. Every step taken to that end which appeases the obsolete hatreds and vanished oppressions, which makes easier the traffic and reciprocal services of Europe, which encourages its nations to lay aside their threatening arms or precautionary panoply, is good in itself, is good for them, and good for all."

Mr. Atlee, leader of the Labor Party, has said that "Europe must federate or perish."

It does not take a prophet to see that the situation being what it is in Europe, Britain cannot go it alone. Mr. Churchill made this clear when he said, speaking of the idea of a European federation:

"All this will, I believe, be found to harmonize with the high permanent interests of Britain, the United States, and Russia."

Unless the United States takes an active and forthright part in pushing the idea of a democratic union of Europe, we face at the end of the war what will amount to a partition of the Continent into British and Russian spheres of influence.

Is it so difficult to realize what a return to this balance of power means? Isn't it clear that regardless of Germany's military defeat, she will have won the war politically? For it must be plain that both Britain and Russia will woo the new Germany in an effort to keep her out of the other's sphere of influence. In effect, Germany will hold the balance of power. Am I conjuring up spooks and goblins? Well, then, has not this bidding for Germany's favor already begun? How interpret Russia's Free German Committee, already functioning in Moscow? How interpret the shrewd Russian propaganda which tells the German people that Russia does not seek the dismemberment of the German Reich? How far and how long can Britain remain quiet and not make counterbids unless a definite European policy is decided upon now?

Do you believe that the American people are fighting the war for a new balance of power in Europe? Do you believe the American people are fighting the war to restore rubber, oil, tin, and copra exploitations to a few individuals who have become members of the peerage through use of slave labor? Do you believe that the American people are fighting the war to establish communism in Yugoslavia or the other Balkan states? Do you believe the American people are fighting the war to give Russia a slice of Finland? Do you believe the American people are fighting the war to give trucks and tanks and railroads and airplanes to one nation so that it in turn can give them to another nation to build good will between these second and third recipients of our substance?

Do you believe that the American people are fighting the war to wash every coral beach in the Pacific with their sons' blood for the right in the post-war world to pay rent for the use of airfields on such islands? Isn't it a sad commentary on affairs when, in this democratic Republic, the people do not know their own country's foreign policy?

War, it has been said, is but an instrument of foreign policy. Therefore, when foreign policy loses direction, war loses its meaning. The contrasts between the powerful military might of Britain and the United States and their unimpressive political effort, between their military resolution and their political irresolution, are significant. Both here and in England people are asking, "What is the war about?"

I quote from an editorial appearing in the May issue of The Nineteenth Century and After, a conservative and well-edited British magazine:

"It is being said, more and more, that 'Uncle Joe is out for Russia.' It is said, not in criticism but with respect, even with envy. The English are asking 'Where do we come in?' No answer is given. And as declared principles have become so elusive, and as others get the applause, and will, it would seem, carry off the prizes, people are asking, 'What is the war about?'

"To defeat the Germans is necessary, there are few, if any, who doubt it. But that alone is not enough."

That is right. To defeat the Germans? Of course—that is our immediate objective. But that alone is not enough. The defeat of the foe is a necessity, but something far more fundamental must be accomplished for the security, the well-being, the honor, the prestige, and the principles of this Nation are at stake.

Now, any consideration of foreign policy and the stabilization of Europe to prevent future wars must necessarily include a consideration of our domestic post-war problems. They will be many and they will require the best efforts of every thinking American lest we lose here in this country the freedom, the economic security, the liberty, and the kind of Government we are fighting for.

If it is sound judgment in time of peace to prepare for war, it is equally good sense in time of war to prepare for peace. We have much to learn from Britain on this score—the English are not idle. Even in the darkest days of the London blitz, English merchants and exporters continued zealously to guard their markets. Nor have they failed to take advantage of every opportunity since to prepare the way for British trade in the post-war world.

What have we done? Our Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is still law. We are continuing to foster a good-neighbor policy in Latin and South America. But I sometimes have grave doubts of the degree of success of these programs to date. This may be due to lack of proper administration or to the exigencies of war.

But it seems to me that the situation which will face us economically in the post-war world will be vastly more complicated than before the war, while the policies and the plans which guide us are of a pre-war vintage.

It may be well to examine briefly the facts that have added to the complexity of the economic position in which the United States will find itself in the post-war era. For the past generation United States exports, expressed as a percentage of national income, have progressively decreased. Only during periods of war, or reckless foreign loans, have exports reached relatively high figures. But in many foreign countries exports constitute as much as 40 percent of their national income. It is obvious, therefore, why such countries seek to broaden their markets by every means, including propaganda directed against all American tariffs. It may not be realized, but it is a fact nevertheless, that in the pre-war period United States tariffs on the average—and I desire to emphasize that word "average"—were among the lowest of the major exporting and importing countries. I have in mind, of course, that the word "tariffs" include such devices as quotas, exchange controls, and embargoes.

In recent months this propaganda stemming from abroad and echoed here for the elimination of tariffs has been replete with the words "equal" and "free" access to raw materials by all nations. Frankly, I do not know, and have not been able to learn, just what is meant by this "equal access to raw materials" theory.

Again we hear some of our superinternational "do gooders" say that because we are—they should say we were—the richest nation in the world we should enter into some kind of a "share the wealth" agreement with the other countries of the world. We should lend-lease, never to be returned, our manufactured goods as well as our raw materials.

Our country has about 6 percent of the world's population, but in normal times possesses and produces about one-third of the world's income. Even if we were to redistribute our wealth and our income on a come-one come-all basis, the percentage increase for the remaining 94 percent of the world's population would be fractional. And what would happen to our own standard of living? I am not ashamed to argue that we owe our first duty to our own people—although it has become fashionable in some quarters to deprecate such a philosophy.

I fail to understand these men who on the one hand openly admire and praise Stalin for looking out for Soviet Russia first, and who regard Churchill as the world's foremost figure, because he says plainly that he has not become the King's first minister to liquidate the Empire and, who, on the other hand, sneer at those whose primary concern is the well-being of their fellow Americans. To me, it is self-evident that if we reduce living standards appreciably here, we jeopardize not only the national well-being of our population—but bankrupt our own Government. I should like to impress upon you as forcibly as I can that dictators are but the receivers of bankrupt nations.

In analyzing this problem we must recognize first that we already have owed to us some thirty billion dollars' worth of reciprocal lend-lease—and that we also possess the bulk of the world's merchant shipping. And speaking about lend-lease, while coming here on the train today, I read in the London Economist an article titled "Plain Speaking." In this article we learn the English feel they will have trouble with American lend-lease because Congress has taken over authority on the approval of settlement agreements. From the British point of view lend-lease settlements will be similar to those of World War debts.

The article says, and I quote:

"Can there be any harm in continuing to say that British opinion will not be content with any ultimate settlement which fails to take into account the dollars spent by Great Britain in supporting American munition factories in the days of cash and carry? Or can there by any harm in making it plain that, since America has not handed over in lend-lease any of her capital assets but only the current output of her factories and farms, there can be no question of any handing over in return of any British capital assets, whether they are strategic islands, or oil reserves, or industrial securities, and that repayment—if any material repayment is made at all—can only be in the current output of British factories?"

We must also realize that up to recent years our greatest imports in value were such things as silk, rubber, sugar, wood pulp, and the like. We have now developed nylon out of coal, air, and water—which even before our entrance into the war was threatening to displace silk almost completely. And there are many other competing fibers of a more or less similar sort, waiting to find their way into the market.

The cost of nylon is, for most purposes, well below that of the natural imported silk, and this cost is continually declining. Never again will the American consumer have to pay $5 or $6 a pound for silk or its equivalent. Some other products that have also felt the hand of science include newsprint, wool, rayon, vegetable oils, aluminum and the even lighter magnesium metals, laminated wood, tin, lacquers, plastics, dehydrated and frozen foods, drugs and synthetic products of all kinds. Never again should there be great fluctuations in the price of rubber. Whether or not the United States continues to import a certain quantity of crude rubber, the very fact that we have the artificial product which can be made at a competitive price, will put a ceiling on the price that can be charged for the crude. Thus the American manufacturer will be saved the losses and grief arising from speculation in vast inventories at rapidly fluctuating prices, and the American consumer will get his rubber tires at a price which can largely be predetermined.

A third factor involves the extent of our foreign trade. A recent careful examination of all imports into the United States during the year 1939, which were of an annual value exceeding $10,000,000, leads to some conclusions which may surprise the uninformed. It appears that such progress has already been made that, if it were necessary, the United States could get along very comfortably under its own steam, importing not more than one-fourth or one-fifth as much in value as it actually imported in the year, 1939. Under urgent war conditions, the figure of necessary imports could even be cut to a substantially lower point, provided we were importing only for the purpose of taking care of ourselves, and not for lend-leasing to the rest of the world.

I am not recommending as a policy, that the United states try to restrict its imports in this manner. I am merely stating that all the figures and facts, when properly analyzed, indicate that in normal times the rest of the world is not likely to have a great supply of commodities which we urgently need, and which could be counted upon to be used in payment for heavy exports from the United States.

These, then, are facts which would seem to compel a nationalistic, self-sufficient economic policy for the United States. Added to them is the sharply evident desire on the part of the American people to cease all squandering of our money and material resources.

On the other hand, do we want to revert to the policy of China and Japan prior to the nineteenth century when commercial contact with the outside world was forbidden? In the true meaning of the word we have never been a Nation of isolationists.

It would seem desirable to have sufficient competition from foreign sources to insure at all times reasonable prices on all commodities for our consumers and insure efficient operation of our domestic production.

It is therefore imperative, it seems to me, that we avoid extremes. Let us exercise study, deliberation, and caution in arriving at conclusions. Americans have never lacked in initiative or enterprise. If these are coupled with careful analysis plus a continued investigation of the facts not only by our Government but by each individual I have no fear of the outcome.

When our boys who are scattered throughout the world return they will come back with first-hand knowledge of every country on the globe. They will, I feel certain, come back with the knowledge of what they do not want the United States to be like. This information alone will be invaluable. Armed with complete data and exercising the cautious courage which is attributed to all Yankees, we can follow victory at arms with victory at home.

A Serious Reversal on the Farm Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an able article on the subject A Serious Reversal on the Farm Front, written by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SERIOUS REVERSAL ON THE FARM FRONT

(By Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.)

For 7 years Congress and the Federal Government have been endeavoring to reduce interest rates on farm loans. Excessive debt and burdensome interest rates brought ruin to thousands upon thousands of good American farmers in the years following the last war. This was true even during the 1920's when the rest of our economy was allegedly entering upon a new era of prosperity.

One of the first significant recovery measures of the New Deal, when it came to power in 1933, was the revitalization of the national farm credit system and creation of the Farm Credit Administration. New credit was made available to the farmers, to save them from foreclosure, and steps were taken to reduce interest rates.

The Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 authorized the reduction of interest rates on outstanding Federal land bank loans to 4½ percent. In 1935 the effective rate of interest on these loans was still further reduced to 3½ percent, and it has been retained at that level up to July 1 of this year. The interest rate on Land Bank Commissioner loans originally set at 5 percent was reduced to 4 percent in 1937, and to 3½ percent in 1940. It has remained at this level up until the present time.

A SHOCKING REVERSAL

But now the Democratic administration is reversing itself in this, as in many other vital phases of the original New Deal program. The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, backed by the Department of Agriculture, has recommended that on Federal land bank loans the interest rate be allowed to go back up to 4 percent, and on land bank commissioner loans up to 5 percent beginning the 1st of July of this year.

This recommendation, coming as it does when the farmer is beset with frozen prices and rising costs, is a shocking reversal of both the previously established farm credit policy and the economic-stabilization program. It comes at a time when farmers are admittedly selling many of their products at prices which do not provide a fair return in comparison with the cost of production.

The economic stabilizers refuse to grant price increases to correct these situations. Instead, they have set up elaborate machinery and complicated rules and regulations to dole out agricultural subsidies of one kind or another in an effort to make up the difference between the frozen prices of these farm commodities and the return the farmer needs in order to continue production on an economic basis.

Certainly agriculture is entitled to expect that the Federal Government will use the same vigor in stabilizing farm production costs that is employed in stabilizing farm commodity prices. Interest is part of the farmer's cost of production. But the administration chooses to look the other way when an increase in the farmer's interest charges is proposed.

There are approximately 800,000 farmers who still owe on Federal land bank and Land Bank Commissioner loans. The total amount of these loans outstanding on January 1, 1944, was approximately $1,760,000,000. This amounts to approximately 30 percent of all loans outstanding on American farm land, including the loans advanced by the insurance companies, the banks, and other private sources.

The significance, therefore, of an increase in interest rates on these Federal land bank and Commissioner loans is inescapable. The proposed increase from 3½ to 4 percent on Federal land bank mortgages is an increase of 14 percent. The proposed increase from 3½ to 5 percent on Commissioner loans is an increase of 42 percent.

In terms of actual dollars, it means the farmer who has a $3,000 Commissioner loan outstanding would have his annual interest charge raised from $105 to $150. The farmer with a $4,000 Federal land bank mortgage outstanding will have his interest charges raised from $140 to $200.

Can anyone deny that these additional interest charges amount to an increase in the farmer's cost of production? If he was breaking even before, this added expense will put him in the hole. If he was in the hole before, it means he will go in still deeper. The Government will not let him adjust his prices because it is bound and determined to hold the line on farm commodity prices even in instances where the price admittedly does not provide adequate compensation for the cost of production without some form of subsidy.

THE JOB CAN BE DONE

If the Federal Government is going to hold the price line against the farmer it certainly ought to hold the cost line for him.

In the matter of interest rates on Land Bank and Commissioner loans, holding the line for the farmer is simply a matter of deciding to do it. It lies entirely within the power of the Federal Government to do the whole job without asking anybody's cooperation. It does not have to worry about enforcing the law against recalcitrant violators. All that is required is an act of Congress, approved by the President, extending for another year or another 2 years the present effective rates on these loans.

The future stability of agriculture will depend in large measure upon the Federal Government's success in working out a farm credit program which will relieve agriculture of the excessive debt it acquired during and after the last war, and at the same time providing adequate sources to meet current and long-range credit needs at as low a rate of interest as possible.

Such farm-loan programs as the Bankhead-Jones tenant purchase plan and the Farm Security Administration's farm-land loans have operated on an interest charge of only 3 percent. There is no reason why all farm loans backed by the Federal Government should not ultimately be made available to farmers for the same rate of interest.

Fortunately, Congress has not followed the Farm Credit Administration all the way in its recommendation to allow interest rates to go up to 4 and 5 percent on their loans. The Pace bill as it passed the House of Representatives would fix the effective rate of interest on Land Bank Commissioner loans at 4 percent for the coming year, instead of allowing it to go to 5 percent as the Farm Credit Administration and the Department of Agriculture have recommended.

Nevertheless, even the Pace bill provided for an increase in interest rates for 800,000 farm borrowers, at a time when they have every reason to expect the protection of the economic stabilization program. The farmer is entitled to a continuation of present rates without any increase at all.

Economic stabilization, if it is to be successful and win the confidence of the American people, must be applied without discrimination, and with equity for all. In too many instances, as applied by the present administration, it has been a lopsided club used to crack down on those who could not protest effectively. The American farmer has felt its weight many times in the past 2 years.

If the Government itself will not enforce fair play, if the Government will not act justly unless forced to do so by outside pressure, it is not surprising that organized groups of American citizens undertake to use their political and economic strength to win their demands. The technique of force and pressure is easily taught and quickly learned. Every instance of administrative discrimination for one group or against another brings fresh converts to the pressure technique. A stabilization program, if it succeeds, must be a stabilization program for all on equal terms.

Service of Disabled American Veterans Organization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, on Monday evening, May 29, 1944, an old friend of mine, William E. Tate, past national commander of the Disabled American Veterans, and at present special claims officer of the Disabled American Veterans in the Washington office, delivered a radio address over Station WINX on the subject Why Disabled Veterans Need D. A. V. Service. This very able address shows the need of the national service officer to aid the Veterans' Administration and its representatives in assisting the disabled veterans of the United States. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY DISABLED VETERANS NEED D. A. V. SERVICE

Each day of war new recruits are added to the wheel-chair brigade, the blind, the maimed, the diseased, the helpless. These men gave their rich young blood, their youth and health, their promise and high dreams of the future. They made these priceless sacrifices for us, for you and me, for the present generation, and for generations yet unborn, and for the high hopes of mankind. They offered all freely. Any claim for benefits for any of these men is a special claim and handled as such by the D. A. V.

Most citizens insist that the burden of providing for the Nation's defenders should be borne by the Federal Government, but only when it has been established that the veteran's disabilities were caused by military service. However, the disabled veterans have learned through sad experience that there is a vast gap between the enactment of beneficial legislation and the application of the law to the individual case. To prove service connection of a disability is not an easy thing to do unless official records show its inception in service.

The Government, functioning through the Veterans' Administration, acts as judge and jury, so to speak, of all veterans' claims. Government cannot, in addition, act as counsel for the plaintiff or prosecute a claim against itself. It is the responsibility of the individual claimant to see that his equitable rights are protected, and in this he has the able assistance of the D. A. V.

The D. A. V. acts as attorney for plaintiff in legal and technical matters and helps the veteran to establish the basic factual evidence of his claim. Government is not interested in anyone's opinion or conclusions. Suppositions are not acceptable. Only on the basis of facts does the Government determine a veteran's rights. Often the veteran is misinformed or does not understand the value of technical evidence to substantiate claims.

It is up to the disabled veteran to establish that his disability occurred in military service or was aggravated by such service. If, in order to remain with a particular outfit, a man didn't want to complain, or if his symptoms didn't show up until after his discharge from service, his chances for disability compensation are poor, unless he has the assistance which the D. A. V. is peculiarly qualified and equipped to render.

As to veterans of World War I, about 90 percent of those for whom the D. A. V. procured service-connected disability compensation had had their claims denied previously by the Veterans' Administration. As to veterans of the present world conflict, 70 percent of those who come to the D. A. V. have had their claims denied; the other 30 percent have not prosecuted their cases.

As Prof. Charles A. Beard, of Columbia University, has pointed out, "Rights are not self-enforcing and we must keep battling for them to make real in life any rights proclaimed on paper." It is obvious, therefore, that the expert assistance extended by the D. A. V. service officers is invaluable to our maimed fighters.

The D. A. V.'s work is not only humanitarian, but truly American, efficient, and economically wise.

The majority of the members of a rating board may be convinced by circumstantial evidence that a disability existed while the man was in service, but they must depend upon factual evidence to establish the claim. The D. A. V., which enjoys the full confidence of the Veterans' Administration, endeavors to fill the breach and helps the veteran to fight for his equitable claim every inch of the way.

The D. A. V. makes the disabled veteran understand that Government officials are not autocratic in their decisions but that primarily they must adhere to the limitations and restrictions of the law. They cannot grant benefits to a man just because he asks for them, but only because his claim, supplemented by the evidence, measures up to the requirements of the law. The D. A. V. enlightens him as to what constitutes proof of his claim and helps him to establish all the pertinent facts in the case.

All service officers are themselves disabled veterans who have been "through the mill". They have the necessary patient understanding and good psychological approach to the problems of all disabled veterans. The first requisite of a national service officer is social consciousness. He has a real sense of values and is able to visualize what a disabled veteran is going through. He can make the veteran understand what he has to do to establish the technical and legal merits of his equitable claim.

The Veterans' Administration is vested by authority to tell a man that he is not eligible but not to point out wherein his evidence falls short. Once an affidavit is on file it cannot be taken out again by the applicant, but the D. A. V. service officer tells the claimant truthfully what his shortcomings are and encourages him to get more detailed factual reports.

Many veterans do not show signs of physical impairment and do not become disabled until a long time after their release from service. This will be particularly true of those who are serving in the South Pacific where malaria is rampant. Medical discipline is rigidly enforced among all troops in this section of the world, and every member of the armed forces takes a required amount of quinine every day. It may be 3 months or longer from the time of his discharge before the man first shows signs of malaria, and unless his case is properly presented to the Veterans' Administration his claim is apt to be rejected, even though his disability was incurred while he was in service.

Records, if any, which were made during the time of his service may have been destroyed or lost or may be incomplete. "Buddies" with whom he served may have been killed in action, may since have died, or possibly their memories have faded with the passage of time. Again, the veteran may no longer remember the names or addresses of those with whom he served, possibly having been in each outfit only a few weeks, and therefore becoming acquainted with "buddies" only by their nicknames of "Mack" or "Bill" or "Ed."

A hundred and one different factors may make it extremely difficult, and in many cases impossible, for a veteran factually to prove that his disabilities were caused by his war service, even though they actually were service-incurred or service-aggravated.

The fight for justice, however, must still be carried on for such disillusioned disabled veterans and for their dependents.

To sum up, our Government has established hospitals and other agencies for the physical care and protection of our ex-servicemen but the channels through which an applicant has to follow are bewildering, complex, and often misleading for the uninformed. This predicament is not by purposeful design but due to the preponderance of prescribed regulations that add up to an almost insurmountable barrier of red tape.

During time of war, all patriotic citizens sincerely and freely promise that "nothing will be too good for those who return." Unfortunately, many disabled veterans have become so disappointed by their abortive efforts to secure gainful employment or adequate compensation as to believe that the cheering patriots safe at home literally meant "nothing," for nothing has been their reward in too many meritorious cases. We cannot permit such a feeling to prevail.

Continued maintenance and further expansion of its vital service is the D. A. V.'s program to insure prompt, free, and unstinted help to America's service-disabled veterans.

Irrigation and Navigation in the Missouri River Basin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN
OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "T. V. A. Is Not the Answer," published in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of June 12, 1944. The editorial deals with irrigation and navigation in the Missouri River Basin.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

T. V. A. IS NOT THE ANSWER

There is ample water in the Missouri Basin for both irrigation and navigation. This is the substance of the report made public by the engineers subcommittee of the Missouri River States Committee and it substantiates the verdict of the United States Army Engineers.

Representatives of all of the nine States in the Missouri Basin participated in the study of the engineering subcommittee, so that no charge can be raised as to partisan interest. The subcommittee's report shows that there is available at Sioux City, Iowa, the head of navigation on the Missouri, an annual flow of 22,473,000 acre-feet. This is in excess of the 22,445,000 acre-feet needed for the irrigation proposals of the Bureau of Reclamation and the navigation requirements set out by the Army engineers.

The findings of the subcommittee should settle the current arguments in the Senate as to whether there is sufficient water available for all purposes projected in the Pick plan as it is incorporated in the pending flood-control bill.

The only controversy which remains is the question of the proper Federal agency to control the Missouri Basin program. On this question the logical solution is the one proposed by the Army engineers and incorporated in the Pick plan. This solution would give to the Army engineers control over the multiple-purpose reservoirs and other river works on the main stem of the Missouri which are primarily for flood control and navigation, and delegate to the Reclamation Bureau control over the reservoirs in the tributary streams constructed primarily for irrigation.

One thing is certain. The Missouri Valley does not want a T. V. A. The example of what has happened in the Tennessee Valley under the T. V. A. is sufficient evidence to convince the people of the Missouri Valley of the danger of this type of bureaucratic control.

The Tennessee Valley Authority was created originally as a power and navigation agency. Flood control was never a serious problem in the Tennessee Valley and navigation under the T. V. A. has become secondary to power. But the T. V. A. has extended its other activities far beyond the original purposes for which the Authority was created.

The United States Chamber of Commerce in an appendix to its current referendum on National Water Resources Policies, lists 30 activities of the T. V. A., which include a number of manufacturing projects, large farm operations, food processing, socialized medicine, the operation of schools, retail stores, recreational facilities, the loaning of money, and operation of numerous police powers.

As the appendix points out, "Regional authorities have a much larger significance than the administration of water resource benefits. Authorities are, in fact, the operators as well as administrators and they carry their operations into almost every detail of community life."

The United States Chamber of Commerce sets out as a declaration of its proposed water resources policy the support of a program of development wherein the purpose or purposes of each project, especially multipurpose projects are clear and declared in advance. The best way to insure this is to have the projects assigned to an organization that is devoted primarily to the major purpose of the project. Thus the Bureau of Reclamation should handle all reclamation projects and the Army engineers should handle all flood-control projects and continue with navigation.

The Power of Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURTON K. WHEELER
OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able and instructive address delivered by Wheeler McMillen, editor in chief, Farm Journal, at the Economic Leadership Conference and dinner, New York City, on June 15, last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Agriculture is in favor of international trade. Agriculture is in favor of tariffs. Contrary to what appears to be widespread belief, there is no necessary conflict between these two positions.

Farmers in certain sections of the Nation still produce quantities of certain commodities in excess of the effective domestic demand. They would like to have profitable export markets for some of their output. As consumers, they desire certain agricultural products from other parts of the world. They have been accustomed to using coffee, tea, cocoa, spices, and rubber among the many agricultural materials which they do not produce. They believe that trade in such commodities is of mutual advantage and thoroughly sound.

Farmers are keenly aware, in addition, that the great market for their output is within the borders of the United States. They desire to see American industries prosper and commercial enterprises active. They have observed that well-paid workers who are busy the year around are much better customers for food than ill-paid part-time workers. Therefore, they are anxious that those industries partially dependent upon export sales shall be able to send their goods abroad. They are perfectly willing that both their own goods and the exported industrial commodities shall be paid for by the customary procedures which make American dollars available to foreign buyers, including the reception of imports into this country.

Farmers are not willing, however, that industrial exports shall be paid for principally with imports which compete with what American farmers produce.

The plethora of propaganda and the bitterness of controversy have tended to obscure some of the simple truths about trade among nations, as well as about the essentials of domestic prosperity. There appear to be those among us who have come to believe that "tariffbarrier" is one word. Propagandists for political theory and for foreign or selfish interests seldom mention tariff without describing it as a barrier. They have persuaded many against their own and the national interest that tariff is a barrier to trade and injurious to the national well-being.

Ill-advised tariff schedules can be barriers. They can be so high or so low as to diminish commerce and reduce advantage. That, however, is far from being the whole story.

Correct tariffs are a fertilizer for international trade. Wisely applied, tariff can be a stimulus and a lubricant as easily as no tariff or an incorrect tariff can be a barrier. The most universal barrier to trade is lack of purchasing power. Lack of purchasing power is generally synonymous with lack of production. The most universal ailment of the human race is want. Want can be overcome only by production. When production reaches a level high enough to supply a people with necessities, whether by direct use or by exchange, then further production can be applied to greater increase the standard of living.

The United States stands as the supreme example among nations of a high standard of living. The American people outproduce every other people in the world. Having larger means, they therefore constitute the most envied and desirable market in the world. Since they create for themselves an extraordinarily high percentage of the goods they desire, their high degree of purchasing power is a magnet which attracts competition.

It may be a fantastic but is nevertheless a useful illustration to assume for a moment that after the war nearly everything used by Americans might be produced more cheaply in some other country. If our Government were therefore to assume that it would benefit Americans by permitting them to buy all goods from the cheapest sources, the consequence would be disastrous. Obviously the result would be the prompt destruction of the purchasing power of Americans. Since all goods would then come from abroad, no means of earning and acquiring purchasing power would remain. We would produce little or nothing. The American people promptly would be plunged into poverty and want. And the once highly attractive American market would have disappeared.

A basic principle of prosperity and well-being is that production has two distinct functions. One is to supply goods. The other is to create purchasing power. When a nation's economy is so balanced as to engage its working population in profitable production, and employment is therefore widely diffused, that nation can have a high standard of living. The slight additional cost which a tariff rate may imposed upon a customer may well be the insurance premium he pays for maintenance of his purchasing power.

The best consumers the United States has had for its exports have been those nations with the highest purchasing power. The largest volume of imports has been obtained by the United States in those years such as 1929 when domestic prosperity was at high levels. It is at such times that our people can most readily satisfy their demands for foreign luxuries and at such times that they require the largest imports of raw materials.

I have referred to the fact that agriculture desires export markets for commodities such as cotton and wheat. It is pertinent to point out that agriculture's most critical problems arise among the producers of these commodities. They are problem commodities because the price is not determined by what a prosperous domestic American market can pay. Their prices are determined by what a less prosperous foreign consumer can afford to pay. It might be said that the price of cotton is ordinarily determined by what a coolie in Penang can afford to pay for a shirt or by what a coolie in some backward colony will accept for a day's work. Coolie standards are not American standards.

We have trouble with wheat and cotton simply because they seldom can be directly benefited by the kind of tariff protection which has so succcessfully been used to moderate the effects of world competition upon many of our other products.

Probably no nation can expect to erect a stable structure of prosperity upon exports of raw materials. To do so exposes it workers and farmers to the competition of the cheapest of wage workers anywhere. Should the United States adopt as its future policy one of encouraging unlimited export of raw materials from other nations, it would inflict injury rather than benefit upon the people of those nations. It would tend to encourage them to continue upon the low level of raw material prosperity.

A far more generous policy would provide first for the maintenance of prosperity in the United States by adequately protecting the purchasing power of Americans. Then it would, in addition, encourage the people of less fortunate countries to produce not for sale abroad but for consumption at home. Whenever other countries advance in the prduction by themselves of the things their people need for themselves, international trade itself will expand. There will be more demand and more capacity for the exchange among nations of the goods one or another may need to obtain.

There is one approach by which the correct use of tariff can contribute constructively to the solution of cotton and wheat surplus problems. That this can be true may not seem likely in view of our general acceptance of the idea that there must be cotton and wheat surpluses and that commodities in surplus cannot be benefited by the use of tariffs. Cotton and wheat surpluses come into existence because farmers in the great one-crop cotton and wheat areas do not have other crops that are normally more profitable. If they could grow other equally satisfactory crops, certainly they would not take the continuous risk of low prices for excessive production of cotton and wheat.

In the Corn Belt a new crop has been added. It is the soybean. In 1914 about 50,000 bushels of soybeans were harvested. By 1935 the total has grown to 45,000,000 bushels. The last 2 or 3 years have seen production in excess of 200,000,000 bushels. The soybean has been a highly satisfactory new cashable crop in the Corn Belt States. Having industrial as well as food uses, its price has been fairly stable.

More genuine and effective agricultural adjustment was accomplished during the past 12 years in the Corn Belt through the addition of the soybean crop than by all the laws adopted by the New Deal, or by all the millions paid out from the Federal Treasury.

Almost within sight are new crops for the cotton States, crops which can help to prevent cotton surpluses in future years. If the cotton States were to begin producing quantities of vegetable oils equal to the quantities normally imported, the acreage required would be in excess of that normally devoted to cotton for export. This is significant since, of course, not all cotton grown for export is necessarily surplus cotton—not when the export prices are profitable. The South can grow peanut oil, soybean oil, tung oil, with certain other possibilities such as okra and perilla, and, of course, cottonseed oil. Many of these oils are interchangeable in their industrial uses.

Protective tariffs correctly applied so as to encourage the domestic production of vegetable oils in the South by preventing low-wage competition from the tropics, can hasten the day when southern soils will be freed from their dependence from the uncertainties of foreign markets and the low purchasing power of foreign customers, to say nothing of the low wages of foreign competitors.

Not within the visible future but neither a wholly improbable concept is that cotton production on a domestic basis might eventually itself desire the protection of a tariff.

Vegetable oils, of course, are not the only alternative to cotton. Southern soils and climate are well adapted to the production of starches to replace the 400,000,000 pounds normally imported each year from the tropics. Cotton is not the only fiber that southern farmers can produce. As by-products of vegetable-oil production and of starch crop production, there will be both protein and carbohydrate feeds now lacking in the southern agricultural economy. The availability of satisfactory all-year feedstuffs will improve the southern capacity for local production of meat, milk, and eggs.

Prospective new crops to prevent the creation of surpluses in the one-crop wheat area are not quite so readily pointed out. However, our crop practices have developed through habit as much as through experience. Mankind has not yet tried very hard to try out what the plant resources of nature are good for. We grow only about 200 commercial crops in the United States, although 15,000 special plants are indigenous to this country. Botanists have identified more than 200,000 species of plants on the face of the earth. The new sciences of organic chemistry and plant genetics will in time enable man to adapt hundreds of additional plants to his uses and to establish them as commercial crops. Among them certainly will be other plants than wheat that will flourish on the Great Plains, add stability to the incomes of farmers in the one-crop wheat areas, and improve the prosperity of the entire Nation.

Agriculture is the fundamental economic enterprise. One-fourth of Americans are farmers and depend directly upon the land for their incomes. Another fourth, in the towns and small cities, never have a dollar until a farmer brings a new dollar or a dollar's worth of new wealth into town. Thus half of the Nation's population is dependent, first hand or second hand, upon what farmers produce and upon how that production is priced. If it is priced so low as to prevent farmers from having profits and spending money, depression affects the entire Nation. If the income of the rural half of America is generous, there are eager buyers for the products of the urban industries, employment runs high, and the whole Nation flourishes. The cities cannot afford to be misled into destroying tariff protection for agriculture. They will pay high for making such a mistake.

Agriculture is by no means an isolated enterprise. No one realizes better than do farmers how much they depend upon widespread employment at good wages. Busy and well-paid cities are the primary market for agriculture's primary output, which is food. Farmers are against policies which may diminish the effective demand for food anywhere in the Nation. They want to see labor fully employed and adequately paid.

Consequently, agriculture generally favors whatever protective methods are necessary to insure full activity by industry. Likewise agriculture looks unfavorably upon some of the erroneous thinking that directly affects both rural and urban prosperity.

Farmers have been assailed for wanting a tariff on sugar at a level that will permit profitable production of sugar beets in the United States. Lower sugar schedules have often been advocated on the theory that more American automobiles and other items might be sold in Cuba. In the first place, it is pertinent to remark that a tariff of 1 cent costs American consumers about $1 per year, assuming that the full rate of the tariff is added to the cost of their sugar, and assuming that they receive no benefit whatever from the rate. Per capita sugar consumption runs around 100 pounds a year.

Any good sugar-beet county will be found to buy automobiles at a rate equal to or above the average national rate. There will be 1 car for each 4 or 5 people in the county. I understand there is about 1 automobile in Cuba for each 175 people. Is it fair to ask which place is the better market for American automobiles?

Agriculture has a definite interest in the future arrangements for the American rubber supply. Farmers would like to grow some of the post-war rubber or some of its ingredients. They have definite opportunities, providing research is vigorously pursued. They may produce latex from the guyaule or Russian dandelion plants. They may provide raw material for rubber by way of alcohol from carbohydrate crops, vegetable oils, or even from the whey, which is a byproduct of milk.

They figure that if all the rubber of our future is grown by American farmers on American land at American prices, or produced at American wages by American workers, they will have additional demand for food. They have never sold much of anything to the coolies of the rubber plantations. They also figure that the American rubber producers will be more active customers for American manufacturers of all kinds and that the whole national economy will thereby profit.

Nor are our farmers oblivious of the fact that we have once been caught in costly unpreparedness. If the rubber is produced within the United States, it will be here when needed. In South America it would still be 4,000 miles distant, and in the Orient the same old risk would be repeated.

The challenge at once comes up that this policy will be unfriendly to improved international trade and other relationships. To that I would first declare that it has yet to be demonstrated that international trade has ever prevented a war, nor even that it has not been the active cause of many a war.

Then I would return to something I said some moments ago. Peace and plenty are closely related. Peoples who are kept in dependence upon their production of a raw material for a distant foreign market never live in plenty. They live hazardously at low and uncertain wages. Far better would it be to assist such peoples to produce the things they need for themselves. The Malay coolie never had any use for the rubber he produced. He bought no automobiles, no tires, and probably not even a raincoat. But he does have need for better food, better clothing, better sanitation, better education and recreation, and a hundred things that he could be producing for himself if he were freed from the slavery of international trade.

Raising the standard of living begins at home, wherever home may be. To help others to help themselves—and in the process to help ourselves—may well be the most profitable of post-war policies for American relationships with the less fortunate peoples of the earth.

Certainly the prime point of American policy must be to build this Nation stronger and stronger. Only through its own strength can the United States hope to influence the rest of the world for peace. Strength has to be produced. It has to be produced by a busy and prosperous people. The Agriculture is in favor of international trade. Agriculture is in favor of tariffs. Contrary to what appears to be widespread belief, there is no necessary conflict between these two positions.

Farmers in certain sections of the Nation still produce quantities of certain commodities in excess of the effective domestic demand. They would like to have profitable export markets for some of their output. As consumers, they desire certain agricultural products from other parts of the world. They have been accustomed to using coffee, tea, cocoa, spices, and rubber among the many agricultural materials which they do not produce. They believe that trade in such commodities is of mutual advantage and thoroughly sound.

Farmers are keenly aware, in addition, that the great market for their output is within the borders of the United States. They desire to see American industries prosper and commercial enterprises active. They have observed that well-paid workers who are busy the year around are much better customers for food than ill-paid part-time workers. Therefore, they are anxious that those industries partially dependent upon export sales shall be able to send their goods abroad. They are perfectly willing that both their own goods and the exported industrial commodities shall be paid for by the customary procedures which make American dollars available to foreign buyers, including the reception of imports into this country.

Farmers are not willing, however, that industrial exports shall be paid for principally with imports which compete with what American farmers produce.

The plethora of propaganda and the bitterness of controversy have tended to obscure some of the simple truths about trade among nations, as well as about the essentials of domestic prosperity. There appear to be those among us who have come to believe that "tariffbarrier" is one word. Propagandists for political theory and for foreign or selfish interests seldom mention tariff without describing it as a barrier. They have persuaded many against their own and the national interest that tariff is a barrier to trade and injurious to the national well-being.

Ill-advised tariff schedules can be barriers. They can be so high or so low as to diminish commerce and reduce advantage. That, however, is far from being the whole story.

Correct tariffs are a fertilizer for international trade. Wisely applied, tariff can be a stimulus and a lubricant as easily as no tariff or an incorrect tariff can be a barrier. The most universal barrier to trade is lack of purchasing power. Lack of purchasing power is generally synonymous with lack of production. The most universal ailment of the human race is want. Want can be overcome only by production. When production reaches a level high enough to supply a people with necessities, whether by direct use or by exchange, then further production can be applied to greater increase the standard of living.

The United States stands as the supreme example among nations of a high standard of living. The American people outproduce every other people in the world. Having larger means, they therefore constitute the most envied and desirable market in the world. Since they create for themselves an extraordinarily high percentage of the goods they desire, their high degree of purchasing power is a magnet which attracts competition.

It may be a fantastic but is nevertheless a useful illustration to assume for a moment that after the war nearly everything used by Americans might be produced more cheaply in some other country. If our Government were therefore to assume that it would benefit Americans by permitting them to buy all goods from the cheapest sources, the consequence would be disastrous. Obviously the result would be the prompt destruction of the purchasing power of Americans. Since all goods would then come from abroad, no means of earning and acquiring purchasing power would remain. We would produce little or nothing. The American people promptly would be plunged into poverty and want. And the once highly attractive American market would have disappeared.

A basic principle of prosperity and well-being is that production has two distinct functions. One is to supply goods. The other is to create purchasing power. When a nation's economy is so balanced as to engage its working population in profitable production, and employment is therefore widely diffused, that nation can have a high standard of living. The slight additional cost which a tariff rate may imposed upon a customer may well be the insurance premium he pays for maintenance of his purchasing power.

The best consumers the United States has had for its exports have been those nations with the highest purchasing power. The largest volume of imports has been obtained by the United States in those years such as 1929 when domestic prosperity was at high levels. It is at such times that our people can most readily satisfy their demands for foreign luxuries and at such times that they require the largest imports of raw materials.

I have referred to the fact that agriculture desires export markets for commodities such as cotton and wheat. It is pertinent to point out that agriculture's most critical problems arise among the producers of these commodities. They are problem commodities because the price is not determined by what a prosperous domestic American market can pay. Their prices are determined by what a less prosperous foreign consumer can afford to pay. It might be said that the price of cotton is ordinarily determined by what a coolie in Penang can afford to pay for a shirt or by what a coolie in some backward colony will accept for a day's work. Coolie standards are not American standards.

We have trouble with wheat and cotton simply because they seldom can be directly benefited by the kind of tariff protection which has so succcessfully been used to moderate the effects of world competition upon many of our other products.

Probably no nation can expect to erect a stable structure of prosperity upon exports of raw materials. To do so exposes it workers and farmers to the competition of the cheapest of wage workers anywhere. Should the United States adopt as its future policy one of encouraging unlimited export of raw materials from other nations, it would inflict injury rather than benefit upon the people of those nations. It would tend to encourage them to continue upon the low level of raw material prosperity.

A far more generous policy would provide first for the maintenance of prosperity in the United States by adequately protecting the purchasing power of Americans. Then it would, in addition, encourage the people of less fortunate countries to produce not for sale abroad but for consumption at home. Whenever other countries advance in the prduction by themselves of the things their people need for themselves, international trade itself will expand. There will be more demand and more capacity for the exchange among nations of the goods one or another may need to obtain.

There is one approach by which the correct use of tariff can contribute constructively to the solution of cotton and wheat surplus problems. That this can be true may not seem likely in view of our general acceptance of the idea that there must be cotton and wheat surpluses and that commodities in surplus cannot be benefited by the use of tariffs. Cotton and wheat surpluses come into existence because farmers in the great one-crop cotton and wheat areas do not have other crops that are normally more profitable. If they could grow other equally satisfactory crops, certainly they would not take the continuous risk of low prices for excessive production of cotton and wheat.

In the Corn Belt a new crop has been added. It is the soybean. In 1914 about 50,000 bushels of soybeans were harvested. By 1935 the total has grown to 45,000,000 bushels. The last 2 or 3 years have seen production in excess of 200,000,000 bushels. The soybean has been a highly satisfactory new cashable crop in the Corn Belt States. Having industrial as well as food uses, its price has been fairly stable.

More genuine and effective agricultural adjustment was accomplished during the past 12 years in the Corn Belt through the addition of the soybean crop than by all the laws adopted by the New Deal, or by all the millions paid out from the Federal Treasury.

Almost within sight are new crops for the cotton States, crops which can help to prevent cotton surpluses in future years. If the cotton States were to begin producing quantities of vegetable oils equal to the quantities normally imported, the acreage required would be in excess of that normally devoted to cotton for export. This is significant since, of course, not all cotton grown for export is necessarily surplus cotton—not when the export prices are profitable. The South can grow peanut oil, soybean oil, tung oil, with certain other possibilities such as okra and perilla, and, of course, cottonseed oil. Many of these oils are interchangeable in their industrial uses.

Protective tariffs correctly applied so as to encourage the domestic production of vegetable oils in the South by preventing low-wage competition from the tropics, can hasten the day when southern soils will be freed from their dependence from the uncertainties of foreign markets and the low purchasing power of foreign customers, to say nothing of the low wages of foreign competitors.

Not within the visible future but neither a wholly improbable concept is that cotton production on a domestic basis might eventually itself desire the protection of a tariff.

Vegetable oils, of course, are not the only alternative to cotton. Southern soils and climate are well adapted to the production of starches to replace the 400,000,000 pounds normally imported each year from the tropics. Cotton is not the only fiber that southern farmers can produce. As by-products of vegetable-oil production and of starch crop production, there will be both protein and carbohydrate feeds now lacking in the southern agricultural economy. The availability of satisfactory all-year feedstuffs will improve the southern capacity for local production of meat, milk, and eggs.

Prospective new crops to prevent the creation of surpluses in the one-crop wheat area are not quite so readily pointed out. However, our crop practices have developed through habit as much as through experience. Mankind has not yet tried very hard to try out what the plant resources of nature are good for. We grow only about 200 commercial crops in the United States, although 15,000 special plants are indigenous to this country. Botanists have identified more than 200,000 species of plants on the face of the earth. The new sciences of organic chemistry and plant genetics will in time enable man to adapt hundreds of additional plants to his uses and to establish them as commercial crops. Among them certainly will be other plants than wheat that will flourish on the Great Plains, add stability to the incomes of farmers in the one-crop wheat areas, and improve the prosperity of the entire Nation.

Agriculture is the fundamental economic enterprise. One-fourth of Americans are farmers and depend directly upon the land for their incomes. Another fourth, in the towns and small cities, never have a dollar until a farmer brings a new dollar or a dollar's worth of new wealth into town. Thus half of the Nation's population is dependent, first hand or second hand, upon what farmers produce and upon how that production is priced. If it is priced so low as to prevent farmers from having profits and spending money, depression affects the entire Nation. If the income of the rural half of America is generous, there are eager buyers for the products of the urban industries, employment runs high, and the whole Nation flourishes. The cities cannot afford to be misled into destroying tariff protection for agriculture. They will pay high for making such a mistake.

Agriculture is by no means an isolated enterprise. No one realizes better than do farmers how much they depend upon widespread employment at good wages. Busy and well-paid cities are the primary market for agriculture's primary output, which is food. Farmers are against policies which may diminish the effective demand for food anywhere in the Nation. They want to see labor fully employed and adequately paid.

Consequently, agriculture generally favors whatever protective methods are necessary to insure full activity by industry. Likewise agriculture looks unfavorably upon some of the erroneous thinking that directly affects both rural and urban prosperity.

Farmers have been assailed for wanting a tariff on sugar at a level that will permit profitable production of sugar beets in the United States. Lower sugar schedules have often been advocated on the theory that more American automobiles and other items might be sold in Cuba. In the first place, it is pertinent to remark that a tariff of 1 cent costs American consumers about $1 per year, assuming that the full rate of the tariff is added to the cost of their sugar, and assuming that they receive no benefit whatever from the rate. Per capita sugar consumption runs around 100 pounds a year.

Any good sugar-beet county will be found to buy automobiles at a rate equal to or above the average national rate. There will be 1 car for each 4 or 5 people in the county. I understand there is about 1 automobile in Cuba for each 175 people. Is it fair to ask which place is the better market for American automobiles?

Agriculture has a definite interest in the future arrangements for the American rubber supply. Farmers would like to grow some of the post-war rubber or some of its ingredients. They have definite opportunities, providing research is vigorously pursued. They may produce latex from the guyaule or Russian dandelion plants. They may provide raw material for rubber by way of alcohol from carbohydrate crops, vegetable oils, or even from the whey, which is a byproduct of milk.

They figure that if all the rubber of our future is grown by American farmers on American land at American prices, or produced at American wages by American workers, they will have additional demand for food. They have never sold much of anything to the coolies of the rubber plantations. They also figure that the American rubber producers will be more active customers for American manufacturers of all kinds and that the whole national economy will thereby profit.

Nor are our farmers oblivious of the fact that we have once been caught in costly unpreparedness. If the rubber is produced within the United States, it will be here when needed. In South America it would still be 4,000 miles distant, and in the Orient the same old risk would be repeated.

The challenge at once comes up that this policy will be unfriendly to improved international trade and other relationships. To that I would first declare that it has yet to be demonstrated that international trade has ever prevented a war, nor even that it has not been the active cause of many a war.

Then I would return to something I said some moments ago. Peace and plenty are closely related. Peoples who are kept in dependence upon their production of a raw material for a distant foreign market never live in plenty. They live hazardously at low and uncertain wages. Far better would it be to assist such peoples to produce the things they need for themselves. The Malay coolie never had any use for the rubber he produced. He bought no automobiles, no tires, and probably not even a raincoat. But he does have need for better food, better clothing, better sanitation, better education and recreation, and a hundred things that he could be producing for himself if he were freed from the slavery of international trade.

Raising the standard of living begins at home, wherever home may be. To help others to help themselves—and in the process to help ourselves—may well be the most profitable of post-war policies for American relationships with the less fortunate peoples of the earth.

Certainly the prime point of American policy must be to build this Nation stronger and stronger. Only through its own strength can the United States hope to influence the rest of the world for peace. Strength has to be produced. It has to be produced by a busy and prosperous people. The United States will be incredibly foolish if it refuses to use the tariff, and any other honest device of the prospective system, to husband and nourish that national strength.

We shall have to produce enough to pay our huge debt. The only honest way to meet that will be to pay it. We want to maintain and increase the high public and private standards of living which are an inspiration to all the world. We want to produce enough that we can be generous with the needy, enough that we can be strong, and enough that we can forever keep the light of freedom burning high.

Only by producing abundantly can we afford to buy freely of the raw materials and luxuries of other countries. There is no sense in failing to fight for such a reasonable level of tariffs as will aid us to produce the earning power our people must have, help to establish the new agricultural or industrial activities which research may reveal, and help us toward a constantly expanding volume of production.

Here in free America we have for the first time shown the world that power over nature pays better than power over men. Power over nature constantly increases our capacity to produce.

There is no ceiling over the potential consumption of goods by the human race. Exceedingly few are those who have ever been able to buy all the things they want.

And finally, the best of all protective devices for any form of production, is higher efficiency and lower costs than any competitor. Tariffs in the past have helped American industries to reach that point. They can do so in the future. Sight must not be lost of that objective.

Disunity at Home—Letter to His Son From Frank Colby

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a splendid letter on the subject of disunity at home, written by Mr. Frank Colby to his son, and published in the Washington Sunday Star of June 18, 1944.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A LETTER TO MY SON

(By Frank Colby)

MY DEAR SON: We are being told that you and your fellows in arms are seriously disturbed by reports of disunity here at home. It is said that many of you believe that we are not giving full support to the war effort, and are bearing with reluctance the few small sacrifices and inconveniences of our wartime economy.

"Right, dad. Frankly, some of the things we are hearing and reading simply do not add up to our idea of America."

My son, to begin with, you are, for the first time in your life, looking at your country through an inverted telescope. That which you see is strange, unreal, and disquieting, for only the abnormalities stand out. It is as if you were looking down upon America from a place so high that all familiar landmarks have vanished. But that which is good and beautiful in America still is here, and you will find it so when you come back to us.

"But all these strikes and threats of strikes—labor leaders sticking a gun in Uncle Sam's ribs and saying, 'Your money or your life!' That burns us up, what are you folks thinking of to allow such things to happen?"

Son, our indignation, too, runs high; and we are seeking ways to restrain the few who would threaten our security and nullify your sacrifices. But, if we are to preserve our democracy, we must solve these problems by applying the principles of that democracy. You and I would have it no other way.

We are a free people—yes, even free to close a coal mine, to stop a railroad, to shut down a war plant. We are free to challenge the President of the United States—yes, and even to denounce him and repudiate his official acts. Such are the ways of a democracy. But it does not mean that we are demoralized. The measure of our strength has ever been the freedom to speak our minds without fear of the headman's block or the concentration camp. That is the way we want it to be, and you are fighting to keep it that way.

Agitators and strikers are not America. The real America is going about its work in quiet determination that no son of this soil shall ever weigh his country in the balance and find it wanting.

"But what about the big money everybody is making and throwing away on night spots, horse races, liquor, and high jinks? That kind of news isn't funny to a $50-a-month G. I. Joe rotting somewhere in a jungle."

You are right of course. There have always been wasters, cheaters, and cheap, noisy, foolish men among us, and there always will be, for we are but human. There are no perfect races and no nation is free from failings. But these irresponsible ones are not America, son. America is 10,000,000 homes where a boy's room is vacant—some to remain forever so. America is a blood bank that begins at Main Street and reaches out to where a stricken soldier lies. America is a mighty heartbeat of anxiety for the sons she has sent to the wars. America is an organism so complex that it cannot possibly work but which somehow does work.

"But we hear of people complaining about rationing; we hear of bickerings between Congress and the White House; we even hear of civilians criticizing the way the war is being fought. I don't get it."

Son, it is quite American to be eternally dissatisfied, to seek always a better way of doing things.. Our untiring quest forward and upward has been and will be the source of our strength. True, some of us resent wartime restrictions; some of us are selfish and unpatriotic. But these are not America. To judge this land by the delinquencies of the few is to point to a prison and say that all men are craven.

Americans are an exuberant race. We like to let off steam by rooting for the home team, by shouting instructions to the batter, by hurling jibes at the visitors, by screaming, "Kill the umpire." It makes a better game that way. Remember?

"But, Dad, we keep hearing about confusion and bungling in Washington, of bureaucrats shoving people around, of political maneuverings, of waste and extravagance. Don't people know that we are at war, and that some of us are being killed and maimed, and that others are dying in prison camps?"

Oh, yes. We know that, though we have never heard the whine of a sniper's bullet, or the shattering burst of a bomb, or felt the thrust of a bayonet. But we know * * * for you are our gallant sons whom we cherish.

There is confusion here at home. We are making mistakes. We do have misfits in high places. Our hands have been trained for peace, and, when we are forced to stand and fight with strange machines of death, our hands are very clumsy. But only at first * * * for somehow we always manage to win our wars.

There are charlatans, incompetents, and dishonest men among us. But these are not America. America is the same sweet land that you went forth to protect. America is the doctor, the farmer, and the small businessman, laboring beyond their endurance. America is a new cruiser launched by the mother of five sailors lost at sea. America is the little girl next door in the uniform of a nurse's aid. America is a rescued seaman shipping out on another tanker.

"If all this is true, Dad, why is it that the papers and the radio keep harping on the things which you say are the exception and not the rule?"

My son, in asking the question, you have answered it. These things that disturb you are exceptional; they are abnormal; therefore, they are news. Remember the old cliche about the man biting the dog?

Well, it isn't news that most Americans are patriotic and decent. That most workers are loyally meeting production schedules doesn't make headlines. There is nothing dramatic in the fact that most Congressmen and Government leaders are men of ability and integrity.

"Keep talking, Dad. I think I'm beginning to get the point."

Son, you cannot see a true image of your homeland through an inverted telescope. You are so far away from us. You are completely out of your own natural environment. Our greatest fear is that these distorted images will cause you to lose faith in your native land.

I do not say that the impact of war has not uncovered our weaknesses and our follies. I do not ask you to believe that all is well here at home. Nor do I seek to minimize your own fears and sacrifices for the country you love.

But I do want you to believe that, despite its faults, whatever its shortcomings may be, there is no fairer land than America in all the world.

We are striving to keep our house, your house, in order against the day of your return. We shall make many more mistakes. And when we seem to falter, try to understand that no one has ever taught us how to run a nation at war.

When you come home you will find your America very much as it was when you went away. You will see that we have been neither indifferent nor complacement. Oh, please, please, believe that this is so! Many great tasks lie ahead for which we shall need your youth, your strength, and your wisdom. And we want you home with all our hearts.

May God keep you safe.

YOUR DAD.

Platform Issues: Tariff and Trade and Foreign Policy

PLATFORM ISSUES

(By Wendell Willkie)

VI. TARIFF AND TRADE

If after the war the industrial and commercial life of most of the countries of the world is either State-owned or controlled, then the whole problem of the survival of a free economic system, even in the United States, will be complicated.

Certainly the pattern of our foreign trade policy will have to be fashioned to Government supervision, allocations, and perhaps even price fixing. For State-controlled economies can sell without regard to costs. In other words, prices can become political.

Therefore the type and kind of economy which exists in other countries is important to us. Obviously we cannot interfere in the economic life of other nations. There is much, however, that we can do to create an atmosphere conducive to the development and growth of free economy in the rest of the world.

Among the measures which are indispensable to the development of such an atmosphere are revision of our tariff and cooperation in a policy of international currency stabilization. To these problems the Republican Party must address itself.

In the minds of generations of Americans the Republican Party is associated with a high protective tariff. Yet already at the turn of the century, such Republican leaders as McKinley, Taft, and Root, sensing the inevitable interdependence of the twentieth century world, were urging modification of the tariff through reciprocal trade agreements.

In the nationalistic swing that followed the last war, however, Republicans, ignoring the fact that America was for the first time a creditor nation, and that other countries must sell to us if they were to buy our goods, passed successively the two highest tariff bills in our history, the Fordney-McCumber and the Hawley-Smoot. The repercussions of the latter were world-wide. Within 2 years, 25 countries had established trade barriers against us. Everywhere nations turned to higher tariffs, tightened exchange control, import quota systems, and barter agreements.

When in 1933 the present administration dumped the London economic conference the world inevitably turned to more intense nationalism.

We are now faced with the urgent post-war economic problem of reestablishing a healthy, world-wide trade. In our present powerful economic position we must lead the way. In order to do so we must have the realism and good sense to face the fact that tariffs are no longer a purely domestic problem. Our tariff measures vitally affect the economic well-being of nations throughout the world, and theirs affect us no less.

We must take positive steps to revive the world economically by opening up international trade. Otherwise the countries of the world will seek to establish separate trading blocs as a way to provide employment for their people. Thus trading areas will be narrowed and mutually antagonistic. Under such circumstances we shall have to reorganize our agriculture and industry for defense rather than prosperity and the fiber of our free economic system will be weakened. Other nations will be forced along the road to totalitarianism. A solution of international economic problems is as indispensable for future peace and security as political and military solutions.

To this end the Republican Party should propose that through the United Nations Council an attempt should be made to reach general agreement on a clear and uniform code for international economic relations.

Likewise, the Republican Party should propose that the United States proceed to get rid of the complexities and absurdities of our present tariff. Of course, we cannot and should not go overnight from extreme tariff protection to free trade. Nor does any sensible person advocate this. But many tariff items could be swept away in the readjustments which will occur after the war without substantial injury to any American industry and with great gain to the consuming public. And many more could be lowered by effective and mutually beneficial reciprocal arrangements.

The Republican Party should propose another vital step for world economic revival. Former arrangements for international finance and trade are today in chaotic confusion, and steps toward stabilization of the currency exchange are indispensable. If the exchanges are kept relatively stable, short-term credits and possibly a new kind of intermediate, semi-long-term credits to finance international purchases over a period of, say, 10 years, can be handled by our existing financial institutions.

There is, of course, also the question of long-term investment, particularly in the development of those countries which have not kept pace with industrial progress. The startling contrast between the level of comfort in our modern industrial countries and the hard struggle for bare subsistence in technically undeveloped countries is one of the most painful—and most dangerous—aspects of international relations. Here is a great field for constructive long-term investment. Our private investors, however, as well as our Government, must make their plans with full recognition that the day of economic imperialism is over.

In addition to financial investment, valuable as that is, we can offer to the peoples of industrially undeveloped countries something more important. We can offer the investment of our great technical know-how to stimulate them on the road to economic development. There is no more fruitful way to the solution of the world's economic problems.

Some, of course, believe that the economic and industrial development of other nations is a threat to our further development. But the Republican Party, under whose leadership America made its amazing industrial strides, should have the imagination to recapture the vision of its earlier days and to realize that the wider the spread of economic prosperity the higher will be our own standards of living.

PLATFORM ISSUES

(By Wendell Willkie)

VII. FOREIGN POLICY

The administration has made many protestations of noble aims in foreign policy, but when the moment came to act on them, it has hesitated and compromised. Its foreign policy has not been to support American principles of freedom. It has dealt with the Fascist elements in conquered countries; it has stubbornly and incredibly refused to acknowledge the Committee of Liberation as the provisional French Government. It has been canny and personal and subjective. It has called this policy expediency. But since the policy has produced little but dislike, distrust, and loss of prestige for the United States without achieving the intended political aims, it has not been even expedient.

The formulation of an affirmative foreign policy by the Republican Party is thus a particularly important task.

There have been sharp divisions within the party concerning the extent to which it is desirable for the United States to maintain and develop relations with other nations. But surely the long debate, the events through which we lived before the war, and the war itself have made plain that American policy cannot be separated into two unrelated compartments, one labeled foreign policy and one domestic policy. The two areas of action are inseparable; what happens in either immediately affects the other.

We are not living in several worlds. Our small American farms, our huge American factories, have close bonds with what is produced in the Andes and the hills of Szechwan, with the complex trade mechanism of London, with the cargoes that sail from Bombay and Oslo and Melbourne. Whatever we do at home constitutes foreign policy. And whatever we do abroad constitutes domestic policy. This is the great, new political fact.

Furthermore, we have learned conclusively that in the modern world the United States cannot survive militarily, economically, or politically without close and continuing cooperation with the other nations of the world.

In stating its foreign policy platform the Republican Party should reflect the twentieth century knowledge.

1. Its platform should demand the immediate creation of a functioning council of the United Nations as a first step toward the ultimate formation of a general international organization, in order that directly, or by representation, all the peoples of the United Nations may have voice in the political decisions that are already being made in the world. So far these decisions are being made—or, in some cases, sidestepped and postponed—by Great Britain, Russia, and the United States, with China brought in as a "courtesy member" of the group where Asia is concerned.

Naturally the task of safeguarding the world from aggression will have to rest mainly on the shoulders of the great powers, since they alone possess the necessary military force. But the peoples of the small nations, and others not so small, whose political status and economic welfare are deeply involved in the decisions to be made, will not and should not permit three or four great powers to continue to dictate destiny. They must have a voice not only when decisions are made affecting their own fate but in shaping the world in which they will live. This is right; it is what will prove necessary in practice; and in the long run it will be advantageous to the national interest of a people with ideals like ours.

2. The platform should be clear and unambiguous in its attitude toward sovereignty. It should not adopt narrow nationalistic interpretations of the term; nor should it substitute quibbling words like "integrity." It should emphasize that our sovereignty is not something to be hoarded, but something to be used. The United States should use its sovereignty in cooperation with other powers to create an effective international organization for the good of all. History should have taught us that we gain more by cooperating to protect the general interest than by working alone for some imagined separate interest.

3. It should declare for a revision of the country's tariff policy. The United States, by reciprocity arrangements, should lower tariffs with break-down trade barriers. This should be done in consultation with other nations. For no longer can tariffs be arbitrarily determined by one nation without damaging the interest of others and provoking reactions that damage its own interests.

4. The Republican platform must recognize the fact that world currency stabilization is indispensable to the revival of world trade. At the same time it should recognize realistically that the requirements of the period of transition from war to peace and of the long years that will follow are quite different. The chief need of the transition period will be relief, rehabilitation, and the liquidation of foreign-owned balances—in other words, the problem is how to carry lend-lease to its logical conclusion. The long-term problem is the maintenance of as even balances as possible. The procedure for the first problem is relatively simple, and in any case lies largely in the control of the United States. For the second it is intricate. In its essence it must be based upon a relationship between the American dollar and the British pound, though cooperation of the nations of the world will be required.

5. Finally, the Republican platform should state the conviction that, Mr. Churchill to the contrary, the ideologies for which we fight have not become blurred for us in the course of the fighting, but have become clearer every day; and that, Mr. Roosevelt to the contrary, in becoming wiser we have not become more cynical. We know that the sacrifices of our men and women in this war has not been made simply in order to defend ourselves against brute force. We are fighting a war for freedom; we are fighting a war for men's minds. This means that we must encourage men's just aspirations for freedom not only at home but everywhere in the world.

Today all Americans watch with anxious hearts, and with pride and gratitude, the accomplishments of our armed forces in the far Pacific, in Italy, in Russia, and now on the shores of France. But while they are winning the armed victory for us, we have already begun to lose the things that victory could bring. Three years ago, 2 years ago, the United States had the material, the political, the moral leadership of the world. Today we have only the material leadership. We have lost political leadership through ineptness and delay. We have lost moral leadership through attempted expediency.

The Republican Party should frame and pursue a foreign policy that will recapture America's lost leadership.

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Wanted: 3,000,000 Jobs," written by Rex L. Nicholson, managing director, Builders of the West, Inc., San Francisco, Calif.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WANTED: 3,000,000 JOBS

(By Rex L. Nicholson, managing director, Builders of the West, Inc., San Francisco, Calif.)

The No. 1 objective of the American people today is to out-produce, out-build, and out-fight our enemies on every front until finally, in sackcloth and ashes, they capitulate in complete and unconditional surrender. While the task yet remaining before us is gigantic in scope, much has been accomplished since December 7, 1941. If we can continue to concentrate our combined resources and strength on the objective, a final victorious outcome is assured.

The second most important problem confronting us is to make the necessary advance preparation to protect and retain the things we are fighting for. The period following the war will be fraught with confusion and mass unemployment unless something very concrete is done to prevent it—now. Of all the questions being asked by our men on the fighting fronts, the one they are most interested in, and the one that is asked more often than any other, is "What are we coming back to when the war has been won?"

They want to know whether there really will be opportunities for good jobs at good wages on important work, or whether they will be returned to another leaf-raking program or be given a box of apples to sell on some street corner. Our Government has promised them there will be good jobs waiting when they return. We must keep faith with this promise. Next to winning the war, providing those jobs is our number one responsibility.

Twice during the past decade the American people have come face-to-face with major national problems with little, if any, advance preparation to cope with them. The first instance was the great depression of the 1930's; the second, the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. In each of these cases, some of the outstanding leaders of our country warned the people well in advance that difficulty lay in the immediate future. But all to no avail.

After Pearl Harbor, I reviewed the history of all the wars that had been fought by the American people since the Nation was founded. The record reveals that, without exception, history has repeated itself to the extent that developments preceding each of our wars, and conditions following them, have formed a complete cycle that is repetitious in every respect. We never have been prepared to fight when the time came. In each case we declared war, rushed out, and frantically marshalled our manpower and productive strength after the fight had started. This, in spite of the fact that ample advance warning was given time and time again.

Another very interesting phase of this cycle was the effect each war had on the peacetime economy of the country following the war. After the battle was over and war contracts had to be canceled and fighting forces demobilized, the country went into a tremendous industrial slump which lasted, in some cases, from 18 months to 2½ years. This slump was then followed by a major industrial boom which lasted from 4 to 7 years, depending on the size and length of the war that had been fought. Then the industrial boom was followed by a major depression that lasted about the same length of time as the preceding prosperous period.

The autobiography of the late Theodore Roosevelt was one of the books reviewed in this study. One of his chapters interested me particularly. It was captioned, "The Wars of America, the Unprepared." Mr. Roosevelt opened the chapter with this statement, "I suppose the American people will always be unprepared for war, and as a result will be exposed to very great expense and to the ultimate danger of complete defeat. But this is no new thing. The American people learn only from catastrophe, and not from experience."

I would like to underscore and repeat his last statement, "The American people learn only from catastrophe, and not from experience." This is a sad commentary, indeed, on the foresight, the initiative, and the willingness to face facts on our part.

We have reached a point in this war where we think we foresee the end. We also foresee some of the major problems that will confront us when that end finally arrives. These problems become more significant each day, because up to now the major portion of our so-called post-war preparation to meet these issues has been conducted either from a speaker's platform or through the press. And this, in spite of the fact that next to winning the war, they are the most important problems confronting the American people today. The big question before us is, "What are we going to do about them?"

Will we continue to make speeches and argue among ourselves about what should be done and how to do it, until the storm breaks in our faces? Or, will we step out now and face this problem and find a solution for it? If we follow the former course, we will have leaf-raking programs again and our war heroes will be forced to sell apples on some street corner. But the pitiful part about it is there will be no one to blame for it but ourselves.

No; I believe we have in this present generation of Americans the necessary initiative to break this repetitious cycle, but we must will jointly to do it. The one great lesson learned from the depression of the 1930's was that mass unemployment on a prolonged basis is a parasitical growth on a free economy that is insidious in its every aspect. It never must be tolerated again in this country if we expect our system of private competitive enterprise to survive.

Good jobs in this country are the results of a high, well-balanced industrial and agricultural production for active consumer markets. Such markets can exist only when the masses of the people have the purchasing power with which to buy. The program of the Builders of the West for the stimulation of total employment after the war is built around three basic requirements. They are:

1. Industry and agriculture must have the necessary incentive to stimulate the development now of comprehensive plans for a quick conversion to peace production when war contracts are canceled.

2. There must be developed a close working relationship between the four major forces—industry, agriculture, labor, and Government—for an all-out effort to provide full employment during conversion.

3. A concentrated drive must be made for an early stabilization of industry and agriculture at production levels high enough to insure the steady employment of the major portion of our people who are able and willing to work. Salaries and wages must be compatible with the highest standard of living possible of attainment.

A well-planned program of much-needed private and public construction should be planned and made ready now to facilitate employment and help sustain purchasing power during conversion.

The suggestion that the four great forces—industry, agriculture, labor, and Government—could get together on a peacetime program would have been given the horse laugh a few short years ago. But the war has changed all that. It has been demonstrated conclusively that we can get together in this country, and when we do, there is simply no limit to what can be accomplished.

It has been said again and again that we shall come out of this war with a tremendous national liability, and certainly every thinking person agrees with this statement. But our leading financiers tell us that there is no particular need to worry about liabilities as long as there are sufficient assets to offset them. If properly harnessed, we have sufficient assets to offset the liabilities of this Nation. We have the space, the fertile soil, the natural resources, and the manpower.

But the most important asset that we have is our power and ingenuity to produce. There is no power under heaven to compare with it when it is in full swing. Therefore, we have a right to assume an optimistic view. If this productive power is harnessed for peacetime purposes, we can produce our way out of debt. This is the only way it can be accomplished in our lifetime.

There are pessimists who say it will be impossible for us to consume what we produce, because the American people cannot afford it. But good common sense tells us that, without exception, a people can afford anything and everything that they can produce. We need to ask and attempt to find the answer to three major questions. They are:

These are the job makers: Agriculture, industry, construction.

These things must be done now: Crop planning, reclamation, soil conservation, modernize equipment, rural electrification, preserve present gains, develop new products, build wider markets, improve labor relations, revise freight rates, selection of projects, engineering design, prepare specifications, secure rights-of-way, plan financing.

1. What are we fighting for?
2. What do we want for post-war America?
3. How do we propose to get it?

An answer to the first question was provided by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill in their Atlantic Charter, wherein they declared the main objective of the Allied Nations in this war is to preserve and make available to all nations who desire them the advantages of the "four freedoms." Certainly every real American will subscribe wholeheartedly to this objective.

The answer to the second question covers a combination of desires and objectives for post-war America. First, we want a lasting peace that is protected in such a way that we will not have to fight a similar war during this century. We want to retain our system of free competitive enterprise, because it is our firm belief that it is the best system yet devised by man for the production and distribution of the goods and services necessary to provide the high standard of living to which we aspire. American labor must have the assurance of steady employment at wages compatible with a high standard of living, with the hope of attaining a standard that is even higher than anything yet experienced. We want a richer, deeper, cultural, and social life for our people, with broader opportunities for education and the enjoyment of the better things of life.

There is only one answer for the third question. We can accomplish all these things if we will jointly to do so. But they never can be accomplished as long as the four major forces in this country stand in their respective corners and regard each other with distrust. An honest willingness to meet the other fellow halfway in the solution of mutual problems will get the answer. No other system will.

There is a great need for common-sense leadership that understands and appreciates the significance of this statement. We need leaders with the pioneer spirit who believe in the future of this country and its people. Leaders who have vision, initiative, determination, stamina, and optimism. The late Will Rogers said, "In my opinion, a real optimist is a man who can enjoy the view after having been treed by a bull." This is the kind of optimistic leadership needed to solve our problems after this war—a leadership that can see beyond the obstacles that are in our immediate way, the tremendous possibilities for the development of the West and that can work to accomplish all of these things.

The average enterpriser is vitally interested in two questions. First, he wants to know what else he can do to help win the war. Second, he wants to know what will happen to his business or industry when the war is finally won. In order to provide a cushion of employment and an assurance to private industry that the purchasing power will be sustained during the conversion period, there is an immediate need for the planning of a huge construction program. The plan should include all types of industrial construction, office buildings, hotels, apartment houses, and other business and industrial establishments; preparation for the continuous rebuilding of our urban centers with special emphasis on modern layouts and designing; development of programs for the financing and construction of new homes and community centers, and the remodeling and modernizing of the older homes in the community.

The municipalities should be encouraged to plan for the provision of additional necessary domestic water supply and sewer systems and sewage-disposal facilities; street construction and improvement programs; freeways and parkways to alleviate traffic congestions, where necessary; schools, hospitals, health centers, playgrounds, recreational areas, parks, and airport facilities. The communities should be encouraged to prepare working plans, specifications, and contract documents; to select rights-of-way, determine their cost, and prepare for prompt acquisition; to complete the legal and financial arrangements for immediate construction when the time comes.

The county and State governments should be encouraged and assisted in the preparation of detailed plans and specifications for the construction and improvement of county roads and State highways, farm- and mine-to-market roads, county and State institutional buildings, conservation, flood control, land usage projects, etc. The Federal agencies should prepare plans now for the construction of Federal buildings, such as post offices, banks, Federal office buildings; interstate and transcontinental highways; large-scale soil and water conservation projects; flood control and channel stabilization for our larger rivers and streams; reclamation of arid lands, land-use programs, reforestation, irrigation, and power development; slum clearance; malaria control; and large land-drainage projects.

The leading men of the construction industry in the 11 Western States are fully aware of the problems confronting us in the next decade. They know the No. 1 requirement for any post-war preparedness program is that it be so organized and so executed that it will not detract at any time or in any way from the main war effort. If properly executed, the morale of our fighting men and our war workers can be boosted tremendously through the knowledge that the necessary advance preparations are being made.

To accomplish this, they have set up the Builders of the West, Inc., a nonprofit, nonpolitical organization that has been financed in its entirety with private capital and dedicated to the development of the West. Its objectives are threefold:

1. An all-out drive will be made to accomplish the preparation of plans and specifications for a huge construction program comprised of both public and private projects, such as those listed above, that will be ready to go when the fighting ceases and the boys start coming home.

2. The entire weight of the organization will be thrown into the fight for the retention and expansion of the industrial gains experienced in the West during the war. Also, every effort will be made to assist the communities in attracting new industries and business.

3. The third objective will include a determined effort to stabilize the construction industry during the post-war adjustment period.

In spite of the fact that it is the third largest industry in the United States, the construction industry is the most unstable of them all. It always has been either a feast or a famine. The contractor, the material, and the equipment manufacturers either find their organizations completely swamped with work and orders, or they have no work or orders at all, and their equipment and plants sit idle and deteriorate. By working jointly with the several levels of government, much can be done to help stabilize construction and facilitate total employment through the various public works programs of the country. In most cases, the release of public-works projects for construction can be controlled in a given locality and used as a cushion to balance employment. When private construction needs the workers, public projects can be held up and released during slack periods of private construction, thus serving to level the peaks and valleys in the entire industry. This form of control is highly desirable, and would have a much-needed stabilizing effect on the peacetime economy of the country as a whole.

To help accomplish this, Builders of the West have established a regional office in San Francisco that is being staffed with specialists in these respective fields of operation. A fact-finding division has been created that will gather and correlate all information possible pertaining to the private and public construction needs of the various communities, counties, and States throughout this area. This information will be tabulated for reporting purposes and made available to all of the interested groups.

Its second function is to assist in every way possible in bringing about a closer cooperation between the existing agencies and groups concerned with the problem of post-war preparedness in all of its ramifications. Third, a common mouthpiece for informing the public by radio, newspapers, and other media is being set up.

The specialized staff of the organization will assist the smallest communities, the largest urban centers, and county, State, and Federal bodies concerned with planning, with their problems of manpower, finance, legislation, coordination, and the preparation of their respective plans. The organization will work also toward the establishment of a close relationship with the Western Conference of Governors, Congressional delegations, the various State commissions on interstate cooperation, and all civic and professional groups now set up and dealing with the question of conversion and employment following the close of the war.

There are those who contend that this advance planning cannot be accomplished without detracting from the war effort, but such contentions are fallacious. Most of the larger industrial organizations are in the process of preparing their post-war plans now, or have pretty clearly in mind what they want to plan for. With the establishment of the incentives enumerated earlier, they will proceed with the completion of their plans and maintain their war production schedules simultaneously. The middle-sized and smaller enterprisers, farmers, and local governments can and will develop plans for their post-war operations without lessening their contributions to the war effort in the least, if they are furnished the proper encouragement and assistance.

It is entirely logical for the construction industry to take the lead in this regard, because, in the main, the major portion of the required war construction is completed, or is now in the process of completion. Therefore, the industry is ready for its next big assignment. There are a sufficient number of engineers, architects, and construction specialists available now to undertake the preparation of the plans and specifications for the suggested construction program and complete them on schedule. It shall be understood clearly that all projects to be constructed must pass the test of genuine need for the structure, and not merely to furnish employment.

The financial position of many of the States and governmental units has improved materially because of wartime activities. Others have suffered financially because of labor migration to war production areas. For those units not financially able to accomplish adequate advance planning, assistance should be provided from State or Federal funds.

The first objective is to effect a complete transition from war to peace without widespread unemployment and dissipation of the now-accumulated purchasing power. A consistent effort to stabilize industry and employment should follow.

The Lawyer of Tomorrow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein an address delivered by me to the graduating class of the Washington College of Law on Thursday, June 15, 1944:

You, who are graduating from this college of law, deserve sincere congratulations. You are to be congratulated upon the years of effort and energy which you have put forth in order to secure a degree in your chosen profession, and you are to be congratulated upon your choice of a profession. In my opinion, no profession is more honorable or offers greater opportunities for service than does the law. You will have an opportunity of service, not only to your clients whom you will represent, but as a citizen in a great democracy. You will have an opportunity of service in taking an interest in, and participating in, public affairs.

In every country, throughout the ages, it has been the members of the legal profession who have furnished the leadership. It is the lawyers who have led public opinion in meeting every crisis which has confronted this Nation. And it is the lawyers who will lead the people of this Nation in meeting the present, most complexing and difficult problems which ever faced our society.

For years, I am sure, every graduating class has been told and impressed with the fact that they are finishing college and entering their chosen fields of endeavor at the most complex and difficult time of history. And they have been told that never before has any class had more responsibility of government and leadership than the members of the class just then receiving degrees. And yet, I am sure that this year this statement which has been so frequently repeated is in fact true. You are graduating and are entering your profession at a time when this Nation is in the midst of the greatest struggle of history—a struggle for survival.

As citizens, everyone's paramount job is, of course, to bend every effort toward carrying the war to a complete victory. You are, I know, doing your bit today. But as graduate lawyers and members of the bar you will be called upon, and I am certain you will seek more active and more useful ways to do your part. This gigantic struggle, you may be sure, is one that will require the utmost cooperation and effort on the part, not only of our fighting forces, but on the part of every one of us at home. Our fighting men cannot carry on to victory unless we furnish them the tools and equipment with which to fight and, perhaps more important than that, unless we furnish them unity of backing and of purpose here at home. They must know and it is up to us to see that they know that the cause for which they are offering to give their lives is just, and that we will see that the purpose for which they are offering their all will not be forgotten in the years to come.

When victory is won the paramount question in the minds of the American people, and indeed of the peace-loving people all over the world, is how to make peace secure. Today the world's teeming millions are looking to us—to the great and mighty United States of America—for leadership and for a clear indication of the course to be followed in the future. I think we have made a decision that we will not again forsake the world and that we will not again turn our backs on our plain responsibility, but this decision must be protected with eternal vigilance and we must not let any other issue arise which will divert us from our course.

There was a time when we felt that we were insulated from foreign aggression by friendly neighbors on the north and south and by wide oceans on our east and west, but this conception has necessarily undergone a complete change. No part of the world can be at war without our security being imperiled. The rapid development of air warfare gives each nation a contiguous frontier. Attack and destruction can be literally rained upon a people without notice and their capacity to make war can be critically crippled.

As every lawyer knows, from the earliest days of history mankind has found some form of collective action necessary. Unfortunately, in every society there are criminals and desperadoes and in every city and community we must have law enforcement officers to keep the peace. It is the same with nations. Criminals may grow up because of heredity, environment, or because of the lack of medical care or proper food. We do what we can to eliminate these causes but even so we must have police to protect the law-abiding citizen in his rights and safety. Among the nations of the world, trade, improved living conditions, education, and religion can do much to lessen the tendency toward national aggression but, as in the case of the local communities, this is not enough. It is plain that we must have an international agency to protect the peace of the world. It must now also be plain to most Americans that this country must keep its position as the No. 1 nation of the world and must do its share in joining with other peace-loving nations in preventing the repetition of this devastating horror.

The people of the older generation have not done a very good job in operating this country or in meeting their responsibility. The errors of the older generation allowed World War No. 1 to occur. They led us into the boom days of the twenties, with the resultant unemployment and social and financial depression. And then the greatest error of all was in failing to do our part to prevent the occurrence of World War No. 2. For that error those of my age must take their share of the blame. Thus, it is not a pretty picture that confronts us.

Ninety percent of the money collected by the Government since the beginning of this Republic has been spent on arms and armament. This has been necessary, but think of the great good this money could have accomplished if spent for other purposes. Surely history must have taught us our lesson. Surely we must now see that the nations of the world must band together as the States of this country have banded together in creating a bulwark of security and in advancing our civilization. A big part of the responsibility for doing this falls upon those graduating here tonight and in other colleges and universities at this season throughout the Nation. I know that the average person would say, in answer to my plea that you assume a part in doing your bit in preventing a reoccurrence of this kind, that there is very little that one person can do. That is quite true, but if every person took that attitude think of the decadent condition his country would be in.

Furthermore, let us always remember that our foreign policy, our international security, is tied up directly with the problems of the home front. We cannot have international security unless we work for it, and we work for it or against it by the little things we do here at home. Whether we have international trade is a decision that we make here and that decision will rest primarily upon public opinion, which you can do a great deal to influence. Whether we have international security will depend to a great extent upon understanding and cooperation with our allies. Therefore, it would be well to try to find avenues of friendship with the Russians, with the British, and with the Chinese, and with the other peoples of the world, rather than adding fuel to class and race hatreds. A few people cursing the British or expressing suspicion of the Russians is doing much to lessen our chances of world peace. You, if you will do so, can negative many of those ill influences.

Then, too, on the home front, where matters of meeting our post-war domestic obligations, we must have a healthy democracy—one in which the citizen takes his place. I think that every young lawyer should identify himself with one of the political parties, he should vote, and he should express himself on public issues. He should help to make the democratic process work.

There are those who say that democracy is inefficient, that it cannot meet modern tendencies and conditions. I do not agree with these pessimists. But if democracy is to work, the individual citizen must keep it virile and vigorous.

Then, too, in this country we must prepare for the post-war period. We must use intelligence in reconverting our industries back to peacetime production. We must find jobs and employment for returning veterans and dislocated war workers. These are matters in which you have a responsibility.

I know that I have talked at too much length about the duties of a lawyer in public affairs, but perhaps young lawyers cannot be too greatly impressed with the fact that in this Nation lawyers at the present time and lawyers in the future are the political, economic, and social leaders of the country. The very nature of the legal profession makes this true, and the success with which lawyers discharge their obligations of leadership will mark the success that our Nation and the world will have in the future. But I feel that I should also say a few words about the future of your profession and give you some advice that may be of benefit to you in successfully following your profession. There are those who have expressed fear that in the years to come the legal profession may practically be abolished and that lawyers will no longer be needed. This fear is entirely groundless. The next generation will have a greater need of lawyers than we do at the present. As long as we are ruled by laws, lawyers will be necessary in the protection of the rights of individuals. As long as we operate under a democratic system lawyers will be necessary in adjusting relations between the individual and his Government.

The profession of the law is one of the fruits of civilization and will endure as long as civilization lasts. Legislative bodies deal with the rights of the public. Lawyers deal with the rights of individuals. Lawyers have also played a conspicuous part in the framing and maintaining of our Government. To me there is no higher service and more sacred duty than defending the rights of the individual citizen and protecting him in his life, liberty, and property against invasion, either by another individual or by his Government. All honor to the great profession which throughout the centuries has stood guard in the defense and the preservation of the rights of their clients and of their country. While there may have been some members of the bar who have rendered a disservice and have not reflected credit upon the profession, yet the legal profession as a whole has made a notable contribution to the civilization in which we live.

You who are about to identify yourselves as members of this great profession need have no apprehension that there will be no work to be done. There will be plenty of work for lawyers to do, and if you are prepared, and well prepared, to do it and give the best that is in you, you will not want for clients.

As I visualize the lawyer of tomorrow, and I mean by that term the lawyer who will succeed and leave his imprint upon the generation in which he lives, these are the characteristics which will form the foundation not only of his success but of his service to the country.

He will revere the past and the precedents established by our jurisprudence, and will preserve inviolate the fundamental principles upon which the science of the law is built. He will realize the wisdom that comes from experience, and he will delve into the history of the past and will look to these principles enunciated by the fathers for a solution of the problems of the present.

While revering the past, he will adjust himself to the changing world in which he lives. He will grow and expand, and will not remain static.

He will play his part in the changes that take place, either in jurisprudence or in government. He will be a factor in helping to preserve an even balance between the clash and conflict of antagonistic interests. He will be a tower of strength in assisting in the preservation and the maintenance of constitutional government, and his influence will always be opposed to revolution, overthrow, or the impairment of our democratic form of government. His education, background, experience, and reverence for law and order will splendidly equip him for this task.

The lawyer of tomorrow, as in the past, will be independent. His profession enables him to be so. There is one thing about the legal profession that has always appealed to me—that a lawyer more so than those engaged in business pursuits can think and act independently. Those engaged in business who have competition, by force of necessity cannot be outspoken and independent for fear of driving their customers to their competitors, but the lawyer sells his services and his legal ability. He does not depend on favoritism or fawning, but upon sheer ability and service performed. The lawyer sells his services to his clients, but the real lawyer never sells his conscience, his conviction, or his soul. These he does not have to sell, if he has the ability to achieve results.

The lawyer of tomorrow will be a worker. No lawyer in the past has, and no lawyer in the future will, achieve success unless he gives unremitting toil and persistent labor to his work. At a commencement exercise a few years ago, in one of our eastern colleges, one of the lawyer graduates, in considering what would be the subject of his address first chose one dealing with some theoretical question of law, but upon second thought he decided to speak upon a more practical question, and the subject of his address was We Want Jobs. A member of one of the largest firms in Chicago was present and heard this young man's plea for a job, and was impressed, not only with his earnestness but his willingness to pay the price of success by hard work, and on the same day, after the address had been delivered, the Chicago lawyer approached the young man and offered him a minor position with his firm, which the young man immediately accepted, and he is today one of the senior members of that great firm.

He will be true to his clients. The fidelity with which attorneys have remained steadfast and loyal to their clients' interests is an outstanding characteristic of the legal profession. During my entire life I have never known more than two or three lawyers, notwithstanding their other faults, to be lacking in fidelity to their clients.

He will realize that character counts, and that no legal career can permanently succeed that is not built upon honesty and fair dealing. No law can endure which is not founded upon justice, equity, and right, and no lawyer can succeed and attain a real measure of permanent success unless these principles are woven into the warp and woof of his very life.

And so the future is difficult, but it is also bright. There is a lot to do. This is an exciting, a challenging period in history.

The Fate of Finland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, various matters have prevented my comment on the recent action of the State Department in asking the Minister to Finland, the Honorable Mr. Procope, to leave this country. It may be that the State Department is running true to form, but I do not follow their type of activity. Not only Finland, but other small countries of Europe, and I have talked about them in other remarks I have made to the House, are entitled not only to our sympathy, but also to our active support. I want to say frankly that I am not one of those that believe in the lease-lend for Russia, and at the same time favors the extermination of the small and defenseless countries in the Old World. I think this disgraceful episode is well expressed in an editorial from the Washington Times-Herald on Saturday, June 27, 1944, which editorial is as follows:

DEATH OF FINLAND

WE GIVE RUSSIA A FREE HAND

Now Finland is really finished. The Russians have been given a free hand by the United States of America to wade right in and carry on their routine of extermination. It is a savage, barbaric routine.

It calls for the firing squad, the secret police, and the transportation of people by the thousands to the void of Siberia. They are never heard from again.

And it is an old, old routine in Russia. The Finns will now travel a bloody trail blazed by countless thousands of Poles, Latvians, Lithuanians, Estonians—yes, and Russians, too. It is a disohnorable routine, but it works.

The Russians can use it to make an end to Finland forever. Then the world won't have to be bothered any longer by that wonderful little country which has set such a hard example of integrity and decent conduct.

It will be no problem at all for Russia to swallow Finland without trace and do away with the last of its men.

There were only slightly more than three and a half million Finns in 1939—a population about equal to that of Chicago and its main suburbs—and, in the 4 years of war that have followed, they have suffered heavy loss.

Their last hope of a savior was the United States of America, and yesterday our State Department ordered Finland's principal diplomats here to pack up and get out and take their families with them.

They were accused of acts "inimical" to our interests.

FINLAND ALWAYS PAID; WE PLEASANTLY ACCEPTED

Perhaps those "inimical" acts included their insistence on Finland's paying the regular installments of her debts to the Government of the United States of America whenever due.

For it is certainly true that 2 days ago, on June 15, Finnish Minister H. J. Procope paid his country's debt installment right across the counter to the Treasury Department, which pleasantly accepted the money. That act of Finland's is certainly one of which none of the other nations owing us is guilty.

And just about all the other nations in the world, including our great Allies, England and Russia, owe us.

The Finns have always insisted on living up to their obligations and minding their own business, a contrary example in the modern world. So, they go.

But the story of their going is a sorry chapter in world history, and our own part in it is sorriest of all.

For we are the ones who were, verbally and emotionally, the most bellicose when Finland first defied Russia. Our own President led us in this. And the Finns listened to us. It was a fatal error on their part.

Let's trace out this unheroic story of our behavior from the beginning.

THEY WON THEIR FREEDOM IN 1917

For centuries the Finns were a football of war between Russia and Sweden, but they never really submitted to Russia any more than they did to Sweden. The Finns are a people wholly different from the Russians in language and customs, just as they are different from the Swedes.

Finally their chance came when Russia turned in 1917 from war with Germany to civil war and a Bolshevik dictatorship The Finns proclaimed their independence on December 6, 1917, and were promptly recognized by the world powers—including the United States of America.

They joined the League of Nations, followed all the rules, and really lived the quiet life of a small neutral democracy with no interest in war.

The big test of their neutrality came in May of 1939 when Hitler offered a nonaggression past to Finland, Norway, and Sweden. All three firmly rejected it.

They were just little nations and didn't have much insight into the ways of the great powers.

They were shocked when Germany unveiled, in August of 1939, a nonaggression pact with none other than Russia. Then they were staggered when Russia, jointly with Germany, proceeded to destroy Poland. And then they were stunned. For next Germany went into a sitzkrieg while Russia swallowed Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania—and, without provocation, attacked Finland.

ROOSEVELT'S PRAISE FOR FINLAND IN 1939

Have you forgotten about all that? Well, maybe these words of President Roosevelt will remind you:

"The news of the Soviet naval and military bombarding within Finnish territory has come as a profound shock to the Government and people of the United States.

"Despite efforts made to solve the dispute by peaceful methods, to which no reasonable objection could be offered, one power has chosen to resort to force of arms. The people and government of Finland have a long, honorable, and wholly peaceful record which has won for them the respect and warm regard of the people and Government of the United States."

Those words were the keynote of a unanimous American feeling about Finland. We loudly urged the Finns to fight and promised help.

The misfortunes of the Finns that have followed all date from Russia's unprovoked and inexcusable attack in 1939. And now the Finns are in ruins.

Shortly they are going to die.

And we, who saw them so noble in 1939, are turning our faces away from them in their last days. Is there any of us who can be proud?

We Need Constructive Labor Leadership

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD W. LANDIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, if the superstate, already sketched by the New Deal, triumphs—then there will be only one "boss"—the Government—and all of us, labor and management alike, will have to obey or perish. Already our Government has made inroads on our American way of life.

The Republican Party, in its determination to protect American industry and the American farmer, has also served to protect the American workingman against competition from slave labor abroad.

The New Deal administration, which only recently tried to draft labor over the protest of all trade unions, offers imported theories of the crackpot variety. The New Deal has prospered by setting group against group and class against class.

The Republican Party has been fighting for the program set out by William L. Hutcheson, head of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America and first vice president of the American Federation of Labor. His program is as follows:

First. The preservation of free enterprise.

Second. The abatement of bureaucracy.

Third. The halt of paternalism.

Fourth. The creation of post-war jobs through private industry.

Fifth. The maintenance of labor's social gains.

Sixth. The protection of our national interest.

One more example of the need of adopting the second plank in Mr. Hutcheson's program, which is the abatement of bureaucracy, is well illustrated by the following editorial by Mr. Douglas Larsen in the June 15 issue of the Washington Daily News:

TOP MEN GIVEN BIG RAISES WHILE LOWER PAID WAIT FOR THEIRS

(By Douglas Larsen)

While United Federal Workers of America struggle desperately to get hearings on a bill to effect wage increases for the mass of Government clerks and stenographers, records reveal that some big shots have had phenomenal raises since getting on the Government pay roll during the war.

This situation as it exists in certain war agencies has recently been brought to the attention of Congressmen and is the subject of much discussion on the Hill.

Here are cases which have caused comment among persons trying to help lower-paid Government workers:

A 38-year-old announcer and writer, before joining the Government in March 1942, was making $1,400 a year. He had two college degrees. He went on the pay roll at War Relocation Authority at $6,500 and in 14 months was making $8,000 in a job unrelated to his experience.

In his job as a college professor a 39-year-old man was making $2,000 a year. When the war broke out he got a job as an administrative officer with W. R. A. for $4,600 a year, then went to $5,800 to $6,500 and finally to $8,000 as a business specialist. This in spite of the fact that he hadn't had a shred of actual business experience.

LAWYER ROCKETS TO BIG DOUGH

A young lawyer with 6 months' legal experience that would have given him about $3,000 a year was hired by a Government agency at $4,600 and within a year was a $6,000 legal light, after which he switched to a second agency at $6,750 until W. R. A. came along. It paid him $8,000.

Typical of how permanent departments have been raided by the war agencies is revealed in the case of a man making $3,200 as a social economist at the Department of Agriculture. After 16 months with a war agency he is making $2,400 more.

Another man with 2 years' teachers college training was hired by Government in June 1942, for $2,900. He has since been promoted to $5,600 a year.

A professor with law and philosophy degrees was earning $2,600 teaching. He got a job as soil conversationist with Government at $3,800, switched to a different agency as a social science analyst for $4,600, and is now in W. R. A. making $8,000 a year.

A high-school grad with 1 year in business school was making $3,700 a year in private business. He came with the Government as an assistant project manager for $5,600 and in 5 months was earning $6,500.

SITUATION BAD FOR MORALE

A comment was made on this subject of raises for big shots in New York recently. Speaking before the University Club June 9, Joseph L. Borda, staff director of the Byrd committee said:

"On the basis of an analysis by the committee, Federal employees in the upper brackets are getting substantial raises in salary. In one agency several persons who are now receiving $8,000 a year received an average increase plus a salary boost at the time they entered that agency of $2,650. I personally know many Government employees who haven't received wages like that over a period of 10 years. In the same agency those persons receiving $6,500 a year had salary increases on the average of $2,840. This is bad for morale."

In light of this remark, and the fact that Congressmen are doing a lot of talking about it, leads to the assumption that something might be done soon, possibly by the Byrd committee.

It must be remembered that these employees in the lower income brackets receive less than one-half the overtime cost-of-living bonus that is being provided for the bureaucrats in the higher income brackets.

Sound Insurance Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of New Mexico. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I desire to reprint an editorial appearing in the Chicago Sun, June 17, 1944.

In a previous address to the Congress I sought to point out that the Walter bill, H. R. 3270, is not sufficient to cover the present situation in the field of insurance. The decisions of the Supreme Court that insurance is interstate commerce and affects interstate commerce require that the States take immediate notice and seek to safeguard the State regulation of insurance business. It is not enough to declare that antitrust acts do not apply to it for when the Supreme Court held the business of insurance to be an interstate commerce it brought before every company, every State official, and every policyholder the possibility of Federal regulation under the commerce clause of our Constitution.

If we repeal every antitrust law on our statute books we would not have done away with the possibility or, if you prefer, the threat of Federal regulation. That only disappears when the State itself actively and constructively operates in that field. The best way to avoid Federal regulation is to have good State regulation which every policyholder and every purchaser of insurance can trust, respect, and find to be in his interest.

I therefore renew my plea to this Congress not to pass the Walter bill but to go further and to declare that the regulation of insurance practices, the licensing of agents, the requirements for financial stability, the provision of standard policies and forms remain the responsibility of States and that these important functions should not be sidetracked by groups of insurance executives who seek to avoid an antitrust prosecution. Not a line in H. R. 3270 touches these important questions of State regulation and we would only delude the insurance-buying public to pass the bill H. R. 3270 in its present form and tell them that it would preserve State regulation of an interstate commodity.

The editorial from the Chicago Sun is as follows:

SOUND ADVICE ON INSURANCE

The National Association of Insurance Commissioners, meeting in Chicago, is trying to decide what to do about the Supreme Court decision holding the insurance business subject to the Federal antitrust laws. The best advice the commissioners have received came from Representative ANDERSON of New Mexico, who in a House speech invited them to help Congress draft a sound national insurance law.

The commissioners did not like the court decision. Many of them supported the Bailey-Walter bill, sponsored by insurance firms to forestall the Court's ruling. But Mr. ANDERSON warned them that faith in the Bailey-Walter bill is now a delusion. Congress cannot permanently evade responsibility for protecting our people from any abuses discovered in the risk business. The State officials, if they approach the problem constructively, can materially assist the Federal Government. This viewpoint, it is satisfying to see, is endorsed by the association's president, Charles F. J. Harrington, of Massachusetts.

"Plant a Rose for Me"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, the Congressional Medal of Honor was awarded to a young man who lived in my district. His name was Bill Bordelon.

Frances Bryson, of the staff of the New Orleans Item, wrote a story about this heroic boy which is as fine a piece of human interest newspaper reporting as I have read in a long time.

Frances Bryson is that kind of a newspaper woman reporter that those of us who have been in the newspaper business like to refer to as a good newspaperman.

This is a mighty pretty little piece which I am sure will tug at your heart strings. It unfolds the beautiful simplicity and sweetness of thought which so many of our American boys carry into battle with them and on the spot where they fall and their blood spills on the soil I am sure nowhere else is so red the rose.

Here is Frances Bryson's own story of this gallant lad:

"PLANT A ROSE FOR ME"
(By Frances Bryson)

"Would you somewhere, in some garden," Bill Bordelon wrote home, "plant a rose for me?"

Bill was a gentle boy, serious, polite and quiet. His brother is a priest, and his aunt was a nun here in New Orleans. He lived here before he joined the Marines.

Then he became a one-man war—and so valiant was his death that he is being posthumously awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor on Saturday.

Only one other New Orleans resident, the gallant Commander Gilmore, whose last words "Take her down" are now famous, has received in this war this highest award that the United States can bestow.

Bill's grandmother, Mrs. A. L. Bordelon, 327 South Solomon Street, has gone to San Antonio for the ceremony, as his parents live there now.

The sergeant's heroism at Tarawa, where he was killed after ignoring at least three serious wounds to hold almost single-handed a part of the beach, saved the lives of two of his comrades.

One of them, Sgt. Elden Beers, told the story.

"Bill and I were together in the Marines for 2 years, through basic and advanced training and fighting on Guadalcanal and Tarawa," he said. "We were in the same landing craft as we headed for the beach, Bill as platoon leader and myself as a squad leader.

"Only five of us got out of that boat and made the landing alive, I think. The rest were killed or fatally wounded by snipers and machine gunners who hit us about 50 yards from shore. As the boat stopped Bill and I jumped over the side and immediately got tangled in barbed wire.

"We freed ourselves and by some miracle made it to the beach. Bill took some demolition charges and exposed himself to fire by standing up while he pitched two packages of dynamite at the snipers. That eliminated those Japs, but Bill was hit by a bullet which made a hole through his left arm. He also received two small shrapnel wounds in the face. We bandaged him and tried to quiet him but he refused and ordered us to make up our last two demolition charges. The most damaging gun was about 200 yards back from the shore. Bill took the last two charges and started to crawl toward the enemy emplacement. He insisted on going alone. He knocked out that gun, too, but got another bullet hole through his left arm. All he would let us do was apply a tourniquet.

"We decided to attempt to rescue some of the wounded men, and Bill went to look for a Hospital Corps man at another beach but all he was able to find was a rifle grenade. He was approaching the machine-gun nest when one of our wounded fellows floated in with the tide. Bill went to help him and was again wounded, this time in the shoulder, and knocked down.

"Later some of the men told me Bill was killed. I think he was the bravest marine I ever saw."

What Beers didn't know was that one of Bill's wounds was caused by a demolition bomb exploding in his hand, but he grabbed a rifle and kept firing to cover a group of marines scaling a sea wall.

He again made up demolition charges and singlehandedly assaulted a fourth Japanese machine-gun position, but was instantly killed when caught in a final burst of fire from the enemy.

Bill's father, W. J. Bordelon, wrote Representative HÉBERT in Washington, urging that "such of the Pacific Islands as may be deemed important and necessary to the defense of our homeland, be held, especially if these areas were redeemed by American blood.

"I have in mind," he wrote, "particularly the Gilbert Islands, where there is a mound of sand covering the remains of a marine sergeant, our son, who gave his life in the engagement which resulted in the capture of these islands from the Japs.

"I hereby lay claim to at least that part of the island where his remains lie."

Bill has two aunts, Mrs. Ethel Bordelon Cooper and Mrs. A. D. Allen, living in New Orleans, as well as his grandmother, and an uncle, Byron B. Bordelon, of 3520 Banks Street.

The message about the rose was written underneath a picture of himself that Bill sent to his sister, Mrs. Peggy Sink, of San Antonio. Her captain husband is overseas. Bill is survived by his parents, his sister, and three brothers, Rev. Bro. Thomas Bordelon, Dayton, Ohio, and Raymond and Bobbie Bordelon, of San Antonio.

The ceremony will take place at a formal sunset review, and will be attended by the Governor of Texas, the mayor of San Antonio, and officials of all branches of the service.

Bill would have been 21 on last Christmas Day. He was killed November 20.

A rose has been planted for Bill.

But his memory will stay fresh in the hearts of his countrymen longer than any rose bush will live.

Now Is the Time To Consider Legislation for the Aged

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, if ever there was a time in the history of our Nation when we ought to be selling the virtues of democracy to the rest of the world it is right now. We think we have the form of government best suited to meet the needs of the common man, but unfortunately we have not eliminated certain grave defects in it. Until these defects are eliminated it is going to be difficult for us to persuade other peoples to follow our example. Hitler and Mussolini arrayed their people against us by pointing out the facts that we did not offer equal opportunity to all men as we boasted; that the poverty in our great metropolitan centers was as sordid and beastly as could be found anywhere in the world; that monopoly rode roughshod over many types of industry in this boasted land of the free; that education of the masses was a haphazard affair resulting in shameful illiteracy; that the elder veterans of labor who had reached the age of helplessness were accorded less consideration than retired Army mules, and many other shortcomings in our political system.

We, to our sorrow and shame, cannot deny that they partially told the truth about us, and when these national faults of ours are paraded before the world and nothing said about our virtues, it makes our boasts about democracy seem pretty nauseating.

Just now the world is diligently seeking some formula which can be set up as a beacon for all nations to follow that will start mankind upon the upward road toward international fellowship and cooperation leading to a world of permanent peace on earth and good will among men.

I believe that if we analyze the defects of all governments that we will find one fundamental wrong back of them all. That wrong lies in permitting the human hogs among us to build legal protection for themselves which fortifies them while they take an undue share of the wealth as it is produced. If some equitable system of wealth distribution could be provided for by only one nation, an example would be furnished that other nations would be likely to follow.

Distribution is the key word which will unlock the prison of poverty for the masses. Free the masses from poverty, give them homes and possessions of their own and it would be impossible to stir them up to a frenzy of hatred and bloodthirstiness. We can totally obliterate the spirit for war when we establish justice in the matter of distributing the world's goods. But under our profit system, the only way we can distribute our wealth of things equitably is to provide our people with the means of buying them. The ability to buy must precede the ability to produce and to possess. Wages and salaries constitute the main dependence of the masses for obtaining food, clothing, and shelter. Whenever those who control the flow of money wish to do so, or when they are impelled by fear to do so, whether they wish it or not, they can close banks, shut down production, stop the movement of money through the wage and salary channels and thus deprive the masses of a means of making a livelihood for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, a new system of money flow must be had for the nation that will not depend upon the whims or fears of a small coterie of financiers. Such a system must be national in character, governed by the Congress of the United States. It must be basically established as the foundation of our monetary system. Obviously if every community in the land is to be liberally supplied with food, clothing and shelter—all of which we know we are amply able to supply—money must be made available to every community with which to buy these necessities. How shall we pipe line money into every community continuously in quantity sufficient to keep business thriving? Today when wages and salaries stop, business stops and depression starts. It is apparent that a new distribution of money—buying power—other than wages and salaries will have to be set up if we are going to insure ourselves against the recurrence of depressions.

Well, if we need insurance against depressions, let us have insurance. Let us set up a national, mutual, endowment, citizens insurance against the hazards of sickness, accident and old age and pay with money at monthly intervals all those citizens who are unable to make a lving for themselves because of these afflictions. Our census statistics tell us that about 10 percent of the adult population are incapacitated for making a living for themselves by reason of decrepitude resulting from old age, sickness and accidents. When physical disability puts 10 percent of the population out of the working class, it also puts them out of the buying class, and when panic and depression assail the business world the jobless workers are added to the permanent 10 percent of nonbuyers. That paralyzes business. Now when business is paralyzed wealth production stops, and everybody suffers.

By setting up our national mutual insurance and operating it on a nonprofit basis and paying all the incapacitated members of society at monthly periods a liberal percentage of the wealth dividend created by the entire population, on condition that each recipient would have to spend his entire allowance each 30 days, we can have a money flow into all communities that will not depend upon wages and salaries, and that will sustain business when wages and salaries fall off. Let us assume that our national insurance is in force. Let us assume that we have geared the payment benefits to the productive ability of the Nation and that it has been decided that we can safely set aside 3 percent of the current national income for the payment of these benefits. It has been estimated by competent economists that at the present high level of production 3 percent of it, measured in dollars, will pay monthly $100 to 16,000,000 people, 12 percent of the population.

Now if a community of a thousand souls had but 10 percent of its people drawing from the Government a hundred dollars each, every 30 days, $10,000 would flow into that community each and every month. Could any other stabilizer of business be devised that would be more dependable? Would not that money turn over several times during a 30-day period? Would not several times the original $10,000 be reflected in the actual business done as a result of starting the money flowing in that community?

Let us think how we shall insure business. We cannot insure business unless we insure the supply of money which creates the market for goods and services. Industry cannot insure the flow of money into every community. When industry lags, the flow of money through wages also lags. To insure business we must first insure the flow of money. With the flow of money insured, business is bound to thrive. Nothing can stop or retard it.

This insurance of money flow has never been tried because until this new era of machine production arrived, there was never enough goods to go around, the hand methods used could not supply enough for all to live well. There was always scarcity. Now, in this new machine age, our ability to produce has run away ahead of our ability to buy. We must build our purchasing capacity up to a level with our producing capacity and hold it there—by insurance.

I urge upon all my colleagues the importance of giving careful study to House bill 1649, now in the hands of the Ways and Means Committee. This bill offers the type of national insurance under discussion here and if adopted by the Congress will do more toward removing the fear of after-the-war collapse than any other measure that I know of.

The Veterans' Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, Congress has passed by a unanimous vote the act to provide Federal Government aid for the readjustment in civilian life of returning World War No. 2 veterans. This is a timely and urgent recognition of the Nation's obligation to the more than 11,000,000 young men and women who have responded to their country's call in this hour of its peril. They gave up the comforts of home, the companionship of fathers and mothers, wives and children, kindred and friends, the safety and profits of peacetime pursuits for the hardships and the dangers of warfare. They have been built into a living wall of offense and defense in the protection of their country and for the preservation of civilization. The heads of families have left a vacant chair in the family circle. Boys and girls in their teens and early twenties have left their studies in school for the stern and exacting training of the camp, the dangers of the sea, the hazards of the sky, the shock and roar of battle. On land, on the sea, in the air, on every battle front they have covered themselves with glory. They have written chapters, in their own blood, in the history of American arms that will live forever. Thousands of them have passed on to—

> Fame's eternal camping ground
> Where glory guards, with solemn round,
> The bivouac of the dead.

Other thousands have come back, maimed and crippled for life. Other thousands have returned with shattered nerves. Other thousands have come home only to find the doors of opportunity shut in their faces.

The Representatives in Congress of these boys and girls and their loved ones have not been slow to acknowledge the Nation's debt of gratitude to them. And in this act, popularly known as the G. I. bill, we have put into practical and substantial form our acknowledgment of the people's everlasting determination to put their feet firmly in the pathway of readjustment and rehabilitation.

The American soldier has always been endowed with marvelous powers of recuperation and readjustment. Our soldiers and sailors and marines of every war speedily, on their discharge from the armed service, have melted back into civilian life like the waves subside into the surface of the sea. They have taken front rank in business, in the professions, and in posts of honor and trust in the Government.

We are determined that under this act, which we believe will speedily be signed by the President, the doors of opportunity will swing wide for our returning heroes and heroines.

For those who are in need of it, hospitalization will be afforded. They will be aided by representatives of the veterans' organizations. Their claims for benefits will be carefully, liberally, and sympathetically considered. Those who desire to do so, can complete their education at the Government's expense. Loans to help purchase or construct homes, to buy and equip farms, and to acquire business houses can be obtained up to 50 percent thereof.

Aid in obtaining employment is provided by law. Unemployment benefits are provided. Provisions are made for adequate hospital facilities.

It afforded me great pleasure to support and vote for the enactment of this measure. The Nation that in time of peace or war does not make adequate provision for its defenders is not fit to live and cannot long endure. And the American people are determined to preserve on the home front the liberties that its youth is so nobly fighting to save. We intend to help them to help themselves when they come home. This act, we believe, will accomplish this purpose.

Chicago Lake Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, one of Chicago's greatest claims to fame is her magnificent Outer Drive. Visitors from all over the world have acclaimed the splendid water-front boulevard of the city of Chicago. Now comes a native Chicagoan with a post-war plan to substitute a great lake-front harbor for the great Chicago highway. For 40 years Maj. Henry W. Lee, engineer and publisher of the Calumet Record, an industrial newspaper in Chicago, has advocated use of more of Chicago's lake front for harbor purposes. Editor Lee has recently revived his plan and those engaged in post-war planning are giving more consideration to his program than they have heretofore. For two score years he has never faltered in his advocacy of a lake-front plan, although many of the champions of the city beautiful vigorously oppose such a movement.

As an evidence of the revived interest in the program of Major Lee, the following editorial taken from the Chicago Times is herewith presented:

TRADE—OR BEAUTY?

For 40 years Henry W. Lee, engineer and industrial publisher, has been, like the Biblical prophet, the voice of one crying in the wilderness. Few Chicagoans have heard, and fewer have heeded, his message to the city.

Today, as Chicago and the Nation grapple with plans for post-war reconstruction, Prophet Lee is redoubling his plea to be heard. The Times believes his plan at least makes sense enough to merit serious consideration among the projects to keep Chicago ahead in the post-war era.

So here it is for the consideration of all who are interested in the future of the city. But we warn you, it will seem a little shocking at first if you are one of those who take pride in Chicago's unparalleled Lake front.

LINKING CHICAGO TO THE SEVEN SEAS

Henry Lee proposes that the city recapture the 4 miles of Lake front parkway on the South Side between Grant Park and Thirty-first and convert it into a vast deep-water harbor, at whose piers ships of the seven seas can discharge and take on cargoes in world trade.

Of course, the idea that Chicago might become the terminus of a through-the-Lakes deep-water shipping route depends upon adoption by Congress of the long debated St. Lawrence deep waterway plan.

But even without a deep waterway to the sea Mr. Lee believes a big Lake-front harbor would do great things commercially for Chicago. Lack of such a harbor already has cost Chicago "untold millions in lost Lake commerce, population, and prosperity," he argues. Much of this business has gone to Milwaukee and the rapidly growing ports of northern Indiana—Gary, Buffington, and Indiana Harbor—which were willing to sacrifice scenic beauty for industrial growth.

WE ALMOST HAD A HARBOR IN 1911

Henry Lee doesn't claim to be the daddy of the lake-front-harbor idea.

The plan was recommended by a special board of the United States engineers as early as 1867, and was O. K.'d from time to time during the next 50 years by other United States officials.

The council unanimously adopted the plan in 1911, along with four other harbor proposals, but Mayor Harrison vetoed it "because it would interfere with the Chicago Beautiful plan." Henry Lee was in the thick of the fight to block the South Side lake-front-park project because it spelled the doom of his harbor dreams. He fought a losing battle in the courts; succeeded in blocking it temporarily by an appeal to the Secretary of War—but lost out when Secretary Garrison, who had upheld his objection, resigned and was succeeded by Newton D. Baker.

Baker approved the park plan, but inserted a clause into the agreement providing that the South Park commissioners would release the land upon demand of the city in the event it was needed "for purposes of commerce and navigation."

"And this (says Henry Lee) is our ace in the hole. Whenever the city council wishes to create a lake-front harbor, it is merely necessary to pass an ordinance. The city will then immediately come into possession of 4 miles of lake front with a depth of 900 to 1,300 feet, ideally adapted for harbor purposes in the opinion of every United States engineer stationed in Chicago since 1867. Uncle Sam will build a breakwater a mile from the shore; the factories, terminal facilities, coal, oil, cement, stone, grain, ore, passenger boat or miscellaneous package freight docks will build their own piers and wharves. It will not cost the city one cent."

CALUMET-SAG CANAL IMPROVEMENT DUE

So there is the picture as Prophet Lee sees it. The question is, Do we need expanded harbor facilities badly enough to sacrifice our lake-front park to get them?

At present our harbor facilities are limited to the Calumet River and Lake and the Chicago River. These are essentially shallow water harbors. Congress is expected to approve soon a $30,000,000 program for deepening Calumet Lake and improving the Calumet-Sag Canal link of the waterway to the Gulf of Mexico.

This project, when completed, will greatly improve Chicago's position as a waterway city. But is that enough to meet the city's needs in the post-war world—to keep us in the vanguard of progress? Henry Lee thinks not.

Already we are the world's greatest railroad and trucking center. We are well on the way toward being one of the world's greatest aviation centers. We need, contends Mr. Lee, to become a great navigation center, too.

How about it Chicago? Should we trade our South Side parkway for a bigger slice of the world's trade?

Address by Peter H. Bergson, Head of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHET HOLIFIELD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have before me an address delived by Peter H. Bergson, who heads the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation, at a testimonial dinner tendered to Senator GUY M. GILLETTE and former Representative Will Rogers, Jr. It is directed to free men everywhere and stresses particularly its belief that the present day heirs of the American Revolution will understand, recognize and support them in this mortal struggle for their life and liberation. Mr. Speaker, I believe it proper and fitting that this strong and moving address be printed in the RECORD.

The most dastardly thing about the 2,000,000 Jewish dead of Europe was not so much the fact that they are dead, but the manner of their dying.

This applies both to their German murderers and to the strange silence with which it was received by the United Nations.

We of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation, as servants and representatives of the Hebrew people of Europe, transmitted their cry of agony and protest to the American nation. We shall eternally remember the magnificence of America's answer.

Today, with an indignant and clamoring American public opinion on their behalf; with a special war board created by the President of the United States to save them, the silence has definitely been broken.

This could not have been achieved without the penetrating understanding, the eagerness to be of solace and aid, and the brilliant statesmanship of Senator GUY GILLETTE and Congressman Will Rogers. It was their leadership in our struggle in Washington which has created for my forlorn and hapless people the machinery of action charged by your mighty Nation with the responsibility of doing all possible in a concentrated effort for their salvation.

On behalf of my people, on behalf of our tormented millions in Europe, I wish to thank these courageous and noble American statesmen and their colleagues in the Senate and in the House, and the many other leading Americans of all creeds and national extractions who have heeded our call and joined efforts with the crusading Emergency Committee to Save the Jewish People of Europe. I wish to thank America for its great help and to thank God for America's greatness.

But unfortunately the job is not completed; it is merely begun. We still need your help and need it desperately. The Hebrew people of Europe have still to be saved. We must be saved first of all from the shame and humiliation into which we have been driven. Our dead must no longer be considered merely as useless victims of Nazi bestiality. They must be considered as honored casualties of the United Nations' common onslaught for freedom.

We must not distinguish the Hebrew people of Europe merely as 4,000,000 human beings marked for slaughter by the barbarous Nazis. We must distinguish and recognize them as a positive entity; as a fellow partner in the world struggle for decent humanity.

There are several United Nations whose total population is but a fraction of the number of casualties which the Hebrew people of Europe has suffered in this war—yet they are honorable and equal partners. We are miserable and pitiful victims.

The Hebrew people of Europe today appeal to America for dignity and honor. It requests to be recognized as an ally. Our soldiers have fought and killed Germans and died in some of the epic battles of this war. The 38-day battle of the Warsaw ghetto ranks with Dunkerque, Stalingrad, and Tarawa, and this is not my appraisal but that of an editorial in the New York Times. The ghetto of Bialystok was another heroic battlefront. There were many other battles. Some of Europe's bitterest, most indomitable fighters today are Hebrew guerrilla bands, daily harrassing German battle lines and communications. Should they not be recognized merely because they are outnumbered by the Nazis a thousand to one? And then there are the fighting Hebrews of Palestine—30,000 of them fought and died in Greece, in Egypt, in Libya, in Tunisia, in Abyssinia, and are today fighting with your gallant heroic Fifth Army in Italy.

You are all aware of the gruesomeness of the disaster that has befallen our people. You also know that it has not come suddenly out of a clear sky, but that it culminates long decades of persecution and pogroms; yet nothing really complete and drastic has been suggested as a remedy. All the Jews the world over had, to counteract Germany's savage might, was confusion and wishful thinking. If I may on this somewhat festive occasion utter bitter words of criticism, let me say that it was the Jews that have clung to the status quo, and let me say further that it was the so-called leaders who have lulled us from disaster to disaster by silver-tongued oratory about the unity of the Jewish people and who kept pointing out to us that we survived all tyrannies before. Let me say quite frankly that I condemn these easy-going preaching leaders; I condemn them for they were never there. They preached status quo not from the ruins of Warsaw but from the safety and happiness of New York or Philadelphia or Cleveland. Yes, there has always been a Jewish people and there always will be one, but this is an abstract spiritual term which will never revive the millions of our dead nor save those remaining. The ease with which these American Jews, who because of wealth, position or fame occupy positions of leadership in American-Jewish communal life, are permitting themselves from the comfort and luxury of this blessed land to be the spokesmen of and to set the pace for the rescue and way of life of people with whom in reality their life has nothing in common is beyond my comprehension. I certainly do not even begin to doubt their sincerity and integrity. And I of course agree with them that spiritually and academically we are all Jews. But practically, all of these American Jews of fame and position, and all of you here, my friends, are members of a great, mighty, and free nation, the United States of America, while the Jews of Warsaw, as I myself, are members of another nation. For the Jewish people of Europe and Palestine have been molded into one entity and are in fact one nation—the Hebrew Nation. It is because this nation was not formally established and recognized that the disaster which has befallen the Hebrew Nation has been so vast, and the way for remedy blocked.

We should not let inertia and confusion stand in the way. Let it be stated clearly that the Hebrew people of Europe and Palestine mean precisely that. It does not mean Englishmen who practice the Jewish religion and it most certainly does not mean the millions of Americans here, commonly referred to as Jews, who are actually Americans of Hebrew descent and of the Jewish religion. They do not belong to the Hebrew nation any more than President Roosevelt belongs to the Dutch nation or Mr. Willkie belongs to the German nation. They are Americans first, last, and always. Their ancestors, way back 2,000 years ago, were Hebrews.

Justice Frankfurter is not a Hebrew. He is an American of Hebrew descent, practicing the Jewish religion, exactly as Justice Murphy is an American of Irish descent, practicing the Catholic religion.

This might be an abstract and academic problem as far as Justice Frankfurter and the other millions of Americans of Hebrew descent are concerned. To the Hebrew nation in Europe this is a problem of the gravest urgency and reality, for today without recognition as a nation we have no representative to speak for us. Having no national institutions we cannot get representation on international conferences or commissions. Thus the one flag and one voice conspicuously and tragically missing amongst the 42 United Nations' banners is the Hebrew banner. Thus our flag does not wave over the Palestine regiment when it marches into battle, and the graves of Hebrew heroes who died fighting Nazis are not marked with the insignia for which they lived and died but are marked with the insignia of a foreign nation—the Union Jack. Furthermore, thousands upon thousands of Hebrews now referred to as stateless Jews are still forced to sit idly by and have no opportunity at all to fight our Nazi enemy.

It is because the Hebrew nation is not recognized that its representatives were missing from the 42 nations that gathered in Atlantic City to map plans for United Nations relief and rehabilitation. It is this lack of recognition which is responsible for the paradoxical situation of our not being represented on the United Nations Commission in London, which is investigating and mapping plans for the punishment of those guilty of war atrocities, although it was against us that 80 percent of these atrocities have been committed.

It is because of this that our problem has never received any international consideration which was in any way commensurate with the magnitude of the problem.

The Hebrew nation has had 3,000,000 casualties. This is 35 percent of its entire potential population. To the British this would mean 20,000,000, to America this would mean 45,000,000. In the face of such a disaster we have no right to be timid and frightened to face new realties and formulae. If 3,000,000 casualties out of 8,000,000 are not enough to mold the surviving 5,000,000 into a nation, then there are no nations in the world.

It is for these reasons that the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation launches a new appeal to your mighty and generous Nation: Understand us. Help us. Help us regain our dignity and honor. Help us avenge our dead. And, above all, and first of all, help us prevent the steady and frightful additions to our casualty lists. This is the first problem of the Hebrew nation. This is our first task as their spokesmen—preservation and survival.

The Nazis are shaky in the knowledge that they are losing the war. Their satellites are still shakier. Let all the United Nations and the neutrals, on whose territories live 1,700,000,000 human beings, proclaim that they shall give shelter and harbor to every and all of the Hebrews who can be evacuated from the hell of Hitler's Europe.

America has already assumed historical leadership in this battle against massacre and for salvation, by the setting up of the War Refugee Board. In doing so your great President has stated that he "expects to obtain the cooperation of all members of the United Nations and other foreign governments in carrying out this difficult but important task."

We know that Soviet Russia has managed, amidst a bloody war for her own survival, to organize the saving and harboring on its territories of close to a million of my people from Rumania, Poland, and the Balkan states.

We can therefore feel confident of her future help, but we are still waiting to hear of the cooperation of the other nations, particularly those near to Europe or bordering on it.

We propose that Turkey proclaim that its borders are wide open to all Hebrews fleeing German death and that Great Britain join the United States in guaranteeing to Turkey the immediate and steady evacuation of these people into other close neighboring territories such as Cyprus, north Africa, and particularly Palestine. And to this neither we nor anybody else should dare attach conditions. If there are difficulties to solve the political problem of Palestine during this war, let it wait until after the war.

But let us not permit these political difficulties to stand in the way of the saving of countless of thousands of human lives. Though we appreciate the differences in the motives, we must condemn the advancement of political arguments on the road of rescue whether it comes from the British Colonial Office, from Arab politicians, or from misguided Zionists.

Let the doors which have for years now been steadily slammed into the faces of death-fleeing people be made wide open. This is not a political demand. To keep them shut is politics, and vicious politics at that. To permit the sturdy Hebrews of Palestine to give food and shelter to their escaped European brethren is not politics but an elementary dictate of humanity and justice.

It is because the Hebrew people in Palestine have been forced to be passive onlookers to the daily crucifixion of their brethren that their repeated and ignored protests are now assuming serious proportions in Palestine.

Rising to speak in the House of Commons on this problem several years ago, Winston Churchill began by saying, "Mr. Speaker, this is a melancholy occasion." It is today, ladies and gentlemen, much more than a melancholy occasion. It is the greatest disaster that has befallen any people, even amidst this frightful and bloody war. It cannot possibly be tackled by the slow and dreary status quo formulas. We, the Hebrew Nation, refuse to continue as the guinea pigs at whose expense daydreamers, wishful thinkers, and silver-tongued rabbis preach the unity of the Jewish people and the arrival of better days where, in a democratic and free Poland and Rumania, we shall be restored to life and liberty. The desperate, melancholy Hebrew Nation needs help and solace today. It needs recognition. It needs dignity. Without these it loses a chance for life and survival.

If the Americans of Hebrew descent in this country will give this problem bold, courageous consideration, if they give us as spokesmen for the Hebrew Nation their help, if they at least cease to put obstacles in our road, I feel fully confident that the day is very near where the Hebrew banner will proudly wave over the headquarters of our national representatives in Washington and over the columns of the Hebrew fighters who will participate in the forthcoming march to Berlin. Thus, and only thus, can the Hebrew people of Europe be restored to full and dignified human existence.

National Old-Age Pensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following brief by William H. McMasters:

The question of an adequate national pension to be awarded to all American citizens has been before the public, the Congress, and the legislatures of all the States for many years. It is still unsettled. It is still being discussed. This brief is written to set out, once more, my own views on this question. These views have not changed during the years. Rather, they have been strengthened and confirmed, as I have come into contact with many public officials who are afraid to say openly that they are opposed to the idea of a national pension, but who have covertly attacked and delayed its adoption. They have done this by introducing objections to minor points and by questioning the advisability of some small feature or other. This underhanded conduct savors of hypocrisy, but it has been most effectual. These saboteurs of a national pension in any form may have fooled the general public, but they have never fooled me or many others who are familiar with this brand of political trickery.

Either a national pension is right in principle or it is wrong. If it is right we ought not to waste time in discussing whether or not the age should be 60 years for pensioners. We ought not to be talking for years at a time over the amount to be allotted to each pensioner as though the monthly amount had something to do with the pension principle itself. We could well forget the question of the tax method that would finance the pension proposition. This question of taxation is one that always brings on acrimonious debate. If our Government cannot handle its own tax problems today, without endless debate, when the fate of the Republic is at stake in the present war, surely there is nobody who could satisfy all the Members of the Congress as to a method of taxation that will finance a matter which many of the Members are secretly opposed to. Opponents to any legislative proposal dearly love to see tax ideas introduced for the very practical reason that tax ideas are always debatable. The opponents look very seriously down their noses as though mentally troubled over the said fate of the old folks of the Nation and then they shake their heads and say to one of their colleagues: "Too bad that the pension advocates cannot get together on a sound and workable-tax plan to handle this worthy pension cause in which all of us are so deeply interested. It grieves me. I'm fearfully disturbed over it. I would gladly vote for a suitable pension for our aged citizens if we could only devise some tax plan that wouldn't cost anybody anything. Too bad. Too bad."

My idea of a national pension is this. It should come each month, directly from the United States Treasury. The present old age assistance laws should be repealed when the new pension becomes effective. These laws are doing more harm to the morale of the American people than any other influence that I know. The pension should become available to every American citizen, on application, at the age of 60 years. It should be enough on which to live, even if the applicant has no other means of support. There should be no investigation of any kind into the financial circumstances of those who apply for this pension. The only restriction I suggest is that the recipient should not receive any other public pension or be a public employee of any kind. As to other kinds of employment, I have never believed that a pensioner should be compelled to retire from active work in order to receive his or her pension. Any provision of that nature is sure to involve trouble. The average man or woman at 60 who feels like doing productive work in the community ought not to be discouraged from working. The prevailing idea of employment is just one of the many strange fallacies that have grown up during recent years. In my opinion, we can never have too many persons employed. But we can have too many folks idle. Workers produce wealth. The more workers, the more wealth. We surely need more wealth in the country. The more wealth that we produce, the more there will be for all.

While that covers the problems so far as I am concerned, there is still the tax question. As to the best method, I feel that our entire tax system is bad in principle. It is accepted only because there has been no better method tried out. After faithfully working for years for the passage of various Townsend bills, I wrote a simplified bill which is now before the Congress. It carries number H. R. 1281, and is titled "National Pension Act." In this bill, I advocate the use of a transaction tax as a proper method to raise funds to carry out the provisions of the act.

My idea of a transaction tax is that it will be assessed equally against every transaction, big or little, that goes to make up the vast economy of the Nation. Every business or professional or salaried transaction, will have just so much deducted in taxes, at the end of each month. This money will be collected by the internal revenue collector. At the present enormous rate of business transactions in the country, the levy of 2 percent would produce about $2,500,000,000 per month. As every tranaction will be assessed the same amount, there will be no actual changes in the relative values involved. The retail business will not suffer at the expense of the wholesaler; the big man will not be asked to pay more or less than the small man. So far as the economy of the entire Nation might be altered, it would not be changed any more than though the whole business were to lose exactly 2 percent in volume in every part of it. Nobody would know the difference. Any economist who says this system of taxation would be a drain on the economy of the country is merely talking to hear himself talk.

Thirty billions of dollars per year can thus be taken out of the turn-over of our national business today and used to finance our national requirements. If pensioners get a part of it, then it will be serving a most desirable end. Whether pensioners get so much as $1 of it the principle of a transaction tax is fundamentally sound because it neither favors nor works against any type of business or person, corporation or industry. Every tax system ever designed, up to the present moment, has been faulty in one respect. It took revenue from certain sources but failed to take revenue from all available sources. Thus the economic values were changed by the tax system. Relative values were not maintained. A universal transaction tax does not produce this unbalanced result.

Copies of H. R. 1281, National Pension Act, may be had by writing to any Congressman whose name is familiar to you. Any United States Senator will be glad to send you a copy on request. It attracts attention to a bill when Congressmen receive requests for copies of it.

This bill asks for not less than $60 per month for every American citizen on reaching the age of 60 years. There is nothing in the bill about retiring from employment, nothing about the financial status of those who ask for the pension, nothing is said as to whether they have relatives who can support them. There is nothing in the bill about spending the pension during the following month or putting it into the saving bank. If anybody over 60 years of age wishes to live on less than $60 per month, he is not much of a charge on his community, so why worry over him? We have far too many regulations of the habits, lives and even the thoughts of our American citizens, today. I am suggesting that we stop all this regulating and let the men and women who have helped to bring America up to its present state, be allowed to conduct their own lives in their own way. These intelligent, elderly people do not need any regulations. All they need is what everybody else seems to need, enough money to take care of their wants, without privation and stinting.

I could write an entire book on this subject but it would not make by position any clearer. I suggest, once more, that you write to your United States Senator or Congressman and ask to have a few copies of H. R. 1281 mailed to you. There is no charge for these copies and you can send your request on a postal card, if you feel like it. This is your country my friends; the men in the Congress are your servants; you pay their salaries, and the pension bill that I filed is your bill. It's about time to have it enacted into law. Thanks for reading this brief. If you care to write me, my address is:

California Legislature Protests Proposed Mexican Water Treaty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL HINSHAW
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the Governor of California, transmitting a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California protesting the proposed treaty between the United States and the Republic of Mexico disposing of waters of the Colorado River:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
GOVERNOR'S OFFICE,
SACRAMENTO, June 16, 1944.

Hon. CARL HINSHAW,
Member of the House of Representatives,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The California Legislature at its special session which adjourned Tuesday, June 13, 1944, adopted Senate Joint Resolution No. 4 urging that the Colorado River Treaty be not ratified by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

Pursuant to this resolution I am enclosing a copy for your attention and request that this matter be given your most careful consideration.

With best wishes and kindest regards, I am
Sincerely,

EARL WARREN,
Governor.

Senate Joint Resolution 4

Resolution relating to the statutory compact between the United States and the State of California, evidenced by the Boulder Canyon Project Act and the California Water Limitation Act, and opposing ratification of the treaty between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, signed at Washington, D. C., February 3, 1944, and pending before the Senate of the United States, on the ground that such treaty would constitute a breach of the said compact

Whereas the United States of America and the State of California heretofore entered into a certain statutory compact, which compact was made in the manner following:

The Boulder Canyon Project Act (45 Stat. 1057) provided that if, in consideration of the passage of said act, California should within 6 months adopt an act limiting her use of Colorado River water to certain quantities, and of California and certain other States should ratify the Colorado River Compact, then said Project Act and all the provisions thereof should become effective, but otherwise should not become effective.

California did, within said time, expressly in consideration of the passage of said Project Act, adopt such a limitation act (Cal. Stats. 1929, 38), and did ratify the interstate compact, known as the Colorado River Compact (Cal. Stats. 1929, 37), all in precise conformity to the requirements of the Project Act. The President thereupon proclaimed the Project Act effective; and

Whereas California by the adoption of said limitation act did subject herself, her lands and people to a drastic reduction of the amounts of water of the Colorado River otherwise available for use in California; and did by the adoption of said Ratifying Act subject herself, her lands and people, to the burdens imposed by the Colorado River Compact; and

Whereas said Boulder Canyon Project Act contains the following provisions, a part of said statutory compact, which were intended to protect and safeguard the availability to California of the quantity of water to which California limited herself, to wit, provisions: (1) That the water of the Colorado River to be conserved by Boulder Dam should be used "exclusively within the United States"; (2) that no person should have the use of the water conserved by Boulder Dam, except by contract made by the Secretary of the Interior on behalf of the United States; and (3) that such contracts should be for permanent service; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior, on behalf of the United States, has entered into contracts authorized by said project act with public agencies of the State of California for the delivery to them, for domestic and irrigation uses, of large quantities of water of the Colorado River conserved by Boulder Dam and for other rights and benefits authorized by the project act; and

Whereas said limitation act and said ratifying act were adopted by California and said contracts were entered into by California's public agencies in absolute reliance upon the full performance and observance by the United States of the above-mentioned protective provisions of the project act and this legislature declares that it would not have adopted said limitation act nor said ratifying act, nor would said contracts have been executed by said public agencies, had not said project act contained said protective provisions; and

Whereas there is pending before the Senate of the United States a treaty, signed February 3, 1944, between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, whereby the United States would guarantee to Mexico delivery annually and in a certain prescribed manner of a quantity of the water of the Colorado River, which quantity cannot be delivered to Mexico in such manner without delivering to her water conserved by Boulder Dam; and

Whereas said treaty, if ratified, would impair the ability of the United States to render permanent service of water under said California contracts and otherwise perform said contracts; and

Whereas said treaty, if ratified, would create a right in water conserved by Boulder Dam, by means other than by contract with the Secretary of the Interior; and

Whereas said treaty, if ratified, would make it impossible for the Secretary of the Interior to fulfill the contracts which he has executed on behalf of the United States under the authority of the Project Act and would make it impossible for the United States to observe and perform its obligations under said statutory compact, to wit, the above-mentioned protective provisions of said Project Act; and

Whereas said treaty, if ratified, would cause the consideration for the adoption by California of said statutory compact to fail and said statutory compact would be thereby breached by the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California (jointly), That the Legislature of the State of California urgently represents to the President and the Senate of the United States that the ratification of the pending treaty would constitute a breach of the solemn statutory compact entered into between the United States of America and the State of California and evidenced by the above-mentioned statutes, to the great and irreparable damage of California; and be it further

Resolved, That said Legislature urges that the pending treaty be not ratified; and further urges that in any treaty that may be entered into between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, the rights of the State of California under said statutory compact and the contractual rights of her public agencies be fully protected; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor is hereby requested to transmit certified copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Interior, the Vice President of the United States as President of the Senate, the Chairman and each member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, also to each of the Senators and Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States.

Price Balance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, I include the following editorial which appeared in this morning's Washington Post on the O. P. A. bill now in conference:

PRICE BALANCE

The tumult and shouting over the price-control extension bills have died down momentarily, but the fate of O. P. A. still hangs in the balance. For both House and Senate have sent to conference bills studded with amendments of a potentially destructive character. Contrary to expectation, the controversy over subsidies has not been a delaying factor, either in floor debates or in conference. Indeed, House and Senate conferees speedily reached an agreement that will permit continuation of the present food consumer subsidy program for a year. Thereafter subsidies will not be paid except out of money appropriated by Congress. This compromise will enable Congress, albeit belatedly, to reassert its right of control over expenditures of this kind. At the same time it avoids the unpleasant political and economic consequences entailed by suddenly upsetting the existing subsidy program.

No decisions have yet been reached on the two proposals that have deservedly attracted the lion's share of adverse criticism. They are the Bankhead amendment to the Senate bill, tying textile prices to parity prices for raw cotton, and the Dirksen amendment to the House bill permitting Federal District Courts and Circuit Courts of Appeals to rule on the validity of O. P. A. regulations.

As previously stated in these columns, acceptance of the Bankhead amendment would threaten the whole system of price control, since it would signify willingness on the part of Congress to yield to demands of special groups. The Dirksen amendment is even more dangerous, because it would have a paralyzing effect upon the enforcement machinery of O. P. A. For example, Representative VOORHIS has pointed out that by throwing open the District Courts to review of O. P. A. regulations, conflicting decisions as to validity might result in one set of standards and regulations prevailing in Chicago, and an entirely different set in Milwaukee. Obviously such conflicts would spell utter confusion and collapse of orderly price control. Various other changes in procedural methods incorporated in the House bill have also come in for severe criticism as imposing obstacles to prompt and effective enforcement of price regulations. In respect to procedural changes, the Senate bill is much more conservative and appears to be acceptable—although with some reservations—to O. P. A. officials.

A host of other highly mischievous provisions ought to be eliminated before the O. P. A. extension bill goes to the President. Prominent among them is a provision of the House bill that would compel processors of agricultural commodities to pay parity prices for their raw materials or else reduce their selling prices at least 10 percent below O. P. A. maximum ceiling prices. This amendment would create serious administrative problems for O. P. A., apart from the fact that its probable effect would be an increase in food and clothing prices. The Senate bill, on the other hand, contains a provision that would weaken the wage stabilization program by exempting wage increases up to $37.50 per week from W. L. B. control, provided employers and employees agree on the increase.

Fortunately the chances seem better than even that the conference members will be able to eliminate the most objectionable features of the House and Senate bills by mutual concessions. The Senate Bankhead amendment might, for example, be omitted in return for a House agreement to drop the Dirksen amendment. Such a compromise should be facilitated by the knowledge that inclusion of either amendment in the bill finally passed by Congress might result in a Presidential veto. Most of the other damaging amendments to existing price-control legislation are to be found in the House bill. But the Senate, as indicated, has also made mistakes that it might be willing to rectify in exchange for House concessions. In short, the conferees are in a good position to effect compromises that would enable the O. P. A. to carry on its work without being hampered by changes in legislative instructions and prohibitions that would add to enforcement difficulties and gravely weaken existing controls.

Why Roosevelt Can Be Defeated

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, it is now generally assumed by voters of both major political parties that President Roosevelt is today an active, albeit anxious candidate for a fourth term. Many in both parties even accept as significant the abortive statement of National Democratic Chairman Hannegan that there is a strong probability that the President will seek a fifth term in 1948 should he be reelected in 1944.

Consequently many citizens are wondering, "Can Roosevelt be defeated?" and others are wondering, "Can Roosevelt be elected?" These are natural questions to apply to any Presidential candidate and the following editorial is therefore interesting since it emphasizes points which many political analysts and prognosticators have failed to examine carefully as they confront the coming Presidential campaign.

For example, Mr. Speaker, few citizens realize that on the basis of the vote for Members of the House of Representatives in the last election—held while war was raging—it should be remembered President Roosevelt would have been defeated by a vote of 176 in the electoral college to 355 votes for his Republican opponent had he been a candidate 2 years ago. It is also true that if the States now having Republican Governors vote for the Republican candidate for President, as seems probable, Franklin Roosevelt will go down in history as a man finishing his career in public office with an emphatic and humiliating defeat. These are hard facts taken from the book of records and are consequently much more significant than political polls or prophetic predictions.

Fred C. Christopherson of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., editor of the Daily Argus-Leader of that city, has made an interesting analysis of past records and present conditions in the following editorial entitled "Why Roosevelt Can Be Defeated." Believing that both the Congress and the country will be interested in reading this analysis I am inserting it in the RECORD at this point as a part of these remarks:

[From Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Daily Argus-Leader]

WHY ROOSEVELT CAN BE DEFEATED

Whether President Roosevelt will be reelected in November or not is something for the future to reveal.

But any assumption now that his position is so impregnable that the Republican cause is hopeless is ridiculous.

To appreciate this, one need only study the figures of 1940—the most recent Presidential election. Roosevelt got 27,000,000 votes in that year and Wendell Willkie, his Republican opponent, 22,000,000. That seems to be a broad spread, but, in considering the 1944 possibilities, the study should be restricted to States that can be regarded as Republican prospects.

Let us consider then the 38 Northern States which represent a majority of 150 in the electoral college. In these States, Willkie lost by 2.7 percent of the vote. Therefore, a change in the political thinking of 3 voters out of each hundred would be sufficient to swing the electoral majority away from Roosevelt.

Has there been such a change? The only record available is that of the elections of Senators, Representatives, and Governors. But this is an important indication.

The State-wide returns on the election of Representatives in Congress in 1942 showed a strong Republican trend. Republicans were dominant in States having a total electoral vote of 355. As the total electoral vote of all the States is 531, this figure represents a substantial majority.

Now to consider the picture as a whole in the 38 Northern States that command considerable more than a majority of the electoral vote. These States today have in the House of Representatives 208 Republicans and 123 Democrats. They have 37 Republicans, 38 Democrats, and 1 Progressive in the United States Senate. Of these States, 26 have Republican Governors and 12 have Democratic Governors. The State legislatures in 27 of them are controlled by Republicans with 9 dominated by the Democrats and 2 with a divided control.

This represents a sharp swing away from the Democratic banner since 1940. It also means that the dominant political organizations in many of these States are Republican.

Obviously there is little reason to assume now that the Republicans are doomed to defeat in the national election. In fact, the statistics provide ample reason for concluding that they have something better than a fighting chance to defeat Roosevelt in November.

IS DIXIE HOPELESSLY TRAPPED BY ONE-PARTYISM?

Mr. Speaker, the foregoing editorial, with its statistical analysis, is based on the supposition that the "solid South" will continue to conform to tradition and vote the party line, regardless of who are the Democratic—that is, New Deal—candidates for President and Vice President. In a belated effort to regain some of their lost control over the old-time Democratic Party some of the Southern States, such as South Carolina, Louisiana, Texas, and Mississippi, are threatening to select Presidential electors who will vote their convictions rather than their compulsions. What will come of these threats remains to be seen, but on the basis of past records it seems doubtful whether the States of the so-called solid South will recapture their old-time independent spirit in time for them to have much effect upon the November elections.

One-partyism has pretty well trapped the Southern States in its vitiating coils. Many able Members of the House and Senate from the States of the old South have come to realize that by permitting ancient prejudices and traditions to influence voting to the point that practical New Deal political operators have come to consider the votes of these States as permanently and indisputably "in the bag," the good people of Dixie have lost their influence upon the destiny of the Democratic Party, but the tremendous population of New Deal appointees in these States will doubtlessly continue to dominate the political thinking of the South until a change of administration deprives them of their profitable and patent political positions.

A NEW INVASION OF "CARPETBAGGERS" HAS OVERRUN THE SOUTH

The hundreds of thousands of political appointees, owing their jobs and maintaining their allegiance to the New Deal, who now travel the streets and highways of the South as political missionaries for the Roosevelt-Wallace partnership have captured the political decisions of Dixie as firmly as did the carpetbag politicians of long ago. In both instances, politicians from the North, in violation of the interests and ideals of the South, moved into positions of influence and manipulated the outcome of elections to suit their own fancy and inflate their own profits. The obvious remedy of developing a "party of opposition" in the South will some day apply an American remedy to an un-American situation, but the New Deal political bigwigs are openly boasting—and probably with accuracy—that such a reform cannot come in time to deprive them of the "money in the bank" votes which they always consider "in the bag" long before election in tabulating probable election returns.

WHY WOO WHAT IS ALREADY WON?

The old notion that "Dixie will go Democratic regardless—why grant it any concessions?" still prevails in New Deal circles and the technique of using surefire southern votes to help elect candidates and adopt policies which work to the ultimate disadvantage of the South will probably succeed in the next election. The South is growing rebellious in spots, but it would appear that the combination of patronage, pap, and purging will hold it in line again.

MARSHALL FIELD, OF PM, MAY BE A SUCCESSOR TO JEFFERSON AND FARLEY

A recent editorial in the Chicago Sun indicates that perhaps Marshall Field, of Chicago, of PM, and of the Chicago Sun, may be the successor to Jefferson and Farley as the patron saint of the Democratic Party as it is today being manipulated by the city bosses and professional New Deal politicians of the North. Certainly the State's rights doctrines of Thomas Jefferson have been too completely scuttled by the New Dealers to find any practical place in the program of New Dealism. It may be given a plank in the platform, but it would be a gullible voter, indeed, who could vote for the fourth term on the basis that in so doing he was helping to restore States' rights.

A recent editorial in the Chicago Sun, which is increasingly assuming its place as the spokesman for the New Deal version of what was once the Democratic Party, provides a harbinger of what is to come. The editorial is directed against what it called the reactionary Democratic politicians of the South and it points out that an effort may be made at the Democratic National Convention to restore the two-thirds rule in Democratic conventions, to write into the Democratic platform provisions against repeal of the poll tax and in favor of the elimination of the Fair Employment Practice Committee, which latter is a Roosevelt brain child of the first order. The editorial discusses other measures in which the South is interested and then calls upon the New Deal politicians who today control the Democratic Party to hold the line against southern reactionaries and to beat down at the national convention every effort to permit control of the destiny of the party to return to the South.

Undoubtedly the city machine politicians who hold key New Deal positions in the party will succeed in defeating the move to restore the two-thirds rule. They will also succeed in defeating southern efforts to curtail or stop the moves of Mr. and Mrs. Roosevelt with regard to the repeal of poll-tax legislation and in favor of the expansion of the activities and authorities of the Fair Employment Practice Committee. Where will this leave the South? It will leave it just where, about where, the New Deal manipulators have left Jim Farley, Woodrow Wilson, and Thomas Jefferson. It will leave them holding an empty sack decorated with the label of the Democratic Party but dedicated to the policies of New Dealism, which are more foreign by far to traditional democracy than they are to Republicanism.

Jim Farley may respond to patriotic impulse, put principle above party, and refuse to support the fourth-term blitzkrieg, but whether he does or not, the hopes of defeating this administration must be based upon such statistics as revealed in the foregoing editorial and not upon the ability and determination of the right-thinking folks in the South to shake off the shackles of one partyism in time to redeem the Republic next November. Once more the voters of the North will have to try to save the South from itself.

REFORM COMES SLOWLY IN THE SOUTH

Every encouragement should be given the brave and independent citizens of Dixie who are now exploring every possibility of saving the South from the bitter consequences of too long playing the part of tail to the dog that bites them, but too much cannot be expected in the nature of reform too soon.

It is possible, of course, that the South in 1944 will do as it did in 1928, and refuse to permit Northern "carpetbag democrats" to dominate their destiny. It may vote Republican. It is also possible an independent "Dixie party" might be formed down South to nominate its own candidate for President and thereby give the South a balance of power in national elections by which it could successfully insist on a recognition of its principles and ideals. Other possibilities exist for a citizenry once aroused sufficiently and able to develop the leadership to protect itself and its own interests.

It is inconceivable that Americans of the high type and great ability of those so prevalent in the Old South should surrender supinely to the type of economic suicide and political disaster which faces them if they continue to support, blindly, parties and personalities who use their influence to foist excesses upon a section of the country whose only sin is with docility to deliver its vote each 4 years to a label on a party rather than to a set of political principles.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a broadcast over WAPI on March 18, 1944, concerning a colorful figure in the early history of Birmingham, Ala., Col. Henry Fairchild DeBardeleben:

We are so accustomed today to the blatant whistles—the belching stacks and humming wheels of industry—that it is almost impossible to picture Birmingham without this teeming enterprise. Yet had it not been for the vision and ingenuity of our pioneers—coal and iron might not be the lifeblood of the magic city. Sometime ago I promised to tell you about a colorful figure in the life of Birmingham—one who was closely identified with the discovery and development of our mineral deposits. I am speaking of Col. Henry Fairchild DeBardeleben. Tonight let us turn back the pages of history to the early beginnings of the coal and iron industry—and then see the vital and dramatic part Colonel DeBardeleben played in making Birmingham what it is today.

Strange to relate—the first settlers in Jones Valley did not care anything about the coal they found here—they had such plentiful supplies of wood—why should they go digging about the hills for what they called "black rocks"?

The first blacksmith shops even burned wood until it became charcoal—and used it instead of coal. These blacksmith shops formed the cradle of the early iron industry in Alabama. There is an old tradition that the first Alabama iron was used for shoeing Gen. Andrew Jackson's horses when he and his soldiers came down from Tennessee to drive out the Indians.

Some will recall that symbolically the first building in B'ham was a blacksmith's shop. It was located on First Avenue and Twenty-first Street, on the lot now occupied by the Steiner Bros. banking house. But this blacksmith shop was not built until 1871. Long before Birmingham was born many men—some of whose names are now forgotten—had dreams and plans about the rocks that lay asleep in our rich earth.

Two of these were the Mahan brothers—who came into our State with General Jackson's soldiers. They thought enough of the coal they found here to load it on flat boats and drift with it down the rivers to Mobile. Once there, they were not able to find a purchaser for their coal—no one wanted it. Finally, the blacksmiths began to use the coal for their fires. Mr. John Hanby was one of them, and he decided to try his hand at interesting the people of Mobile in the coal he found so useful. Mr. J. A. Mudd and Mr. J. H. Hewitt assisted him in preparing two flatboats on which to load the coal—and long poles to be used in guiding the boats on their long, perilous journey to Mobile.

When he finally arrived in Mobile, Mr. Hanby proudly displayed his coal—but no one wanted to buy it. So Mr. Hanby took buckets of coal from house to house and showed the mistresses of the lovely homes in Mobile what wonderful fires the coal would make. The ladies were so pleased they bought every lump of coal and asked for more. Then the terrible War between the States broke out—and everyone forget about Mr. Hanby and his coal. Since iron was badly needed by the Confederacy for the implements of war, two furnaces were started in Jefferson County for this purpose: Ironton, now called Oxmoor, and the Cahaba Iron Works at Irondale. These were very small, crude furnaces built of stone—but they were the rudimentary beginnings of our modern type. The Irondale furnace was abandoned in the seventies—and is now a picturesque ruin on the farm owned by the late George Gordon Crawford. An arsenal was erected at Selma, and iron was carried from the two Jefferson County furnaces to be converted into cannon there.

The Oxmoor furnace was soon discovered by the Northern soldiers—who tried to destroy it. After the war—and the Southern soldiers came back to their homes—they tried to make iron there again.

It was at this time, about 1872, that there appeared upon the industrial scene two men who did much to promote the iron industry in Alabama. The elder of the men was Mr. Daniel Pratt, Alabama's first great captain of industry. He had already distinguished himself by building the largest cotton-gin plant in the South, at Prattville, the city he founded. With him was his young superintendent—a striking figure—who is the hero of our story tonight—Henry Fairchild DeBardeleben. Up to this time little was known of our young man except that he had helped run Mr. Pratt's gin factory—and had married his only child, Ellen Pratt. As a matter of fact, his own father, having died when he was 10 years old, Mr. Pratt had become his guardian, had brought him to Prattville when he was 16 years of age and had sent him to school.

On account of the young people listening in—I should probably not tell you that young DeBardeleben had a great dislike for discipline and the four walls of the schoolroom—and that he led his elderly guardian a merry chase. Mr. Pratt determined to make a man of the ward he loved as a son by imposing early responsibilities upon him. He made him the boss of his teamsters and lumber yard, and Henry developed an understanding of, and command over, his fellowman at an early age. As long as he lived he never lost his love of the woods and a free way of life. At one time he said, "I had rather be out in the woods on the back of a fox-trotting mule—with a good seam of coal under my feet—than to be President of the United States. I never get lonely in the woods—for I picture as I go along—and the rocks and the forests are the only books I read."

Mr. Pratt and Henry DeBardeleben had already become interested in the mineral resources of our State when they entered the Birmingham scene in 1872. From that time on the real history of the greatness of this section began. For 38 years thereafter—until his death in 1910—Colonel DeBardeleben lent all his boundless energy and rare genius to developing the Birmingham district on a tremendous scale. He never lost faith, and was never discouraged. Though he had many obstacles to overcome—they but inspired him to geater effort.

They say he was dashingly good-looking, 6 feet tall, well proportioned, athletic, with a ruddy complexion, black hair and mustache, and black eyes, as quick and as keen as a bird's. They tell that he had the appearance of always having one foot in the stirrup, ready to ride. He could leap his horse, or favorite mule, Ready, clear from the ground. But I am getting so charmed with the picture of Henry F. DeBardeleben, I'm ahead of my story.

We are still back in 1872—and just taking over the old Oxmoor furnaces—with Mr.

DeBardeleben as general manager. In fact, our two trail blazers acquired controlling interest in the Red Mountain Iron & Coal Co., changed the name to the Eureka Mining Co., and began reconstructing and rejuvenating the Oxmoor furnaces. Here in 1876 with Milton H. Smith and Colonel Sloss as onlookers, Henry DeBardeleben made the first coke-iron in Alabama. The converting of coal into coke, and the making of the first iron with coke gave great impetus to the iron industry in our State. People had found the three necessary constituents for iron and steel—coal, lime-rock, and iron ore—lying side by side in our mountains. Now that it had been proved by our young genius at the Oxmoor fournaces that iron could be made of B'ham ores, it seemed that almost everyone began buying and selling pig-iron. The period between 1880 and 1890 is known as the golden age in furnace building. Numerous companies were organized, the Alice Furnace Co., the Woodward Co., the Sloss Co., the Tennessee Co., and others. The Alice furnace—jointly owned by Mr. Hillman, for whom the Hillman Hospital is named, and Colonel DeBardeleben—was the first merchant pig-iron furnace in the vicinity of the city. To Henry Debardeleben also belongs the distinction of mining the first coal in the district, for he opened the Pratt coal vein at Pratt City. He literally had his finger in every coal and iron pie in this section, and was always the first to taste it.

In 1887 Colonel DeBardeleben organized the Bessemer Land & Improvement Co. and founded the town of Bessemer. The DeBardeleben Coal & Coke Co. and the DeBardeleben Coal & Iron Co. followed quickly after. Perhaps of all his grand achievements the greatest was the Alabama Fuel & Iron Co., the second largest commercial mining concern of the Southern States.

I am aware that for the sake of brevity I have oversimplified the career of a dramatic and lovable character and a great developer. Henry F. DeBardeleben was a poet—a practical dreamer. Before our district was spotted with factories, he would take his pick and shovel and his favorite mule, Ready, and lose himself for days at a time prospecting in our hills and valleys. The smoke that hangs a haze over our mountains today and the bright flares of the furnaces that light up our skies at night are a monument to this man's greatness.

Colonel DeBardeleben's sons, the late beloved Charles Fairchild DeBardeleben and Henry Ticknor DeBardeleben, have caught the gleam of the torch their father lifted and developed many of his undertakings. Charles DeBardeleben was first general manager, and then president, of the Alabama Fuel & Iron Co. Henry T. DeBardeleben heads a long list of services to iron and steel, and is now president of the DeBardeleben Coal Corporation. There are, lastly, six grandsons: Charles Fairchild, Jr., Prince, and Walker Percy, the sons of Charles F. DeBardeleben, and Henry F., Bailey T., and Lt. Newton H., the sons of Henry T. DeBardeleben. They are carrying on with real distinction the broad vision and intensive application of their famous grandfather.

Baccalaureate Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WINIFRED C. STANLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Miss STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excellent address delivered by Chancelor Samuel P. Capen, of the University of Buffalo, to the class of 1944:

Americans are by habit aggressive. Push and drive are national characteristics. Individually they are not disposed to let things happen to them. They want to make things happen. To most Americans, the good life is a life of energetic grappling with difficulties, a life of movement and of change, a life of achievement which brings them increased possessions or recognition. As sportsmen they play to win, not just for the pleasure of the game. As workers they work to get on, not merely to keep the wolf from the door.

These characteristics have certainly been fostered, if they have not been bred, by the system of free enterprise to which the Nation has always been committed. They have been fortified by the fluidity of the class structure of the United States. At all times it has only been one jump from obscurity to high distinction in business or the professions, one jump from rags to riches, and at most two jumps back. The success of the father has not assured perpetual prestige to his descendants. The modest position of the father has never prevented a son or daughter from rising to eminence.

By and large Americans are individualists; pushing, striving individualists. They expect conflict. They expect opposition and do not resent it. Finding the way to beat it adds zest to life. They are ready to combine with one another for a common cause. But they insist that the combination be voluntary and not permanently binding. They resist social regimentation. This attitude is the despair of those who believe in a planned society.

In the midst of a war more nearly total than any in which the Nation has ever been engaged it is salutary to remind ourselves what we Americans are really like, and what peace really means to us. Peace to us is no bovine Utopia. Peace is a condition in which we can be free to mind our own business, and the business of our families and communities, in which we can build and contrive and invent and organize and press for individual and group advancement and match our wits and our strength against each other or against the inherent obstacles that nature or our own limitations place in the way of accomplishment. A peaceful national life, as we see it, is a life of competition between groups and parties, of conflicting schemes and ideas and policies, of compromises in the interest of action, but without the surrender by either side of principles or beliefs. It is a life of give and take based on the recognition of the right of individuals and of groups to hold different opinions and to pursue different, even diametrically opposite, purposes.

It is plain that there is nothing absolute about American life. Individuals, and even groups, may be convinced that there is only one way—their way, of course—to remedy the defects of society or to conduct an industry or to train the oncoming generation or to gain eternal salvation. But other individuals and groups are sure to hold contrary views; and both the constitutional provisions of American government and the social tradition of the country permit the two sides to fight it out. Perhaps a group is strong enough to get its pet project enacted into law. But that does not prevent the other side from working for the repeal or the amendment of the law, often with success. More and more as time has gone on Americans have grown distrustful of absolute solutions of social problems, distrustful of panaceas, distrustful of schemes that are too perfect or too final.

Although we are an aggressive, we are not a warlike, people. It takes a tremendous provocation to induce us to wage war. The reason is clear. War is the contradiction of our national habits and of our instinctive beliefs. For war is a matter of absolutes. It permits of no individual dissents, no factions, no resistances, no compromises. It is a matter of stark antitheses: Friend or enemy, the absolute right of our side as against the absolute wrong of the other, absolute authority at the top and unquestioning obedience to that authority. War seeks the absolute destruction of the enemy and his possessions. Through censorship and official propaganda it imposes an absolute doctrine. The citizen is expected to believe whatever the supreme authority—and it is necessarily an authority—hands out concerning the progress of hostilities, concerning the country's enemies, concerning its allies, concerning military policy. The citizen's questions do not need to be answered and are not. His criticism, if he ventures to offer it, may even be considered obstructive or disloyal. It cannot be otherwise. This is the inherent nature of war.

War is also a matter of short cuts. Violence is a short cut, the shortest way to settle any issue; and war is violence. It is likewise an affair of desperate haste. Success in modern war generally demands the application of the utmost possible force in the shortest possible time. Therefore, armies have to be raised and trained and mobilized under a relentless pressure that exacts the last ounce of strength from those who compose them. Military materials have to be secured without regard to cost. Waste is ignored if only speed is attained. Property has to be commandeered for military purposes and must be instantly surrendered. No individual's comfort or convenience can be allowed to interfere with the purpose which the military authorities wish to accomplish.

The necessities of war and the psychology of war affect all members of the population. All citizens who are able to do so are called upon to work to the limits of their endurance in the vast enterprise of production and distribution and training upon which the fleets and armies depend. A sense of rush, a feeling of pressure pervade the atmosphere. Everyone lives under an emotional tension such as is not experienced in time of peace. Nearly everyone suffers from anxiety for the safety of some relative or friend. There is anxiety about the progress of the Nation's arms. Thousands know grief for the loss of loved ones.

It is, of course, a patent fact that the emotions aroused by war produce a kind of intoxication. In the great majority of the population, fortunately, this intoxication takes the form of sacrificial ardor, releasing the noblest and most unselfish impulses. But in many it induces sheer recklessness, a disregard of all restraints which normally control conduct. Under the feverish excitement which war breeds it seems to be easy for all types of people, even those who are at other times kindly and tolerant, to fall victims to the ugliest sorts of prejudice. Race prejudice, religious prejudice, and class prejudice, which are always latent among parts of the population, flare up. In our saner moments, when our emotions do not dominate our reason, we call these attitudes un-American. Why? Because they are totally at variance with the principles of live and let live, of compromise and adjustment, of equal rights by which members of all races and creeds and nations have been welded together to form the American Nation. They are the attitudes of fanatics. And fanaticism of any kind is an absolute formula for belief or action. It is wholly incompatible with democracy. But it is an almost inevitable outgrowth of the absolutism of war.

As a people we are, with unparalleled unanimity, committed to the war in which we are now engaged. We are convinced not only of the justice of our cause, but also of the necessity for our complete and whole-hearted participation in the conflict, in order to preserve for ourselves and our children the things that we most deeply cherish. We know there must be no turning back, no let-up in our effort, no shrinking from the sacrifices. We are resolved that there shall not be.

But this does not mean that we should refrain from analyzing war as a social phenomenon, even while we are in the midst of it. On the contrary, we especially, the citizens of a nation with no militaristic traditions or leanings, should take particular pains to examine the anatomy and physiology of war. For if we understand it thoroughly we shall be the more determined individually and collectively to take whatever action may be necessary in association with other nations to banish it forever from the world.

The appalling misery that this war has brought to the peoples of the conquered countries, and also of the unconquered nations in and over which the fighting has taken place, is indelibly in the record. We should never let our memory of it grow dim. Through the accident of geography America has escaped these horrors. Our civilian population has had to face nothing comparable. Nevertheless, it is important for a full comprehension of the nature of war that we should observe what it is doing to us too, a people remote from the area of combat. We should observe what it is doing to our individual rights, to our customs, to our standards, to our feelings. We should not fail to note that modern war, even when waged by the most democratic nation in the world, tends to be a totalitarian undertaking. Not the army alone but also civilian life has to be regimented. The more intense the struggle becomes—and the longer it lasts—the greater the degree of regimentation. It is actually a paradox to say that a democratic nation wages war. For to wage war with any hope of victory a democratic nation must in many vital respects cease to be democratic for the duration.

Indeed, for a nation such as ours war is like an acute illness. The regular bodily functions are thrown out of their normal rhythm. Some of them are for the time being suspended.

It is easy to recognize the current effects of a war which has now lasted long enough to enable the Government to mobilize the Nation almost completely. It is less easy to anticipate some of the results of it that we shall soon have to face. I think, however, that we can forecast a few of these results with fair accuracy. And it is the part of wisdom to attempt to do so in order that we may not be taken by surprise when they appear.

After a serious illness there cmes a period of convalescence. It is a trying period, sometimes almost as dangerous to the patient as the illness itself. We are approaching the period of convalescence. How soon it will begin no one knows. But when it comes it will be critical for America. Not since the close of the Civil War will America have experienced anything remotely to be compared with it.

When the war stops 10 percent of our population will be under arms. A considerable number of these men and women will undoubtedly have to remain in service if we are to preserve the fruits of victory. But millions of them will no longer be needed for any military purpose. The demobilization of this enormous force cannot be the affair of a moment. No matter how efficiently it is managed it will take many weary months. Meanwhile the impatience of soldiers and sailors to resume their peacetime activities will mount. When finally they are discharged their reabsorption into civil life will be attended by many difficulties and disappointments. But I shall not dwell on this aspect of the transition from war to peace. Although it is the most important of all, it has been so much discussed that it is in everyone's mind. I choose rather to suggest to you certain other problems of demobilization that have received much less public attention.

The war will stop, but the civilian contrivances for waging it effectively will remain; and so will the war psychology. The vast and complicated Government machine for controlling the daily lives of the citizens will still exist and its powers will remain intact. The mammoth industrial establishment for producing the materials of war will remain. Mountainous stocks of military supplies will be on hand, some of them useful to civilians, most of them valuable only as junk.

And our emotions will remain overcharged. Some of us will have grown accustomed to the absolute solutions which war provides and to its short cuts, and will be impatient of the normal democratic processes of proposal and counterproposal and compromise. Suspicions and prejudices and hates will continue to possess some of us. Since there will no longer be an enemy against whom these evil impulses can be partly discharged, they are likely to be directed still more violently against groups of Americans. The mood of exalted idealism which has led the majority of our fellow citizens to rigorous self-denial and to painful sacrifices for the national cause will be suddenly deflated. For these people the world will seem pretty drab and uninspiring until they have found a new focus for their energies and their devotions.

In short, the civilian demobilization of the United States will have to be both physical and psychological. In both spheres it promises to be a slow and stormy process.

Thoughtful persons are agreed that the sudden lifting of all wartime Government controls, if it could be brought about, would cause economic and social chaos. But everyone who understands the genius of American institutions believes that the controls should be progressively relayed as the instruments of production and distribution resume their normal functioning, and that they should disappear altogether at the earliest safe date. We should remember, however, that no one who has acquired power ever voluntarily relinquishes it. Therefore, we can expect that most regulatory agencies of the Government will endeavor to become permanent and to continue to exercise as much as possible of their wartime authority. We can expect likewise that every nongovernmental group which has won special concessions, because its services to the life of a nation at war were thought to be indispensable, will seek to retain its immunities and extend still further its privileges. Whichever party is in power we can expect mistakes, injustices, and intolerable delays in dismantling the war plant and in disposing of the surplus war materials. We can expect many painful dislocations in the field of employment, and at least some temporary unemployment, as the war industries are reconverted to the production of civilian goods.

These are a few of the obstacles that must be surmounted in the task of physical demobilization. But there is nothing about the task that needs to daunt us, if we keep our heads. The problems will not be different in kind from those that America has faced over and over again. They will only be larger in scale.

Ever since the days of George Washington there has been conflict among us concerning the appropriate powers of the Federal Government. We shall probably go on disagreeing with one another about what the Government should be authorized to do as long as the American system survives. Certainly the tenacious hold on life of bureaucratic agencies is no new thing. Neither is the effort of groups of citizens to gain and hold special privileges. Finding the ways to check privilege and to preserve equal rights has been the perennial assignment of the American people. They have often been temporarily outwitted. But in the long run they have mastered group after group of would-be exploiters. They can do it again. For at least a century the imagination and the creative ability of Americans have been most conspicuously displayed in industry. The almost miraculous achievements of the last 4 years, which have never been equalled in our own or any other land, justify the belief that American industry can meet the demands of reconversion and of greatly increased peacetime production, if we the people and our elected representatives have intelligence enough not to throttle it with too many artificial restrictions.

No; it will not be the enormous size or the complexity of the task of reorganization for peace that will carry a threat to our institutions and our traditions. It will be rather the hold-over of the war psychology. Inevitably there will be confusion in the early days of reconstruction. Many people, still overexcited and unsettled, will expect a brave new world to be born ready made on the heels of war. When it does not at once appear they will be disillusioned and resentful. They will have been conditioned to violence and to quick action. They will be disposed to seek scapegoats whom they can blame for situations which dissatisfy them. They will be ready to listen to anyone who offers some absolute scheme for reforming society and making everybody happy, prosperous, and safe. The demagog with a panacea will have an enthusiastic following.

If these seem like improbable predictions we should recall what happened in nearly all countries, our own included, following the First World War. We had the Ku Klux Klan. In several localities we had what amounted to armed persecution of unpopular minorities. Eventually we had Huey Long.

The European countries furnished much more striking examples. Before the Italian people had recovered from the emotional debauch of the war Mussolini offered them an absolute scheme of national reform that was accepted with acclaim. Hitler, the greatest demagog of our time, presented the Germans with the panacea of national socialism. These may sound like far-fetched parallels. But would-be Mussolinis and Hitlers have existed in the United States, as the investigations of the F. B. I. reveal; and others are undoubtedly waiting in the wings for their cue to step upon the stage.

The war is not yet won; the severest fighting, the greatest sacrifices lie ahead. Nothing must divert our energies from the immediate obligation of seeing it through to complete victory. But wars have a way of ending without warning. Against the new exigencies of that unknown terminal date, be it near or remote, it is well for us to be forewarned and forearmed. For then the Nation will need, as perhaps it has never needed before, the militant championship of those who truly understand the principles and traditions that have given America its unique place among human societies. It will need men and women who believe passionately in the rule of law and the equal application of the law to all; who are determined that the Government shall be at all times the servant of the people, never their master; who will stand up for the rights of minorities against all attacks from whatever source; who are convinced that the slow and often halting processes of democracy offer the surest road to individual and social improvement.

Ladies and gentlemen of the class of 1944, what I am saying is that then, as now, America will need especially you and your kind—you who have had peculiar opportunities to grasp the broad sweep of our country's history and to analyze its current problems, you who have lived in the environment of a university that is dedicated to the cultivation of the freedom of the mind and to the daily practice of individual responsibility.

America calls on you now to bear the heaviest burdens that are laid on any of its citizens. By reason of your youth and strength it summons you to undertake the most arduous and most thankless tasks, to fight the most dangerous battles in the greatest of its wars. It will call on you with equal insistence when the fighting is over to continue to defend what your ancestors have won through a century and a half of struggle, what you will have won again, "the last, best hope of earth." I am persuaded that it will not call in vain.

Why the St. Lawrence Seaway Power Project Is Inimical to the People's Best Interests

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Labor Record, New Orleans, La., of May 1944:

Once again they are trying to push through the fantastic bill for the erection of the St. Lawrence seaway power project, in spite of the fact that in 1941, after many months of debate, it was proven inimical to the interests of the people. Now, 3 years later, when the same people are going through the most trying times in the history of the country, willingly standing the burden of heavy taxes necessary to carry on this grueling war, at such a time, how in God's name can any Representative of the people bring to light a bill already once soundly beaten, to erect a project that will cost the people close to a billion dollars. Before placing the solid reasons to you why we oppose this fantastic project once more, we wish to make an emphatic statement that we defy any proponents of this bill to refute—it seems to us that certain Senators and Congressmen should devote more of their time in seeing what can be done to bring this war to a quicker ending, so that our boys, who are really sacrificing the most, can come back home once more. What do you think our fighting men would say if they heard the Senate was devoting their time debating a bill to erect a project that will take from 7 to 15 years to erect, instead of trying to use that billion dollars to give them more planes, guns, and ammunition so that they can finish the job they are so bravely doing as quickly as possible.

Under the treaty of 1814 complete American sovereignty over Lake Michigan was established, our claim to this body of water being just, inasmuch as no part of same lies in adjoining Canadian territories. Under the treaty project Canada would have absolute authority to recognize water diversion for use in this water shed. The observer cannot fathom why Canada should be granted such authority when, under the treaty the Dominion has the right to divert for its sole use all the water it needs for power or other uses through the Ottawa River, from Lake Huron to Montreal. This diversion would also most certainly affect the flow of Niagara Falls.

Our country, the United States of America, should protect the interests of their people first, last, and always, and should not even contemplate nor sanction any project which would prove injurious to any of our people. The friendship now more than ever existing between the United States and Canada is one held dear in the hearts of every American, but the American people desire to retain their present land and water rights, but gladly give their services and monetary wealth to their friends in distress.

Statistics have proven that 81 percent of the American cargo vessels or tankers and 90 percent of the passenger cargo ships engaged in intercoastal trade, could not possibly use the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway project. With these facts and figures at hand it is proven that our country could not even receive a minimum benefit from the seaway's operation, yet, the taxpayers of the Nation would have to yield upwards of a billion dollars for construction. Allotment of individual State taxation for the project would fix a debit for Louisiana in the region of $7,000,000.

Just as an example let us take the case of Louisiana into consideration. In New Orleans it is a known fact that in normal times out of every dollar's revenues in the city close to 70 percent is derived from its water transportation. A close study of this fantastic bill shows that between 40 and 50 percent of the business of the port of New Orleans would be diverted to other ports.

What is to become of the millions of dollars invested in New Orleans directly and indirectly in water transportation business? What is to happen to the thousands of men and women employed by these concerns? We were put under the impression that our Senate and Congress were devoting their efforts in trying to create new industries to create jobs for our returning heroes, not trying to put into effect bills that would throw workers into the streets. What would happen to New Orleans would also be duplicated in the entire Mississippi Valley.

This country is provided with many accessible ports to accommodate all the ocean-going vessels of the world. With these ports spread over a wide area as at present, general prosperity is not restricted only to a small area, as it would be should the seaway project be put into operation. Wholesale unemployment throughout the country would be inevitable, and the influx of migratory workers to the Great Lakes regions and result in a panic and endanger the well-laid foundation of our mighty Republic.

The proponents of this seaway project have not considered the various angles as the more cautious men that constitute the opposition. Let us study another angle. The proponents of the bill have the audacity to claim that it would result in an economic boon. Shall we just to humor them and to bring home our point say, "You are right"?

Now everyone with any intelligence knows that the waters of the Great Lakes are only navigable 7 months of the year. Would the other transportation interests be content to lie idle 7 months while the seaway interests reap the golden harvest? The truth of the situation is if they tried to do so they would not be able to stay in business, and if they are forced out of business, how are you going to be able to transport your goods the remaining 5 months?

We would appreciate very much if the illustrious Senator AIKEN from Vermont would answer this question directly to us. Yes, Senator AIKEN, again we repeat, let us forget about bills that increase the taxes on the people and let all of us place our entire efforts to winning this war as quickly as we can.

In behalf of the American people, we unreservedly condemn and oppose the treaty project, and entreat our Senators and Congressmen to do likewise, and by so doing, preserve the security of the Commonwealth.

Jewish National Home in Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE D. O'BRIEN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. O'BRIEN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to join in the effort to provide a measure of justice and relief for sufferers from oppression by securing the establishment of a Jewish national home in Palestine.

The Balfour Declaration of November 2, 1917, enunciated the profound and just principle that the ancestral land of the Jews should be made available for their immigration with the ultimate goal of achieving a national home. The mandate for Palestine was confirmed by the Council of the League of Nations in 1922 and embodied the Balfour Declaration. It would therefore appear that the principles of the declaration would have the effect of law confirmed by international approbation. In reliance, more than 300,000 Jews immigrated to Palestine and the Jews constituted more than one-third of the entire population. As a result great improvements and developments occurred.

The termination of such immigration taking effect March 31, 1944, has resulted in a grievous disappointment to the refugees from cruel and intolerant oppression.

If there was need for a Jewish national home in Palestine in 1917, how much greater and more appealing is the need today? It was well said in the British Parliament in May 1939:

> You cannot ignore the fact that this is the cradle of two of the greatest religions of the world. It is a sacred land to the Arabs. It is also a sacred land to the Jew and the Christian.

The Zionist movement is in keeping with the Balfour Declaration and with the terms of the mandate for Palestine confirmed by the League of Nations and awakens a responsive chord in the hearts of all lovers of justice and humanity.

The B-26 Marauder

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article published in the Washington Evening Star, on Monday, June 4, 1944, concerning a safety record set in the B–26, manufactured by Glenn L. Martin Aircraft Co., of Baltimore, Md:

SAFETY RECORD SET IN B–26 TRAINING, AIR FORCES REVEAL

DODGE CITY, KANS., June 5.—The Army Air Forces Training Command School here, noting that the B–26 Marauder was once dubbed "the widow maker" by student pilots, declared in an announcement yesterday the Marauder is now regarded by qualified airmen as a plane to be feared only by its enemies.

The two-engine pilot school revealed that in a 6-month period its Marauder trainers had not had a single fatal accident through flights totaling in distance more than 20 round trips to the moon.

This, along with reports of combat success, the A. A. F. training command says, has blasted the accusation that the bullet-shaped medium bomber is temperamental.

WASPS graduated from the A. A. F. training command's Women's Airforce Service Pilots' School at Sweetwater, Tex., the statement revealed, have completed transition training at Dodge City and some are flying the B–26 out over the Gulf of Mexico, towing targets.

The new success is attributed to teaching pilots to "know the airplane" in an intensive 10-week course. Before transition schools were established, green pilots were given on-the-job training overseas.

"Every operational trouble the student might meet in training or in combat becomes a familiar problem to him, almost an old friend," said Col. C. B. Root, commanding officer of the school and native of Madison, Wis.

The plane has two 2,000 horsepower engines, weighs 20 tons, and takes off and lands at well over 100 miles per hour. It has four separate hydraulic systems and 21 instruments and 69 controls in the cockpit. Students have learned to hold altitude, execute turns, and maintain heading—all on one engine. And they have learned to land the plane in one-half the distance once considered safe. The specified figure is a military secret.

Termination of War Contracts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the passage of the bill to provide for the settlement of claims arising from terminated war contracts resulted from the recommendation made in the Baruch-Hancock report. No less than six committees of the House considered legislation of this character. It was argued that only in this way could industry bring about reconversion that would result in employment being available to those in the armed forces on their return. That was strongly pointed out and was one of the outstanding factors that caused many Members to support the measure.

It is beyond anyone to even estimate what this will cost, but one thing is certain—in trying to reach an estimate, think not of millions, but of billions.

No one will dispute the responsibility of the Government to assist industry in reconversion.

To my mind there are several classes of contractors. First comes the group that immediately responded to the call of their country, dismantled their plants, and converted from peacetime to wartime activities. This not only applies to the parent contractor but also to some subcontractors.

You have other contractors and subcontractors who are not in this class. For instance, as I pointed out Saturday, you have many corporations not in existence prior to Pearl Harbor who leased Government-owned and Government-equipped plants. These corporations will be liquidated as soon as wartime production is curtailed.

The corporations whose wartime activities did not require conversion of their plants is another class. No hardship will result when they return to peacetime activities.

The outstanding discussion centered around the part the Comptroller General would play in the settlements. Under the terms of the bill, the preaudit of the Comptroller General is out of the picture. He will be confined to a post-audit and only where there is evidence of fraud will he have a voice. When we recall what happened in World War No. 1 and the scandals that developed, the wisdom of eliminating the Comptroller General is debatable to say the least. We likewise recall at the end of World War No. 1 we had 21,000 new millionaires. No one wants that to be repeated.

Following those scandals the Congress passed the Budget and Accounting Act in 1921 creating the office of Comptroller General and the General Accounting Office. The Congress made the Comptroller General its agent to see that money was spent for the purpose for which it was appropriated. The law provided for preaudit of accounts before final settlement. The wisdom of passing that law has been demonstrated. Under that law the Comptroller General was not confined solely to fraud as he is under the provision of this bill. In the auditing of accounts very frequently unethical business practices result in overcharges. Under this bill the Comptroller General cannot take exception unless he can prove fraud.

For the sake of argument let us admit there is justification for immediate settlement after termination of contract with those in the first class I mentioned, still I doubt it is wise to do the same for those in the other classes, especially when no hardship is involved nor will immediate settlement result in jobs.

The taxpayers are at least entitled to that much protection.

In Commemoration of Eddie Savoy, a Trusted and Faithful Public Servant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMILTON FISH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that Eddie Savoy's memory and long and faithful service as a messenger to various Secretaries of State since 1869, when he was appointed by my grandfather, Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State for 8 years, 1869–77, is to be honored and commemorated by naming a Liberty ship after him.

I know of no Government employee who has had a longer or more faithful record of Government service than Eddie Savoy, the trusted and well-liked colored messenger of numerous Secretaries of State.

It is fitting and proper that his memory and services should be honored by naming a Liberty ship after this trusted and faithful colored messenger, known and liked by every Secretary of State for the past 64 years.

Mr. Speaker, I include the following article from the Washington Evening Star of June 14, 1944, pertaining to the launching of the vessel at Baltimore on July 8:

LIBERTY SHIP WILL BEAR NAME OF "EDDIE," COLORED MESSENGER

The name of Edward Augustine Savoy, colored messenger to Secretaries of State for 64 years, will be borne on the seven seas by a Liberty ship, the Maritime Commission announced yesterday. Launching of the vessel at the Bethlehem-Fairfield yards at Baltimore is tentatively set for July 8.

"Eddie," as he was familiarly known to three generations of diplomats and officials here, died last summer at the age of 88. He had been retired from the State Department in 1933 after two Secretaries, Frank B. Kellogg and Henry L. Stimson, had personally interceded with the Civil Service Commission to keep him on duty for 8 years beyond the date of his statutory retirement in 1925.

The diminutive "Eddie," a master of tact and diplomacy, was known to statesmen throughout the world. It was he who took their hats and coats when they called to see the Secretary of State, politely bowed them into the diplomatic waiting room and escorted them—always at precisely the right moment—into the Secretary's inner office. The ancient messenger at the time of his retirement had a collection of valuable gifts, a reward for his courtesies from many foreign lands.

When, in 1933, "Eddie" finally left the State Department, a White House official car called for him and brought him to receive a personal farewell from President Roosevelt.

"And," the delighted "Eddie" told reporters when he left the Executive Mansion, "he told me to come back and see him any time."

A native of Washington, "Eddie" was born here and became a messenger in the State Department under Secretary Hamilton Fish. In all, he served under 22 Secretaries.

Who Is Entitled to the Benefits of Public Housing?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. CURTIS
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, today the armed forces of the United States are making glorious strides toward victory. The welfare of these fighters and their families ought to be the first consideration of a grateful Government. Other workers in the United States are doing a good job, but the most consideration should be given "to him who is bearing the battle" and to his loved ones.

The National Housing Agency has provided certain housing at the Harvard Army Air Base at Harvard, Nebr. A part of these housing units have been occupied by the families of flyers, so that these men could be with their wives and children before they left for overseas. The Harvard Air Base is a final training base for men going overseas. Some of them will not come back. The American public will not permit their families to be evicted by the United States Government to make room for anyone else. Military men and their families should have first opportunity to use public housing, regardless of the rules and regulations of any agency.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to include a telegram received from the wives and families of the servicemen at the Harvard, Nebr., air base. This is dated June 15, 1944, and is as follows:

Preliminaries for action have been taken by Federal housing authorities for this area to evict Harvard Court military personnel families. Our situation is desperate since we have no other homes. Many of our men are in the overseas training group. Preservation of the American way of life and homes means little to men who are going to lay down their lives if their own homes are taken away. Immediate action necessary to preserve morale.

I also wish to include a telegram, dated June 19, 1944, from H. H. Rauscher, mayor of Harvard, in behalf of the city officials and interested citizens of the community. This telegram is as follows:

We urge immediate action on your part against the proposed eviction of service families from the Harvard Courts. Forty units are not in use at present and have been reserved for civilian defense workers. We urge that these units be furnished and used to relieve critical situation here. No other housing facilities are available. The housing facility has never been fully used since its completion. Why not finish and use these units before evicting the servicemen. This is a final training base for men going overseas. We feel that these families should be allowed to be together until the man receives shipping orders. We earnestly ask your immediate consideration of this matter. Thanking you in advance for anything you can do.

The End Begins for Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted to extend my remarks, I include the following article by Owen L. Scott, which appeared in the Washington Sunday Star, June 18, 1944:

THE END BEGINS FOR GERMANY

(By Owen L. Scott)

A deep-seated, although not publicly expressed, feeling exists among those competent to judge that Germany will be forced to surrender within the next 6 months, if not sooner.

At the same time, there is a growing belief that Japan can be forced into defeat within a year of the time that Germany goes down. This belief is based upon expectation that public pressure will force a speed-up in the tempo of this war. This pressure will grow from the fact that demobilization will start with the end of the German war and the millions of men who must stay in the Army and Navy to fight the Japanese war will become very impatient to join the other millions of men in the Army who will go back to civilian life with defeat of Germany.

The intent of the Army is to release from service first of all those men who have been mobilized for the longest time and who have seen the hardest fighting. Even so, it is going to be difficult to sell the country on anything less than an all-out use of available materials to get the Japanese war won so that men can get back to their peacetime pursuits.

At the moment, the German situation appears increasingly hopeless, with basic German weakness more and more apparent.

The German Air Force is so weakened that it was unable to take advantage of its great opportunity to strike at invasion ports when the move on Europe began or to strike at landing beaches when actual invasion occurred. The Germans never again will enjoy a comparable opportunity to make decisive use of their air force.

The German Army is so strained for manpower that it is using young boys and impressed troops including Czechs, Poles, Russians, and French who obviously cannot make the most effective soldiers. German transport was so upset that a major counterattack in France was delayed long enough to permit American, British, and Canadian troops to become firmly established.

German industry no longer is able to keep the German Army supplied as it must be supplied if it is to stand up to the lavish use of weapons that can be made by our side. German oil supplies definitely are being strained. German air losses cannot be replaced. The German Navy has failed to show anything impressive.

Despite the fact that German Armies still fight desperately and with skill, the fact of basic weakness in the whole German war machine cannot be concealed longer. When the collapse does come, it probably will be discovered that Germany had become pretty much of an empty shell with its industry, its transport, and its manpower badly blasted.

These other points are becoming clear.

The great German manpower and material losses in this war have occurred and probably will occur on the Russian front.

American and British airpower in the west has done and is doing just about all that was claimed for it by responsible air officials. The airplane has just about knocked the heart of German industry and German transport. In the period ahead the airplane probably will play a major part in knocking the heart from German armies in the west.

Casualties on our side, although they will be heavy, will not be as heavy as some officials have warned that they would be. It is notable that casualties in almost every theater of war have been under official estimates. This is due to the fact that the United States is able to throw in machines and metal in such lavish quantities. American industry is enabling the Nation to win this war with a minimum expenditure of life. It is improbable that the mass casualties, the casualties in the millions, that have occurred on the eastern front will occur in the west.

At some point these and other facts will impress themselves upon the Germans. When that point is reached, with Russian armies pressing from the east and American-British forces driving from the south and west, the Germans probably will be ready to give us. The next few months are expected to be the decisive months when Germany will be hit with all of the allied power that has been built up during 2½ years of effort.

Once German defeat occurs there will be release of naval and air forces for operations against Japan.

In fact, a vast quantity of war material and a navy of a size four to five times greater than the Japanese Navy even now is in the Pacific. When the British Navy can shift units to the Indian Ocean and Pacific areas the way should be opened for decisive action. It is true that this war could be turned into a very slow type of naval war in which years could be taken up with slow-motion jumps and maneuvers. That type of war, however, is unlikely. It now has been proved possible to strike directly at Japan itself by air and to force the Japanese Navy to fight or to be rendered impotent.

Japan is just a group of small islands, dependent for life upon imports of all basic materials, including food. Naval and air action can be used to destroy the war-making ability of that island in much less time than the last 2½ years of slow-motion warfare suggests.

As the situation now appears, 1946 may turn out to be the first full year of peace following what will have been a 6-year world war.

Contract Termination

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 17, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I voted in committee for S. 1718, as amended, which is the so-called Walter bill embodied in H. R. 4789. This bill provides for settlement of claims arising from terminated war contracts.

However, this bill only attacks one phase of the all-embracing problem of transition from wartime to peacetime industry. It only takes care of stockholders and principals of entities whose wartime contracts are terminated and takes care of them whether they are prime contractors or subcontractors. It is primarily concerned with fiscal arrangements between the Government and contractors. It leaves untouched the momentous questions of reemployment of discharged employees as a result of such contract termination.

Frankly, I am naive enough to believe that these fiscal problems are not unrelated and should not be considered without reference to problems confronting the employees who are bereft of jobs and who may be left stranded as a result of contract cancelation and termination. I am interested in the human side of this problem as well as the material side. Involved in the human and labor aspects are the speedy reconversion of war plants to civilian production or the reutilization of these plants to other war production.

The contract-termination bill only deals with one sector of this difficulty, namely the financial liability of the Government to the war contractors.

We all agreed that there should be a peacetime economy of full employment. We may differ as to which path should be trodden to reach that goal. I would like to have a peacetime economy that would produce as much, if not more, than was produced in our highest level of wartime production. If we fall short of that goal, we invite bristling difficulties.

To divorce the problem of reemployment from the problem of satisfying financially the contractor is equivalent to a half-hearted solution of this vast field of view.

In addition, there are the questions of disposition of surplus property, the stimulation and furtherance of activity in agriculture. There are various bills being considered by various committees dealing with war production, reconversion, post-war adjustments, expansion of foreign trade, taxation, and social-security measures, public works employment, and enhancement of agricultural pursuits. To my mind this seems like taking 17 bites off a cherry. All such well-intentioned and well-meaning inquiries by these various committees should be under some over-all umbrella-like supervision, but that supervision apparently is lacking. It is true that the House Post-War Planning Committee is considering all these factors, but when it comes to bills involving remedies four or five committees are at work. This is a piecemeal approach to a gigantic problem that requires a coordinated approach.

There is need for speedy action on cancelation and satisfaction of fiscal claims, but that proposition cannot be considered in a vacuum. See what happened in the Brewster case. Thirteen thousand workers were suddenly catapulted out of their jobs by a summary cancelation of contracts for the manufacture of planes. No notice of cancelations was given. The facilities and manpower of the Brewster plant remain idle. Unless drastic steps are taken, we have the disturbing spectacle of a waste we can ill afford. The Navy Department, apparently, did not consider the use of that plant for other war work despite the fact that Donald Nelson, Chairman of the War Production Board, urges greater war production as April records fall below March. The Brewster facilities and 13,000 workers are rather hors de combat because no plans had existed for continued use of such man and material power.

The Brewster fiasco highlights the need for integrated remedies. It clearly shows the fallacy of thinking it is possible to deal with one aspect of demobilization without, at the same time, considering other aspects. We can see the importance of the labor side of this situation. It is clearly discernible when we realize that the President has interested himself and has promised personally to investigate the Navy's abrupt cancelation of the Brewster contracts and to find other means of reemployment for the discharged employees. He recognizes the hardship visited upon these men and women. He recognizes the hardship resulting from lack of planning and that others besides stockholders must be considered in these contract cancelations.

It has been said that the workers could pack up and go to other areas just as a soldier does. That is rather a cavalier answer. It is not very easy for these employees to assume the roles of a civilian pup-tent army. There are questions of housing and transportation, all vital to migrating workers. Furthermore, these workers do not know where to go where work may be found. There is no effective directing agency to tell them where to go. There are no effective signposts to guide them.

There will be many Brewster cases. The instant bill does not help in that regard. It only helps those with financial interest in war contracts.

Furthermore, in this particular Brewster plan, there was a $6,000,000-housing project built for the workers. These houses built at the public's expense may now become vacant. If these and many other tragic mistakes are to be avoided, an over-all mechanism must be set up and guiding principles laid down to utilize facilities which become available and to utilize the skilled and unskilled labor who find themselves without jobs. Machinery must be provided for cut-backs or lowered production schedules, for increasing essential civilian production, for training displaced workers, for maintaining their purchasing power, and above all, for maximizing the use of their skills and abilities to achieve greater production in the war effort and in peacetime as well.

In addition, thereto, provision may have to be made for emergency unemployment compensation benefits to tide the worker over from unemployment to employment. Every worker is entitled to preserve intact his family life. It may be necessary for the Government to step in to help. Preference in that regard must be accorded ex-servicemen.

Provisions may have to be made for a suitable job or "interim placement benefits." Benefits may also have to be paid in general for service as well as non-service men and women and benefits paid for partial unemployment and partial disability. It will be incumbent upon any work administrator to provide free vocational education and training to ex-servicemen as well as to civilians for stated periods, during which time, whether they be family or single men, maintenance allowances will have to be provided.

In all this speed is necessary.

The primary purpose of this statement is to spur on or "needle" into action the committees which now have jurisdiction over these matters. I would prefer one committee to consider these various factors and facets of this problem in an over-all remedial manner, but since these four or five committees have already been given jurisdiction, it is hoped they will not delay in giving us the benefit of their research and deliberation.

The Time Has Come To Break With Franco and Aid the Spanish Republican Guerrilla Forces, Franco's Enemies and Our Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, on July 18, 1936, the first shots of World War No. 2 were fired in Europe. German Army transport planes, flown by Nazi officers, flew an obscure Spanish general and his mutinous troops from Spanish Morocco to Spain. At the other end of the Mediterranean, the jackal Mussolini called up his troops and put them on transports bound for Spain. For a few hours, the world thought that the shooting was merely a civil war in Spain. But it did not take very long before the troops of Fascist Germany and Fascist Italy were fighting in Spain. From the very beginning, the war in Spain was a German show.

When the war started, Herman Goering declared, at a meeting of German military leaders involved in the Battle of Spain, that "Spain is the key of two continents." He made it very clear that Germany proposed to seize this all-important key.

The guiding genius of the battle for Spain, the man who planned and ran its military and political strategy, was Nazi Gen. Wilhelm von Faupel. In 1938, during the Pan American Conference at Lima, General von Faupel traveled from the Spanish front to Berlin, where he delivered a speech before the German Academy. And in this speech Von Faupel minced no words. He said:

> A victory for Fascist Spain will cement our relations with Latin America and will be a rude shock to the good-neighbor policy of President Roosevelt.

Yet, Spain is truly the key to two continents. With Spain in Axis hands, France was outflanked before the Battle for France ever reached the shooting stage. And with Spain as an Axis nation, Hitler had a powerful grip on Latin America—aimed, as Von Faupel predicted, primarily against the United States of America.

This is no longer an official secret. A few hours before we invaded France, the War Atlas prepared with the aid of the Office of War Information reached the public. On page 5 of this atlas, in reviewing the steps by which Hitler prepared for war against us, the atlas declares:

> German and Italian troops spent 3 years (1936–39) helping to install the Franco regime and incidentally testing Axis weapons and tactics. Confident of an obligated Spain, Hitler and Mussolini could now threaten France with a two-front war. The British position in the Mediterranean, particularly Gibraltar, was placed at a further disadvantage.

A few months ago, I brought before this House some examples of what we have had to pay in lives and territory because of the obligations Franco Spain has toward Hitler Germany. I pointed out at that time that Jose Luis Aranguren, secretary of the Spanish Legation in La Paz and chief of the Spanish Falange of Bolivia had transmitted the funds and orders from the Nazis in Buenos Aires to the leaders of the revolt which overthrew the Government of Bolivia. I called your attention to the stream of raw materials Spain was and is still sending to the German war machine—materials produced in Spain and materials brought to the Nazis from the oil fields, the soil, and the industry of the New World via the Spanish merchant marine. I told you about the secret submarine and refueling bases the Nazis maintain on Spanish soil. I reminded you of Franco's series of disgusting and still unfulfilled pledges to withdraw his troops fighting as part of his master Hitler's armies on our eastern front. I cited instances of how the Spanish Falange and the Spanish diplomatic service are doing Hitler's work of propaganda, espionage, and sabotage in Latin America—and I offered to produce further evidence of this drive against our security.

Well, that was on February 24, when our troops were still on this side of the English Channel. A few weeks after that, I was visited by a distinguished United Nations official who read that in this speech I had also referred to the treacherous role the Spanish Falange had played in the Axis fifth column in Manila—a stab in the back, by the way, for which the Japanese Imperial Government decorated the Spanish Falange leaders. This distinguished gentleman told me that after the Japanese took Manila, all the foreign diplomats—including himself—were herded into a room by the conquerors and asked to prepare a list of Americans most dangerous to Japan. All but one of the diplomats refused. The only man to prepare such a list for the Japanese was Jose del Castano, Spanish Consul General in Manila and chief of the Spanish Falange of the Philippines. Need I add that every American on del Castano's list who was subsequently caught by the Japs was executed?

I cannot get del Castano's act out of my mind. It was not the act of an irresponsible individual who hates Americans. As long as Spain remains in the Axis, del Castano's action will serve as the prototype for all acts of Spanish officials in Spain and Spanish diplomats abroad. The "obligated" Spain of Hitler and Franco is an enemy nation—and her acts will continue to remain those of an enemy.

Now that we have invaded France, Franco's day of judgment is near at hand. His crimes against the Spanish people, against the people of the United States of America, against the democracies of the world have not been forgotten. On February 24 I told you in some detail about the activities of the Spanish republican underground armies now battling Hitler and Franco in Spain. The Spanish underground has now served notice to the world that they plan a full-dress uprising in the very near future to drive the Nazis and Fascists out of Spain.

The Spanish republican underground fighters are now fighting our battle in Spain. They are blowing up trains carrying food, oil, and war materials from Spain to Germany. They are sabotaging factories producing uniforms, small arms, and machinery for the Nazi Army. They are killing Nazi pilots and Gestapo officials inside of Spain. They are sabotaging German coastal fortifications all over Spain. Against tremendous odds, handicapped by tragic shortages of arms and equipment, they have been waging this type of warfare against Hitler since 1939.

Now, as the armies of liberation reach France, the Spanish republicans are preparing a major blow for the United Nations on Hitler's Spanish front.

When this front is opened, are we to play Pilate again? When the Spanish people, for the second time in a decade, rise in a war against Hitlerism, are we again going to declare "neutrality" toward both sides? Can we really hope to again arrogate to ourselves the right to be neutral in a war between our Nazi enemies and our democratic Spanish allies?

The government of the Fascist Franco is run by our Axis enemies. Its neutrality is the spurious neutrality of fascism—a sharp-clawed ersatz dove created to help Hitler in his war against the United Nations. Time and again Franco has openly called for the defeat of the United Nations and the triumph of the Axis armies. The Spanish press, controlled by the Fascist Spanish state, consistently sneers at the democracies and praises the leaders, the government, and the armies of Nazi Germany.

The menace to us of a Fascist Spain will not be lessened by ignoring it. We are now at war because we refused to believe that the guns pointed at our heads by Italian, Japanese, and German fascism were loaded. The gun Hitler's puppet Franco points at our head is also loaded. Unless we take the only logical steps called for by this situation, the first shots of World War No. 3 will be fired in Spain within a generation. For if fascism survives in Spain when this war ends, it will be a fascism controlled by the German cartels who today run Spain.

The Spanish republican underground, in taking to battle for Spanish freedom, will also be fighting for the freedom of the United States. The men of the Spanish underground mean business. They are tired of facism, and they propose to fight Hitler with or without the blessing of any other nation—even if some United Nations leaders see fit to praise the fascist Franco in public.

When the republican uprising in Spain begins, the first square mile of Spanish soil to be liberated from the Nazi overlords will become the capital of one of the countries which have—in the blood of their best people—won the right to call themselves one of the United Nations. When that rising begins, it will be our clear duty to welcome the long-suffering republican armies of Spain to our camp as allies, and to extend to them our full aid in their fight against the common enemy.

Because this rising is coming soon, and because it is now evident that this war cannot end until the Nazis and their regime are driven out of Spain, and because the military and political strategy of this war demands that the people of Spain know now that this time we shall not fail them in their battle against our common Axis enemies, I am at this time offering a resolution dealing with our policy towards Spain. In making this resolution, I urge debate and the consideration of testimony both for and against the course it advocates. I am prepared to present a vast body of evidence in support of the resolution. It is evidence which should be in the hands of all Americans who want to win this war and prevent the outbreak of a third world war which must inevitably take American lives.

TEXT OF RESOLUTION

Whereas the United Nations' invasion of Europe is the climactic military stroke of the war to end fascism; and

Whereas it has become clear that the United Nations' deaths of this war will have been in vain if German fascism is permitted to exist anywhere in the world when the war ends; and

Whereas the present Fascist government of Spain was created by the governments of Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini, became a formal signatory of the Axis pact in 1939, has maintained troops in the Axis army on the United Nations' eastern front since 1941; and

Whereas Francisco Franco, the nominal head of the present Spanish Government, has at all times openly and flagrantly called for a German victory over the United Nations in this war; and

Whereas Spain, under Franco, has become in effect a colony of the Third Reich, her factories and her soil devoted to producing cloth, guns, and food for the Nazis; her merchant marine devoted to carrying Nazi spies to the New World and oil, wheat, cotton, and arms from the Americas to the German Wehrmacht; her wolfram, copper, iron, and coal mines devoted to producing the raw materials for the German weapons which kill American and all other United Nations' soldiers; her shipyards devoted to repairing German warships damaged in engagements with American and British forces; and

Whereas the controlled press and radio of Fascist Spain are overwhelmingly devoted to spreading the propaganda of the Axis and painting a false, derogatory picture of the United Nations and their leaders; and

Whereas the Falange, the official and sole political party of Fascist Spain, whose 26-point program is officially the program of the present Spanish Government, is openly Fascist and anti-United Nations in its program and philosophy; and

Whereas the third of the 26 points of the Falange declares, in part, that "We have the will of empire and assert that the historic legacy of Spain is the empire * * * Regarding the Latin-American countries we intend to tighten the links of culture, economic interests, and of power"; and

Whereas in pursuance of the third point of the 26 points of Falangism herein cited, the Falange has been openly working to reclaim the Philippine Islands, Puerto Rico, and Cuba for the Spanish Empire and working actively against the United States of America in the Latin-American nations; and

Whereas the Falange maintains cells and organizations in 20 Latin-American nations devoted to furthering the cause of the Axis, and whose members are called upon to act as military spies and propagandists of the Axis; and

Whereas the Falange chiefs of the Latin-American countries have been empowered by the Falangist Spanish Government to control the Spanish legations, embassies, and consular offices in the Americas; and

Whereas the overwhelming majority of the Spanish people, who fought valiantly in the tragic years 1936 to 1939 against the Axis invaders of their democratic republic, and who warned the world that the Axis conquest of the Spanish Republic was actually the first battle of the Axis world war against the democracies, have now given notice that they intend to rise up against the Axis regime of Spain; and

Whereas the Spanish Republican underground has since 1939 been sabotaging mines producing coal and ores for the German war machine, blowing up freight trains carrying Spanish and Latin-American raw materials to Germany via France, wrecking Nazi-run airfields and naval installations in Spain and the Spanish possessions; and

Whereas the expressed and open aim of the Spanish Republican underground is to drive out the Nazi overlords and to destroy fascism in Spain and to then throw the full weight of the Spanish Nation into the common struggle of all the democracies of the United Nations against the Axis; and

Whereas the existence of a sound Republican government of the people, such as the Spanish Republican underground is fighting for, in Spain will be both a guarantee of peace in Europe and a profound deterrent to the rise of anti-United States Fascist nationalism in the Latin American nations; and

Whereas the continuation of fascism in Spain is an automatic guarantee of a third world war within a generation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States urge it upon the President of the United States that it is the will of the American people, expressed through their elected representatives, that the Government of the United States can speed our victory and guarantee a lasting peace by immediately breaking all diplomatic relations with the Nazi-Falangist Government of Spain; and be it further

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States urge it upon the President of the United States that it is the will of the American people, expressed through their elected representatives that the breaking of diplomatic relations with the Axis Government of Spain should be followed by the appointment of a military commission which will be charged with the task of getting arms, ammunition, and medical supplies to the heroic Republican guerrilla armies of Spain when their revolt, timed to weaken the Nazi armies in their moment of greatest crisis, creates in Spain one of the active and decisive battlefields of this global war.

The Underpaid Worker Is Forgotten by the New Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD W. LANDIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, after listening so many times and reading so many printed pages about the one-third that are poorly housed, fed, and clothed, it is interesting to note the present attitude of the New Deal. The New Deal has always been a Santa Claus to the few and a Shylock to the many. More and more people realize the real attitude of the New Deal which really is all for me and nothing for you.

We have just had a week's discussion of hold the line and inflation. Each day it is more apparent that the only time that inflation is really discussed is when the low-income groups are involved or when the American farmer is in the picture. Here are a few examples:

Last summer the railroad men asked for an increase of 8 cents per hour but were flatly refused by the Director of Economic Stabilization, Fred Vinson, because it would cause inflation. This inflation scare was all the more questionable when one realized that one-third of the railroad workers received 57 cents per hour or less and a total average income of less than $2,500 per year. This was done a few weeks after Mr. Vinson himself had obtained an increase in salary from $12,500 to $15,000, or $2,500. In addition to this increase in salary, he also was and is receiving a $628.32 overtime bonus, which is more than the base pay of a soldier.

The 1943 overtime pay bill provided $200–$300 for Federal employees in the lower income brackets but provided over twice as much, or $628.32, for the bureaucrats receiving $10,000 to $15,000 per year.

During the consideration of the O. P. A. bill this week we first saw the New Dealers on the floor protesting a provision that would give farmers a parity price for their product which would be a guarantee of some 20 cents to 40 cents per hour. Then as a climax we saw these leading New Dealers on the floor telling the Congress that if the low-income groups of our Nation should receive up to $37.50 per week upon agreement with their employer, inflation would prevail.

The following excerpts from an editorial by Mr. Fred W. Perkins in the June 15 Washington Daily News gives further evidence of the drift of sentiment for the few at the expense of the many:

HOPE FOR UNDERPAID

(By Fred W. Perkins)

Hopes of low-paid and unorganized white-collar workers of getting out from under the wartime wage freeze rest today on the slender chance that House and Senate conferees on the O. P. A. bill will O. K. a Senate amendment intended to exempt raises up to the $37.50 weekly level—the raises to be agreed upon by employer and employee and the total to include payment for "usual" overtime.

The House rejected such an amendment yesterday. There was considerable debate and a vote in the House on the subject, while there was neither in the Senate when that body accepted the proposal. That sets up a parliamentary situation which seems bad for the "white-collar amendment."

Republicans furnished nearly all the support in the House, and most of the opposition came from the Democrats. Battling an apparent trend toward the proposal, Majority Leader MCCORMACK, Democrat, Massachusetts, took the floor to call it "dangerous and highly inflationary." Other Democrats joined in the attack, and Speaker RAYBURN voted against it. It went down in a 98-to-70 count by tellers, preventing a roll call which Republicans asserted would show a 2-to-1 majority in favor.

Note the editorial comment regarding the position of the Honorable AUGUST H. ANDRESEN, of Minnesota, author of the amendment:

Representative ANDRESEN, Republican, Minnesota, who offered the amendment, charged that "thousands of applications for approval of raises for low-paid workers are now before the War Labor Board and not receiving any attention. Many employers," he said, "want to raise wages, but cannot do so because of the War Labor Board's cumbersome regulations."

The statement of the Honorable FRED L. CRAWFORD, of Michigan:

Representative CRAWFORD, Republican, Michigan, denied in the House that prices of commodities would be affected, because the amendment carried no authority for employers to seek price relief on this account from O. P. A. He stated: "If we turn down this amendment, I hope we will have to answer to every white-collar worker in the country."

Mr. Speaker, here then is one more concrete example of how the New Deal is so vocal for the underprivileged at election time but when in action they really do not wish to provide $37.50 per week to the average man although they are willing to provide the biggest of the bureaucrats over $300 per week without one evident objection so far as inflation is concerned.

Who can say that the New Deal is not Santa Claus to the few and Shylock to the many? The white-collar people of our country were not even allowed to be benefited by a single simple amendment in their behalf. The New Dealers are trying to rock the underpaid workers to sleep, by providing a 3-cent-per-day subsidy on their grocery bill, instead of a proper increase in salary.

Cleveland O. P. A. Investigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I am just back from a Sunday in Cleveland where I found a completely demoralized situation in gas rationing due to the lack of thorough airing of the facts relative to the scandal in Ration Board 6. As a result other boards have lost heart. Honest people are disgusted, and one cannot blame them.

Many feel the situation as it is being handled opens the door to black markets and increased dishonesty. Cleveland wants F. B. I. investigation. The Feighan resolution would make that possible.

We are told the traditional policy of the F. B. I. is to confine itself to such matters as are definitely within its own jurisdiction. Other governmental agencies are vested with specific investigational authority in their respective fields. For example, counterfeiting goes to the Treasury Secret Service, as do alcohol and customs matters, but kidnaping, and so forth, belong to the F. B. I. In the matter of the O. P. A., Congress created a special investigating agency in this office with some 3,000 agents. Inasmuch as this agency exists, F. B. I. would need special instructions to move into the Cleveland situation. The Feighan resolution would constitute such instruction.

There is a point, however, where the F. B. I. could well enter the picture, for the O. D. T. does not have an investigating agency, and the O. D. T. is definitely involved. Inasmuch as it is gas rationing that is in question, the P. A. W. also may have certain responsibilities.

Local authorities feel the situation has gone beyond the local boards involved. The practical effect has been to discourage other rationing boards, to encourage black markets and general dishonesty. It is difficult to gauge the far-reaching effect of the ineffectual O. P. A. investigations. Local police are unquestionably doing their utmost, but cannot go into it as the Justice Department could.

Let me reemphasize the wider aspects of this local scandal and urge immediate action on the Feighan resolution. It has become incontrovertibly evident that irregularities, inconsistencies, and black markets have reached proportions beyond the ability of the local authorities to cope with.

Some will remember that several years ago the State of Maine had great irregularities in the gas-rationing field. At that time the Governor refused to have State officials handle it, holding that it was very definitely a Federal matter.

The people of Cleveland want Federal investigation, and they remind us that this situation reaches out into every gas-rationing board of the country. I trust we may have action.

At a regular meeting of War Price and Rationing Board 34-18-13 held at Cleveland, Ohio, June 15, 1944, the following resolution was adopted by the entire volunteer staff:

"The people of Cleveland, Cuyahoga County, and the entire Nation have been literally shocked into a state of insensibility by the revelations, during recent weeks, of the irregularities, illegal operations, and evident criminal acts that have taken place in Ration Board Six of this city and all of these officers of the Government of the United States in their several capacities as sworn representatives of law and order.

"These revelations have profoundly affected public morale in its adhesion to and support of the entire price-control and rationing program as operated and being executed through the O. P. A. as the public agency of our Government and have lessened the confidence of the public in such a sound national program against inflation and its multiplied and attendant evils.

"These revelations have and continue to have a growing injurious effect upon the entire program in that the loyal, faithful, and honest people who are serving the Government voluntarily without pay are being subjected to abuse, their work is brought into contempt, and a terrific opposition arises everywhere as a result of this public scandal.

"Officers of the O. P. A. have repeatedly requested the direct, immediate, and effective assistance of the Government, through the F. B. I., to trace these brazen criminal acts and bring the guilty to justice, but that to date these requests have not been met with anything other than innuendos, false claims that separate groups are powerless to set or that the case is outside their jurisdiction, a multitude of shifting alibis of one kind and another, all of which gradually demonstrates to the American people that our Government is either not interested in this public scandal or is powerless and weak to protect the inner defenses of our public economy.

"We, therefore—

"Affirm in no measured terms our continued confidence in this national program of price control and the wise policies of the O. P. A. as a part of the all-out war program of our Nation.

"Deplore and condemn the shifting policies and attitudes of high-ranking Government officials whose positions mean delay, confusion, and the final defeat of the entire program of rationing and price control.

"Support the efforts of local officials in their repeated requests to the Government for help and assistance that the full power of law and order be employed to clear up this scandal and thus to strengthen the hands of loyal citizens everywhere, and particularly their request for the F. B. I. agency of government to reach such a goal.

"Urge and implore the President and the Attorney General, our Representatives and Senators in Congress, and other persons in positions of influence and power to throw the weight of their offices into this situation without delay to secure positive action and immediate results and that they be urged to take the necessary measures to realize this goal.

"Commend all honest, faithful, and loyal citizens in every community of the country and especially those who are giving free of charge their time and talents to the rationing and price-control program in an honest manner to execute the laws, rules, and regulations thereof in the face of this shameful situation and the hesitant, do-nothing policy of the Government to date to prosecute this case to a just conclusion. And most especially do we commend the local leaders of O. P. A. who have shown genuine interest and taken effective leadership in the effort to bring this case to a just decision as quickly as possible.

"Call upon all loyal citizens further to cooperate in this splendid program in spite of the break-down of the machinery in one situation to the end that all might be spared the ugly repercussions that are bound to come in the wake of the collapse of the rationing and price-control program.

Resolution of the Polish-American Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER G. ANDREWS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, June 5, 1944, I inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page A2736, copy of a resolution either offered or presumed to have been offered at the recent Polish-American Congress at Buffalo, N. Y., May 28–30, 1944. This was sent to me by the Rev. John Z. Jasinski, bishop of the Polish Church at Buffalo, N. Y., and inserted at his request. I find that it was not an official resolution of the congress at that time, and if offered, it was not adopted.

Since then, on last Wednesday, June 14, 1944, my colleague from Michigan, the Honorable JOHN D. DINGELL, inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, on page A2998, the official resolution of the Polish-American Congress signed by Mr. Charles Rozmarek, chairman.

I make this statement to correct any misunderstanding which may thereby have existed and I have informed Mr. Charles Rozmarek accordingly.

Report of Foreign Relations Committee of the American Legion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the membership of the House the following report of the foreign relations committee to the executive committee of the American Legion at its regular meeting held in Washington, D. C., April 28–30, 1944.

The developments of the past few years have proven the recommendations of the American Legion on both foreign relations and national defense to be far seeing and sound.

Col. Anson T. McCook, who served as acting chairman of the Legion's foreign affairs committee, is a sound student of our country's foreign relations:

REPORT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE TO THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE AMERICAN LEGION, WASHINGTON, D. C., APRIL 28–30, 1944

Your committee presents this report on the eve of far-reaching developments. All look for an allied invasion of Germany, while by land, sea, and air our forces are closing in upon that other arch aggressor, Japan. These events bring into sharper focus those policies on foreign relations which the Legion has enunciated. Because of their special bearing on the problems of this moment, we are restating them in outline.

From its very organization, the American Legion constantly insisted upon adequate preparedness as the surest means of preserving peace and preventing aggression. After the Battle of Britain, resolutions were adopted at the Boston convention in 1940, placing the Legion on record as condemning aggressor nations and extending the assurance of our friendship "to the people of the great British commonwealth who are so heroically defending their shores and their freedom, and to the gallant Republic of China." Even more specifically, foreseeing that the unembargoed oil and scrap-iron then flowing towards Japan would some day spell death to many young Americans, we urged: "That the Government of the United States exercise all lawful means to prevent shipment of war materials to the aggressor nations."

And then, turning towards our good neighbors of the Americas, we adopted one of the Legion's most constructive and most reiterated statements of policy in these words:

"We recommend that every effort be made * * * to strengthen the bonds of friendship and good will with our pan-American neighbors."

At Milwaukee, after declaring that "we believe in our constitutional form of government and are determined that it should be maintained as a beacon light of freedom for all nations and peoples," the convention minced no words in its declaration that—

"We are opposed to any * * * appeasement toward the aggressor nations, Germany, Italy, and Japan, toward whom we demand a policy of stern and exact justice."

That resolution is as vital today as when enacted, since the hateful and dangerous doctrine of appeasement, although under a different name, is raising its head once more, both in Britain and in the United States. Some war-weary persons are now proposing that we should bargain with the enemy in the hope of shortening the war. But the shortsightedness of anything except unconditional surrender must be clear. Looking back 25 years, it is plain that any weakness or softness would merely condemn the next generation of Americans to another war. Indeed, the executive committee at its last meeting emphasized the Legion's duty of making certain that our people should not be deceived again, as they were before, by false representations and the secret plotting of the German people to rearm for another war.

Another present-day problem was squarely faced at that same convention, in a resolution which called for the freedom of the seas. Your committee is convinced that the legitimate interests of the United States, when peace arrived, will require a healthy foreign trade if our factories, farms, and workers are not to suffer. Therefore, it is clearly essential to our foreign trade that the United States shall not only have full freedom of the seas, but also full freedom of the air for peaceful traffic. Laying to one side any question of regulation of warships and war planes, certainly the seaports and airports of the world must be open to American commerce and, indeed, to the commerce of all law-abiding nations.

The Kansas City convention declared our unswerving determination to win the war, insisting that "only total victory can be considered; only total peace can be tolerated." Then looking forward, we demanded that this Nation assert its leadership in the establishment of a just and enduring peace by which the aggressor nations should be disarmed "and made impotent to provoke another world conflict" and that conditions provocative of war should be eliminated. We insisted further "that the peace once written by fully enforced" and declared:

"No peace, however welcome, however promising, can long endure unless it be made secure by the Nations which have won it * * * We cannot escape, we will not evade, our own responsibility for the maintenance of that peace."

Again at its Omaha convention the Legion asserted that "No peace shall be made with our enemies except on the basis of their unconditional surrender" and it further declared that

"Our Nation can best serve and protect its national interests * * * in the establishment and maintenance of an association of free and sovereign nations, implemented with whatever force may be necessary to maintain world peace and prevent a recurrence of war * * * No peace can be lasting and secure for nations that are not fully prepared to maintain peace."

All these resolutions, taken together, embody the Legion's existing policy on foreign affairs and provide a broad foundation for solving some of these vast problems relating to peace which will become daily more urgent as the end of the war approaches.

It would be impossible at this stage to state what the details of that peace should be, since rapidly changing conditions constantly bring new problems, and therefore the methods of meeting these problems must be elastic. Two things, however, are sure: First, that there cannot be a moment's relinquishment in the war effort until complete victory has come through the unconditional surrender both of Germany and Japan. Second, that the people of the United States must give to this vital subject of peace all the thought and effort which they are giving now to the successful prosecution of the war.

Vast and complicated questions cannot be solved by wishful thinking. And certainly peace cannot be made enduring by any agreement with those nations who have already proved that their most solemn agreements are valueless. Moreover, if the terms of peace are to be effective they must have facts as their basis, and those facts must be accurately compiled and thoroughly reliable.

In all the conflict of opinion which is bound to occur, and which is wholesome when it is honest and unbiased, certain basic principles are clear and must be adhered to. It must be a just peace, since no peace can be enduring unless it is just. It must be a real peace, and there can be no real peace unless first there is complete victory. There can be no selfish aggrandizement, since we have fought the war solely for our own defense and to liberate oppressed peoples. It must, above all, be based not upon words alone but a sincere spirit of fair dealing and mutual understanding. In his farewell address, Washington spoke with patriotic directness and deep feeling when he adjured the United States to "exert good faith and justice towards all nations, cultivate peace and harmony with all," and pointed out that, "In public as well as private affairs, honesty is always the best policy."

Your committee adds three practical recommendations: Since no expediency can ever justify any breach of faith, let us as a nation make a few promises, but fulfill what we make. Strong as we are, there is a limit to our strength, and we have no right to promise beyond our strength. Again, we should not neglect our own proper interests. Thus, as already pointed out, communication by sea and air throughout the world must be kept open and maintained for the United States, and full economic freedom assured us in dealing with other nations. Legitimate self-interest is entirely compatible with friendly relations and fair dealing. And the third is this: No peace, however, carefully prepared, can be stronger than those who make it and stand behind it. Therefore, it must be followed by perpetual vigilance on the part of our citizens in the discharge of their political, military, and civic duties. It is forever true that vigilance and sacrifice are the price of liberty and peace. Only through a strong and free America can we as Americans fulfill our duty to ourselves and to the world.

The complex nature of these plans for the peace, involving the future security and liberty of the peoples of the world, will tax the capabilities of our best minds; and all of these efforts may prove futile unless we recognize our dependence upon the guidance and wisdom of Almighty God.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram of June 14, from Mr. Abraham Heller, executive director of the Chicago Association of Dress Manufacturers:

CHICAGO, ILL., June 14, 1944.

Hon. WILLIAM A. ROWAN,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.:

The practically unanimous opinion of directors of the Chicago Association of Dress Manufacturers is that there should be no relaxation to price control generally and specifically to the regulations pertaining to the manufacturing of women's outer apparel. The overwhelming sentiment of our directors in which I fully concur is that any relaxation of price control would not only create an inflationary condition detrimental to our economy but also would make it more difficult to revert to peacetime economy once our armed forces succeed in destroying the enemies of civilization. We feel that it is the duty of the Congress to resist strenuously all efforts to secure amendments to the new price-control bill which would pave the way for higher prices. Only in that way can Congress perform a vitally needed service on the home front that will match the sacrifices our fighting men are making on the battle fronts.

ABRAHAM HELLER,
Executive Director, Chicago Association of Dress Manufacturers.

My Friend, Tom Dewey

OF
HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following article by Hickman Powell, from Collier's magazine, for June 24, 1944:

MY FRIEND, TOM DEWEY
(By Hickman Powell)

When the editor asked me to write this piece, I had no idea how difficult it was going to be. I was born and raised a Democrat. Counting a couple of State elections, I have voted for Franklin D. Roosevelt, not three times, but five. Eight years ago I was a convinced New Dealer. And now it looks as though I'm going to work my heart out to help elect a Republican as President of the United States.

Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, is an old friend of mine, and everybody is saying the Republicans are going to nominate him. If they do, I'll vote for him.

If you have worked with and for a man close up for many years, not continuously, but from time to time, so that you have seen him grow by stages from a promising young fellow in a big job into bigger and bigger responsibilities; if you have been through crises and worked through the night together and gone home after dawn; been cussing mad under tension and got over it—then probably you know the worst about him, and possibly the best. If then you support him for President, any talk seems pale.

But what I have to say may be important. I suppose it is the basic reason why I, still thinking of myself as a liberal Democrat, have been glad to work so closely with the man who was rebuilding the Republican Party. And the election this year is going to be decided by people like me.

Long years before he became Governor of New York, young Tom Dewey was sitting one evening with a half-dozen advisers discussing a knotty, controversial problem, deciding what to do.

"Before we leave here," he said, "let's agree on this—unanimously."

He has said this often in the years since, for it worked very well. They did agree, as men usually do when they sit down to face facts with good will and common sense, intending to agree rather than to justify their own isms and prejudices.

This kind of give-and-take has been a habit of Governor Dewey and the always increasing circle of able men who have gathered around him. The art and practice of bringing people into agreement, not through control or controversy, but through their own reasonable free will, has been the basis of virtually all his accomplishments.

Of course, the Republicans are seeking Dewey's leadership largely because they want a hard fighter, a finish fighter, with the habit of victory—for the winning of the war and the winning of an election. It is less obvious but more important that Governor Dewey has functioned primarily as a crystallizer of agreement, a catalytic agent in bringing people together for effective purpose.

Agreement—often unanimity—has followed him like a shadow. There were all those jurors in the racket cases years ago, who always agreed with one another and with him. There have been all those able men and women in the ever-widening circle of his staff, people with strong egos and variegated beliefs, who came from East Side, West Side, the ghetto, the social register, and Negro Harlem, and up-State and the Middle West—all working together with a common passion for the job well done.

THE CHOICE OF ALL PARTIES

There was the time when everyone but Tammany Hall, from the left wing labor unions to Wall Street inclusive, insisted that Dewey could not go to work for himself but had to be district attorney. And there was the unanimity in which even Tammany joined, agreeing on his successor.

Twice Dewey was nominated for Governor, by acclamation. If the Chicago convention follows the predictions and nominates him on the first ballot, without his declaring himself a candidate, that will be unusual in national politics. But it will be just another item in a Dewey habit.

There must be reason behind this pattern, some reason why the people now look to Albany, why the diverse voters of industrial Pennsylvania and agrarian Nebraska went to the primaries this spring and individually wrote in the name of Dewey, why they seek him when they reject others. Maybe they sense an uncommon kind of leadership.

Tom Dewey is the least opinionated, least intolerant man I know. He has certain simple, basic beliefs. He is death on crime, corruption, and crookedness; he has no patience with incompetence; but if he encounters a good man, the sky's the limit.

When he started the crime investigation nine summers ago, hundreds of unknown young lawyers applied for jobs by letter. Dewey saw one of them, looked him over, looked him in the eye.

"So you're a Democrat from Jimmy Hines' district," he said. "If I were prosecuting Jimmy Hines, where would you look for orders?"

Hines was the biggest Tammany leader, dispenser of New Deal patronage, known protector of the Dutch Schultz mob. Dewey was talking to Frank S. Hogan, one of the four assistants who 3 years later helped him send Hines to prison. Today Hogan is Dewey's successor as district attorney of New York County.

Dewey likes initiative, and opposes any attempt at monopoly of it, whether by Washington or anyone else. Ironic critics have said he is against sin; but in a sense they exaggerate, for he is not puritanical. He has eliminated the word "tolerance" from his vocabulary, because it implies disapproval of somebody's peculiarity or peccadillo. He thoroughly hates intolerance.

Dewey has been an effective accuser, but he hates a smear. You have heard of all the convictions he got, back in the racket-smashing days, but you have heard less about the indictments he didn't get. In a way, they are even more important. If you consider what happened in other investigations, that means that a lot of presumably innocent men were spared the smearing of accusation and acquittal. For in all those big cases you could count the acquittals on the fingers of one hand. He didn't move until he was sure he could convict. That was one thing I liked about him. It was an indication of the sure-handed way he would later take over in Albany. It is one reason people unite behind him now.

A bigger reason is the way he takes a licking.

One day in August 1938, Dewey was prosecuting Jimmy Hines. It was his biggest case, product of 3 years' work, of spectacularly successful investigation. His hand was shown, his case was in. A defense witness was being cross-examined when the judge, taking exception to a question, called a mistrial.

The boys on Broadway were laying odds that night that Hines would never be tried again. But they lost their bets.

That afternoon, Dewey and his assistants walked back to his office, grim, indignant, and dazed. Dewey disappeared alone into a little cubbyhole room he had. Hogan and Sol Gelb and several others lounged around outside, hardly knowing what to do. But only for a minute or two.

Dewey's door flew open, and there he stood, grinning.

"What's everyone looking so glum about?" he said. "Come on. We're going to start all over again."

Hines was convicted 5 months later, and it was several times the triumph that it would have been. But meanwhile Dewey had been licked again.

They nominated him for Governor that year, and it was the time he nearly won, nosed out by a mere 64,000, after Roosevelt came to New York, spoke against him and tipped the scales. I remember him that election night going through the crowd out to face defeat and thank the throng of supporters. Then I went and folded up, exhausted. It was several days before I found what he had been up to.

He was down at his office the next day, starting out to reorganize the Republican Party. It was then that Edwin F. Jaeckle, of Buffalo, became chairman of the State executive committee. Then began the victory of 4 years later, when they carried the State by 600,000 votes.

Coming back from Bermuda some weeks after the 1938 defeat, Dewey's plane was 5 hours overdue, while an anxious group waited at the airport without news.

"What if the plane's gone down?" asked someone.

"Don't worry," cried the late Mike Claffey of the Journal-American. "Thomas E. Dewey will have something to say about that."

But it was others who had something to say. Dewey got back safely to find that he, a defeated candidate, had been invited to speak to the Gridiron Club in Washington while a half-dozen victorious governors were passed over. And then the public-opinion polls began coming in, with his name leading all the Republicans for President. He took the challenge, stumped the country against Roosevelt; and, you remember, that led up to his big defeat in the Republican convention of 1940.

The point in all these stories of defeat is this: Every time Thomas Dewey has taken a big beating, it has, sooner or later, turned into his biggest triumph yet.

Governor Dewey produces around himself a wide area of agreement, a small area of disagreement. In New York State, for instance, his program in social, economic and labor matters is simply a continuation and development of that which gave preceding governors the name of liberal. There have been some new twists and emphasis on improved administration. After 20 years of Democratic outcry over protecting the people's ownership of waterpower, Dewey started collecting rent for Niagara Falls.

A CLEAN-UP OF THE STATE

Ten years after the bank collapse and the New Deal produced bank-deposit insurance, Dewey shepherded the State's savings banks into the protective system for the first time. Dewey cleaned up a ring of scoundrels who for years had been permitted to prey on workmen's compensation at the expense of injured workers. Social welfare laws were liberalized.

Nurseries were established to care for children of women in war work. Decaying docks on the barge canal, found lying idle in the midst of war and costing $126,000 a year, were put to work. Unemployment insurance has been extended to cover all returning war veterans. A $163,000,000 cash surplus has been socked away to help care for post-war needs of returning troops.

Those are just a few of the things that have been done. Dewey has believed in this sort of progress for a long time, and so has nearly everybody else. But until he assumed leadership 6 years ago, there was a good deal of bickering over it, largely through force of habit. Back in Roosevelt's day, some Republican leaders would take the bait every time the Democrats wanted to pick a fight with them.

Ever since Dewey took titular leadership in 1938 he has had frequent conferences with Republican legislative leaders over the party program. When he has legislative proposals to make, he goes over his message with the leaders first, and in advance they iron out their points of difference. Strong men always do have differences, but though the conferences may take days, it usually is possible to agree. It was thus that New York obtained a reapportionment of legislative districts, overdue for nearly 20 years.

It has infuriated the left-wing journalists that the Governor hasn't turned out to be a reactionary whom they could attack every day, and they have been reduced to spreading insinuations again his sincerity. But everybody else seems to like it pretty well.

Conversation with Dewey tends to dwell on matters of agreement rather than controversial subjects. We have had plenty of differences of opinion, and probably will have more, but the funny thing is, I've been sitting here trying to think something we really disagree about, and I can't remember any, except—oh, yes; Roosevelt.

In 1940 I thought he went after the President a bit too hard. When he went campaigning that year, on the biggest venture of his life, I refused to join up. But it never interfered with our friendship. That's another thing about the man.

Governor Dewey always has the best men working for him that he can get, gives them full responsibility, and lets them develop in their jobs. He doesn't need to be told that the task of public leadership today is so vast, intricate, and varied that no man can be much better than the advice he considers in making up his mind, or more competent than the men he chooses to share his responsibilities. He would never leave mediocrity in his wake.

As district attorney, he gave New York better prosecution than it ever had before. The year after his retirement and again the second year, the work had improved still more. They are getting 97.7 percent convictions now. He had built an organization which had so much vitality that it kept on getting better after he had left. That's why he is important, and it all goes back to this ability to get people together.

None of the men around Dewey have ever been able to outwork the boss. But none of them have ever been quite able to give a good explanation why they work so hard—especially to their wives. I have yet to see the dervish's gleam in the eye of any Dewey man. They are utterly without fanaticism. But they seem united in a common passion for the good job well done.

They like their jobs and they like one another. One reason is that you are no more likely to find a quarrelsome person in the Dewey outfit than a hero-worshiper, a yes man, a backbiter, or an office politician. They respect one another's competence and opinions and if differences arise they get together and iron them out. Their responsibilities are so well defined that there is little occasion for jealousy. Dewey has sometimes picked the wrong man, but when that happened he was one of the first to find it out, and quietly corrected it.

A Dewey appointee has undivided responsibility but sometimes the interests of State departments conflict or overlap. The Governor has worked out a system of cabinet committees to take care of that. For instance, a program of occupational therapy and rehabilitation for institutional inmates is now being developed by the commissioners of correction, mental hygiene, social welfare, and purchase. The purchasing agent is in on this because the Dewey administration discovered that prisoners were getting industrial training with equipment most of which had been built back in the 1890s. New machinery is being bought, so that prisoners can be trained to return to the society of the 1940s.

You will be hearing plenty about Dewey and his men because it is impossible to draw a line between them. He has been getting the credit, all these years, for the good work done by loyal appointees. This works two ways. One reason they are loyal is that when somebody pulls a boner, Dewey takes the blame himself. He never had a whipping boy.

It's not my business to tell the Republicans whom to nominate. It's not my business to blow a horn for Dewey. I haven't been writing an inspirational piece. I haven't talked about issues. If the occasion arises, Dewey will state the issues and supply the inspiration.

He has always risen to every occasion in such fashion as to enhance the dignity and vitality of the position he holds. If he can get the people of this country to bury their little hatchets and pitch in together like his men in Albany, I can think of nothing that could be more inspiring either for the winning of the war or for the conquest of the challenging frontiers in America's industrial future.

I have here merely been trying to set forth simply one of the least conspicuous but most characteristic things about a remarkable man, which may be of importance at this time.

ASSET FOR THE PEACE TABLE

As we have been glad to rediscover, fighting well is a common American trait. The ability to bring people into agreement is much more rare. It is never so dramatic as a battle or a crusade. But it is a quality which, if exercised successfully on a large scale, can be very precious in the coming years.

On a local scale it means teamwork, efficiency, harmony in an organization. On a national scale, its successful practice may mean great political leadership, the reconciliation of group and sectional differences, the unity of a people. On a world scale, the man who creates agreement is a statesman. He produces peace.

The war will give a great solemnity to this election, conducted with our men on the beachheads.

Not long ago I flew home from England, filled with a momentous sense of the vastness of it all, and very soon went up to Albany to have dinner alone with Governor Dewey It was the day after Wisconsin counted its primary vote, and the newspapers were all saying he was going to be nominated. Having established themselves by electing governors in a majority of the States, the Republicans were asking him to become the head man.

For a long time before dinner we just sat there reading the evening newspapers, not saying anything. The papers had an item about another friend of mine. He had been shot down over Germany.

The Governor hadn't gone out hunting for this thing which was happening to him. When we had said goodbye months ago out by the vestibule (I to join a convoy, he to go to Mackinac), I had remarked, somewhat jocularly, "You know, it looks as though, before I get back, this breeze may be blowing up into a draft."

And he had turned very seriously and said, "I want to be reelected Governor in 1946; that's what I want."

Of course, there wasn't any doubt of that. Otherwise I wouldn't have been going away.

But in the intervening months, leaders from all parts of the country had been beating a path to that same door, seeking leadership. And now I could see that he was going to take command. Of course, there never could be any doubt of that. If the nomination came, no leader, if he was a leader, could refuse.

If fate will have it that I was dining that night with a future War President, I shall be hard to put to it in writing my memoirs; for I can't think of a single memorable phrase that either of us said. We talked largely in monosyllables and broken sentences. The so-and-sos had lost their baby. I had taken off a lot of surplus fat. The dog was grown up now.

We were both thinking of the same thing, of course. But there was no sense of elation, or even much surprise. People in the Dewey circle used to laugh about the Dewey luck. But not for a long time now. Instead, men have gone busily about the tasks in hand, with a dead-pan sense of fatalism, while events beyond anyone's control seemed to shape themselves in a certain inevitable way.

There was a task in hand that night. After dinner, Governor Dewey asked me to look over a speech which he had had in preparation for some weeks. This speech had nothing sensational about it. It set forth somewhat more explicitly than before the view that he had been expressing for a long time—the obvious fact that we must collaborate with our present allies after this war to keep the peace.

The only question was whether he should make the speech now. For some months he had been keeping his mouth shut. He had not gone out seeking or asserting national leadership. But still there was a great hullabaloo and worry over isolationism. He was getting a lot of free advice, of various kinds, from jittery people.

PLANKS FOR A FOREIGN POLICY

You will remember, he did speak to the publishers late in April. He proposed three fundamental principles of foreign policy:

"To carry on the war to total crushing victory, and in so doing drive home to the aggressor nations a lesson that will never be forgotten.

"To organize in cooperation with other nations a structure of peace backed by adequate force to prevent future wars.

"To establish and maintain in our relations with other nations conditions calculated to promote world-wide economic stability not only for the sake of the world but also to the end that our own people may enjoy a high level of employment in an increasingly prosperous world."

When that speech was made, you will remember, something suddenly happened in this country. Surface tension vanished, like a pricked soap bubble. America suddenly discovered that her people were together on a fundamental decision. Obviously they were going to try to get along with the rest of the world. And they were not going to cut one another's throats at home over the question whether they could agree with people abroad.

Dewey had pricked the bubble. Fundamentally America was agreed and relaxed. We were going to have international cooperation, certainly. And probably it would be Dewey on the first ballot.

Things had traveled a long way since that night, years ago, when I had thought Dewey was too persnickety over a petty detail.

"The trouble with you," I said, "is that you take yourself too damned seriously. However, I must admit—"

"I can read your mind," he interrupted me. "You are going to say that if I didn't take myself seriously, I wouldn't have been nominated for district attorney."

I agreed, "Exactly."

Watch this strange chemistry of bringing people into agreement. For the fundamental purpose of politics, the ultimate aim of popular government is not the clash and fury of conflict. It is getting people together. Governor Dewey never had to be told that. He has it in his bones.

Another $50,000,000 Year in Missouri River Floods

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, for 2 years hand-running, floods in the valley of Missouri River are causing direct damages in the neighborhood of $50,000,000. The total for the 2 years will exceed $100,000,000 which is one-fourth of what has been recommended by the Army engineers as needed in additional authorizations to put the Missouri River under control and end these flood damages for all time.

The total damage from this year's floods cannot be fully told at this time, because right now the second great flood of the year is taking lives, isolating towns, flooding half a million acres of crop land, tying up trains, sweeping out highways and imperiling war industries in many cities. A news report for June 16 placed the damage thus far this year at $44,000,000, taking the figures of the district engineer, which counts direct dollar damage only. And that does not take into account the emergency flood control funds the Congress has appropriated nor the relief funds that have been made available.

The damages from the 1943 floods were $47,000,000 and more than $3,000,000 were expended in emergency repair work which did not, as the Chief of Engineers has testified, and as the situation this year proves, give any additional protection.

The Chief of Engineers' testimony on this point was given in the hearings of the Appropriations Subcommittee for the War Department on the annual bill for Civil Functions of the War Department, as follows:

General REYBOLD. We had three serious floods on the Missouri River last year.

Mr. CASE. How much did it cost the Government to meet the emergency; that is, how much of the $1,000,000 fund augmented by the special $10,000,000 emergency fund did you find it necessary to spend on the Missouri?

General REYBOLD. A total of $3,014,000.

Mr. CASE. Will this work prevent similar floods in the future?

General REYBOLD. No, sir; this work will only afford the same degree of protection provided when the works were originally constructed. The fact that these levees were unable to withstand the recent floods is a definite indication that they are inadequate.

Mr. CASE. What did you find the damages to be in dollars?

General REYBOLD. The total damages in the basin due to 1943 floods are estimated at $47,383,000.

Mr. CASE. Does that figure include both direct and indirect damages?

General REYBOLD. That figure covers direct tangible damages only.

Mr. CASE. Did you determine what is needed to prevent such damages?

General REYBOLD. Yes, sir; we have made investigations of the entire basin which indicate definitely the additional measures needed.

So there is pending, Mr. Speaker, proposals of the Army engineers to stop these floods. It is embodied in House Document No. 475 of this Congress, approved in H. R. 4485, which passed this body on the 9th of May and is now pending in the other body. My comment on that bill has been given in the House and before the committees of both House and Senate dealing with the bill.

For the purpose of getting into the RECORD, however, a little history about the proposals and my interest in them, under permission granted by the House on April 1, 1944, I insert at this point the remarks I made at the sixth annual convention of the South Dakota Reclamation Association, held in Huron September 13, 1943, as reported in the records of the association:

Mr. SVENBY (presiding). Congressman CASE was elected Congressman from the Second District perhaps the driest years we have experienced in South Dakota and in my opinion he has already rendered an invaluable service to the State. He has worked in the interest of reclamation in Congress. It is with pleasure I introduce to you Congressman FRANCIS CASE.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman and friends, I have enjoyed the talks today. No one need to have expressed disappointment in a small attendance this morning. We have a large attendance this afternoon and after all, when you are working on things like reclamation you don't expect a mass meeting. You want people present who are definitely and specifically interested. They are here today. It has been said that the most resultful committee meeting ever held in South Dakota was one held in Yankton once, when out of a committee of five, two members were absent but the other three planned the first bridge across the Missouri River—the bridge at Yankton, and mapped the program that got it built. So when I look about here today and see that those here are builders, everyone, I am satisfied.

And here comes Scotty, with whom I rode to Casper, Wyoming in 1937 to attend the National Reclamation Convention, the session at which this South Dakota State Reclamation Association was born.

KARL MUNDT has given you a good picture of the water meetings up and down the Missouri valley and what they have accomplished I think I should mention to you a job of "unwatering" that Karl did down in Washington last winter. He educated the Lend-Lease officials and others on the possibilities of saving shipping space through dehydration. The space saved was equivalent to building a great many ships. That was done by taking water out of things; now he wants to do something by putting water into something—by putting it into dams, in fact. And it's what we all want to do. We want to store up water that is worse than wasted—flood water, and put into the growing of vegetables and crops that the country needs. That's reclamation.

A few years ago a book with a South Dakota setting, achieved considerable fame. The book was entitled "Giants in the Earth." It was a story of the people who settled eastern South Dakota, who battled the elements, the grasshoppers, the drought and the storms and established the communities we now enjoy. The people who came and conquered were called "Giants". They met the challenge of their day and won.

All of us here in one way or another, have had our own education in South Dakota's water problems. Mine came in the drought of 1910. I had been born in Iowa and knew little about farming or homesteading when we came to South Dakota in 1909. The next spring, however, I helped Dad establish residence on the homestead. I remember the day we set up our tent and prepared to build a house. First, we planned to drill a well for water. It was all new to me. I was the cook. We had brought some water from town; it went fast the first night and then I learned I would have to practice a little water conservation. Dad and the carpenter claimed afterward that I made the coffee out of the water in which I had cooked weiners and then used the left-over coffee for washing dishes. That summer and the next, however, I learned even more about water conservation. We drilled 3 different wells trying to keep enough water for the house in 1910 and 1911 and wound up by driving stock several miles to the ponds of a creek that stopped flowing, and hauling water in barrels on a stone boat. Those years, 1910 and 1911, gave me an early education in South Dakota's greatest economic problem—water. I have never forgotten it.

What was the story Mr. Eberle told us today? A story of a State crippled by lack of water in the 30's. Between 1930 and 1940 we lost 1 person out of every 14 in this State. The reason was drought, a lack of water. Yet if we could store up the water when it comes and when we have it, to use when it does not come and when we need it, South Dakota would grow in population.

The water problem is being attacked in many ways. I see Ross Davies here. His people, the Soil Conservation people, are really water-conservation people. They preach and practice contour plowing, building of check dams and storage dams. Since 1930 over 20,000 stock water dams have been built in the western part of the State, under the range program. That kind of water conservation should not be overlooked when we talk about reclamation. I used to carry this slogan in my editorial column: "A dam, some trees, and an irrigated garden for every farm in western South Dakota." Hundreds of ranchers and ranchers' wives have them today—not because I talked about them, but because some of our hard-working people got busy and built them.

We have in South Dakota one major reclamation project, the Belle Fourche, built under the general reclamation law. That is the program under which the water users are expected to repay in 40 or 50 years the entire cost of a project, except interest on the money. The original reclamation fund was established by the proceeds from the sale of public lands. After the experiences of 1934 and 1936 it was apparent that we needed more reclamation projects and it was also apparent that on some streams the water users could not be expected to pay back the entire cost of the dams and the canals. At the same time, the Federal Government was spending millions and millions of dollars in an effort to relieve the distress caused by the drought. So we worked out a program to put the relief money to work in building reclamation projects and get double duty from the relief dollars. We proposed a program which could use the water from streams of intermittent flow. Most of our rivers in western South Dakota are of that sort, as they are throughout the Great Plains States. They carry a lot of water when we can't use it and very little when we need it most.

So we worked out, and Congress approved, a type of project for the Great Plains, officially known as the Water Utility and Conservation Act but more commonly called the Wheeler-Case Act. A large number of Wheeler-Case projects are now under construction throughout the West, and more would be had it not been for the war. In our State the Deerfield unit of the Rapid Valley project is being constructed as one of these projects, and an allotment of more than $4,000,000 was made for the Angostura which would have been under construction had the war not come when it did. Over 18,000 acres were bought for the Angostura project, however, and we are hoping that it will be among the first undertaken after the war. The Angostura is on the Cheyenne, below Hot Springs.

Two other Wheeler-Case projects have been proposed in South Dakota and definite progress has been made in preparation for them. I refer to the surveys and studies of the combined Shadehill and Blue Horse project on the Grand River and the Thunder Butte-Green Grass project on the Moreau. The engineering studies have gone far enough on both of these to permit consideration for construction. Both are badly needed. In 1934 I saw horses on the Cheyenne River Indian Reservation stagger to the Missouri River to get a drink and getting it, lie down—too weak to rise again. A good project can be built on the Moreau, through the heart of this reservation, providing water for 23,000 acres strung along in little pockets and giving a small but steady flow for livestock, the entire distance from the dam to the mouth of the stream. The Grand River project is similar. Both of them are badly needed.

And when I mention these I am not overlooking what can and should be done on the Bad and the White Rivers.

It may be that all of these will have to be worked out individually, but personally I am hoping that they can be tied in with the Missouri River program, about which we have been hearing a great deal and about which I want to talk in more detail at this time.

As you know the Army Engineers have been studying the Missouri River off and on for a great many years. For the past 3 years they have been charged with making a report on certain resolutions adopted by the House committees dealing with rivers and harbors. Last spring the Committee on Flood Control, shocked by the disasters caused by the Missouri's two big floods, adopted a resolution calling for a comprehensive program of flood control. As a matter of fact, the Army engineers had been working on the problem and a resolution was adopted in a form which would bring together the several problems they had been studying and permit the filing of a comprehensive report. That report was prepared and is now in Washington; Colonel Pick, the division engineer, having filed it with the Chief of Engineers on the 23d of August.

Colonel Pick has put his soul into that report. Last winter, a month or more before the flood—in fact, between Christmas and New Year's, at an informal dinner in Rapid City, Colonel Pick told a group of us that he saw the next quarter of a century as the time for the development of the Missouri Valley. He reminded us that the Missouri was the one great and the last great undeveloped river basin in the United States. Later he told me of his determination to propose a development of the river that was to affect the economy of the entire Northwest. He came to Washington, got the approval of the Chief of Engineers and started on his work. That was all before the floods came along and made his work perfectly timed.

The Pick report has not been released for publication and cannot be until it is transmitted to Congress. Before it is transmitted it must be passed upon by the Board of Engineers and commented upon by several Federal agencies, including the Bureau of Reclamation. Members of Congress, however, are permitted to examine the report; so I asked my secretary to examine it the other day and send a digest of the report, which I have here and will now review for you briefly. (Reads from notes.)

So you see that there is now in Washington for the first time in history, a concrete proposal, a favorable report on a plan of development for the Missouri Valley, a program of flood control by the building of some huge reservoirs, multiple-purpose reservoirs that will provide water for irrigation, hydroelectric power, recreation, and navigation. The report does not propose to authorize all the development works at this time, but it does propose the building of the reservoirs and the payment for them by the Federal Government as a matter of flood control, which is thoroughly in keeping with the established and authorized policy of flood control for the country. The program, if adopted, would mean the building of the reservoirs upon which every plan for water utilization must be bottomed.

Once, many years ago, Senator Norbeck said to me that if I ever expected to get the Angostura project built, I would have to find some way to get the dam built and paid for without having its cost charged into the cost of irrigation to be repaid by the farmers. The Pick proposals for the Missouri River are in keeping with that idea. They offer a chance to get the dams on the Missouri built for and charged off to flood control; but being built to utilize the water for all the many beneficent purposes to which the water can be put. And, personally I am hoping that some of the storage will be placed on the tributary streams.

Those purposes, the picture of a great Missouri Valley development, were first painted publicly in a comprehensive way, I believe, by Mr. W. G. Sloan, of the Bureau of Reclamation, in a meeting of this association at Belle Fourche 2 years ago. He had the vision—he has the vision of what can be done with stored water—and since he is to follow me on this program, I am not going to trespass on the possible scope of his remarks to say more on that score. I do want, however, to give him credit for a vision and a knowledge of what can be done with the Missouri's wasted water. I recall saying 2 years ago that despite all that was going on at the State fair at Huron that day and at some other much-advertised event, that the greatest thing that happened in South Dakota that day was Glen Sloan's talk in Belle Fourche.

Back in 1936, I believe it was, I wrote a letter to one of the State's daily newspapers in which I spoke of the Missouri River as the State's greatest undeveloped resource. The thought was not original with me. Many men here and many not here had said that before, and had given months of their time to its study.

Today, however, we are in the position of having two great agencies of the Federal Government, the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation, joining with us and saying that the Missouri River should be harnessed, that its wasted waters should be put to work and changed from instruments of destruction into mighty agents of good. We can do this in our day. We should get our plans ready to provide jobs for the returning soldiers; we should create in the Missouri Valley, the homes and the opportunities they are fighting for. If we do our part, if we convert flood waters into irrigation waters, if we reclaim this good earth of ours in South Dakota and conquer both flood and drought, some later-day author will write another book about today's Giants in the Earth.

Address Before Pioneers of Todd Co.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. O'BRIEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at a banquet given by Pioneers of the Todd Co., of Rochester, N. Y., at the William Mann branch of the Todd Co., in Philadelphia, June 15, 1944:

Ladies and gentlemen, may I grasp this opportunity to inform you employees of the William Mann Co., now known as the division of Todd & Co., that I considered myself singularly privileged when I was asked to attend the dinner here this evening. I fully appreciate the splendid contributions you people have made to the war effort and the unusual significance attached to our gathering is so obvious that lengthy comment on my part is entirely uncalled for. By virtue of the fact that you are conspicuously identified with the Todd Co., of Rochester, N. Y., I thought it would be fitting and appropriate if I would give you some idea of the companies' background and of the achievements of the founders of the company, namely, Mr. G. W. Todd and Mr. L. M. Todd. You all know that it was through the efforts of these two outstanding American gentlemen that the Todd Co. was founded in the year of 1899. At this point I might state that Mr. George Todd had previous to 1899 engaged in several business enterprises throughout the then known part of the country as the "wild and wooly West." G. W., as he was affectionately known to all his friends in Rochester and throughout the country, was born on February 29, 1860, and as you read the biographical sketches of his life one is thoroughly impressed because of his rugged physique and determination and his tremendous capacity for work. G. W. was a man of vision and I state emphatically that those qualities have been handed down to his two sons, namely, Walter Todd, the head of the Todd Co., and George Todd, his brother and very able assistant. I have known Walter Todd for the past 25 years and realize his profound modesty. No one has ever heard him or his brother extoll the virtues of their Dad only in a quiet and private manner, therefore, I am going to do it.

In 1899 began the romance of the Todd Co., a romance comparable to the opening and settling of the West. I wish to state that in all of G. W.'s undertakings he was ably assisted by his brother for whom he had a great affection, also known in the City of Rochester as L. M. Todd. The Todds met with unusual success in the making of their checkwriter, and it was through the efforts of G. W. at a convention of the American Bankers Association at Richmond, Va., that he sold the idea he had perfected a machine that would frustrate counterfeiting, which was flourishing throughout the country during that period.

In 1905 the G. W. Todd & Co. moved to their own factory on West Main Street. The business grew rapidly and in 1909 they were forced to construct a new and bigger plant at 1155 University Avenue, where they are now located. We will all admit it is a long road from a woodshed and 100-machine annual output to 2 large factories and an organization of 5,000 people—that is romance, that is determination, that is vision.

G. W. Todd was born in New York State but during his travels through the middle west he helped build the town of Gettysburg, S. Dak., and it was in this town that Walter Todd, the present president of the company, was born. In 1915 G. W. became the president of the Rochester Chamber of Commerce and during his administration a splendid chamber of commerce building was constructed. G. W. was instrumental in having Mr. George Eastman exert his generosity in the direction of its construction and at the present time we have possibly one of the finest chamber of commerce buildings in the United States for a city of its size. G. W. Todd and George Eastman were very close friends and remained very intimate until Mr. Eastman's death. It was G. W. Todd who in 1918 conceived the idea and formed the Community War Chest, this was one of the first if not the first Community Chest, of this kind in the United States and it is certain that today it is by far the most successful. The Community Chest of Rochester, through the people of Rochester, has contributed more than $39,000,000 to the various agencies—now totaling 62 which benefit from these funds.

I know it will be most interesting to the men of the William Mann Co. division of the Todd Co., to know that George Todd was directly responsible for the present location of the University of Rochester. G. W. worked with the Rockefeller Foundation, and let it be known that the university was to have a medical school as part of the program. Consequently G. W. was instrumental in getting a substantial contribution from this organization for the University of Rochester. It took years of untiring effort on his part, but under his leadership it reached and exceeded all expectations. No man in the city of Rochester ever gave so much of his own personal life to public welfare and community effort and asked nothing in return.

Mr. Todd's philosophy was not, "how much can I make" but "how much can I give." He labored for the people of the community and because of his numerous activities this necessarily placed a tremendous strain on his physical strength and as a consequence his health was affected to such an extent that he never regained it fully.

In appreciation of the work he did for the University of Rochester one of the principal buildings at the university is named the George W. Todd Union. Further evidence of his interests in education are his generous contributions to Cornell University and the endowment of the chair of chemistry, now held by one of the country's leading scientists, who last year won the prize awarded annually for the greatest achievement in chemical science.

He was director of the Eastman School of Music and also a director of the Eastman Kodak Co., the Stromberg-Carlson Co., and the Rochester Capital Corporation. One would naturally conclude a man of national importance, yes, of international repute, would be so busy that he could give very little attention to the personal welfare and individual needs of his employees, but the contrary is true. He did that and did it well. G. W. and L. M. were men of forward-looking character; they pioneered in making group insurance available to all of their employees. They were the first company in Rochester to adopt the 5-day week and second to adopt the 13-month calendar.

I have said that L. M. Todd was a close partner in all things with his brother, G. W. Their interests were different to some extent, nevertheless their objectives were the same.

I would feel as though I would be doing a great injustice to you and members of the Todd Co. if I were to neglect to mention the name of Charles Tiefel, now deceased, and also the name of Walter Payne, who is now chief designer of machine products.

L. M. Todd was trustee of several Rochester banks and director of the Rochester Gas & Electric Co., and always interested himself in civic affairs to the same extent as his brother, G. W.

I have touched briefly concerning the founding of the Todd Co. and have only scratched the surface in mentioning a few of the accomplishments of G. W. and L. M. Todd, and, regardless of Walter's profound and sincere modesty, let me give you some high lights concerning him.

Walter is a trustee of Cornell University, a director of the Rochester Gas & Electric Corporation, treasurer of the Rochester Chamber of Commerce, a trustee of the Rochester Savings Bank, a director of the Security Trust Co., and a member of the executive committee of the Industrial Management Council. These are just a few organizations with which Walter is identified. Walter is a true philanthropist, generous and kind; above all, the president of your company is sincere, honest, loyal, and patriotic. He is soft-spoken and has a conscientious regard for all those with whom he comes in contact and is held in the highest esteem by every employee of the Todd Co. Walter is a true friend and is referred to by all who know him as one swell fellow.

George, the executive vice president, is a director of the Lincoln-Alliance Bank & Trust Co. and of the Stromberg-Carlson Co., member of the board of the Rochester Civic Music Association, member of the board of the Hochstein School of Music, a director of the Council of Social Agencies, a member of the executive board of the National Council, Boy Scouts of America.

Both of these gentlemen are active in community chest work. In their plant every modern plan involving employees' welfare is in effect. Again I might mention the Todd Co. has group insurance, pension plan for those who have been employees 10 years or more. All employees, both factory and office, are given paid vacations, based upon the length of service—and here is a startling fact, the Todd pioneers, composed of people who have been with the company 25 years or more, now number 136.

May I respectfully call to your attention this evening that effective leadership has been a major factor in the success of the Todd industrial organization, and efficient workmen must know that by hard work and diligence and through personal initiative they can obtain good results and become a supervisor or foreman. They must also know how to handle people and obtain from them maximum efficiency while at the same time maintain amiable relationship. The Todd Co. is now devoting all its energies to war production. The company is making a camera for the Navy which, according to reports obtained by me, has astonished the Navy personnel and at the same time directly complimented your organization because up until the present time there have been no reports of any mechanical failures. True, trained technicians are playing a significant role in the production of war materials, and the Todd technicians and employees are no exception in maintaining the high standard of equipment produced by your company. Enthusiasm in the Todd Co. is demonstrated by your ability to produce and render services which cannot be computed on a cold, hard basis of dollars and cents.

Money can not win this war. Money, of course is absolutely essential, in fact it is imperative, but we must convert money into equipment and place that equipment in the hands of our well trained military forces. Then and only then, having these instruments of war effectively used by well trained men, can we be victorious. Victory, I hope will be in the very near future. This will be accomplished because those who produce on the home front will patriotically supply those gallantly fighting on the war front. Our American determination and our great fighting and productive powers will make possible the all out victory and unconditional surrender, a reality. In closing, I wish to salute the American working men and women for their glorious achievements at this critical time. The dictators thought it would be impossible for us to out-produce them. Yes; we have out-produced them and we are now out-fighting them. We are fighting to preserve our ideals and traditions and every red-blooded, hard-hitting, patriotic American who appreciates the privileges of our great Republic can thank divine providence for all the blessings and benefits we have received in this great country.

Remember, my friends—this is your country, this is my country, above all it is God's country and we intend to keep it such.

It Depends on You and Me

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Judge Marvin Jones, War Food Administrator, before the Massachusetts Retail Grocers Association, Boston, Mass., on Sunday evening, June 11, 1944:

In time of crisis such as our Nation faces today, it is instinctive to turn to those basic fundamentals of our national character that have seen us through other crises in the past. It is a time to rededicate our national consciousness to some of those first principles that have made our country great.

It is especially appropriate to think of these principles today here in Massachusetts where so much of the foundation of our national way of life was laid so long ago.

Out of the Mayflower Compact and the town meetings of New England the principle of democracy took root on this continent 300 years ago. In that early time the actual practice of democracy in action was not ideal. In the town meetings some of the harder-fisted individuals and the more vocal citizens had their say, and there were those who suffered from local inequities. The practice of democracy was not ideal, but it was the reliance of that day, and it was the root from which our system of government stems today and has flourished through the years. It is our reliance still. It is our hope today.

The basic principles of democracy in the hands of a people who have made it work for two centuries of amazing progress results now in a dynamic force, which we know as democracy in action, against which no other force can long prevail. While those principles survive, so will the Nation which rests on them survive. And the further the Axis or any other group strays from those principles to oppose us, the more certain is their defeat.

On these principles our people have acted through many crises in the past. It was the people themselves who sponsored the famous tea party here nearly 175 years ago. It was the embattled farmers of Lexington who fired the shot heard 'round the world. It was the people who have guarded this principle through the years who have met all our national crises and have seen us safely through them.

It was the sons of Lexington and Bunker Hill who acted on this principle and plowed the Boston Common and planted it to Victory gardens last spring.

It was this same principle which caused the grocerymen and food retailers, represented by this group here today, to write their splendid record of results in connection with the recent no-point-low-point food program. Our reports show that in this important Nation-wide effort to conserve our food supply, to prevent waste and to make the best use of all our food resources in the emergency, by encouraging housewives to use those foods that are most plentiful, New England did an outstanding job. This program of marketing abundant foods has been highly successful. It has been successful largely because of the efforts of the food retailers represented here today.

We, in the Government, are frank to admit, because we fully realize it, that in the many war programs of this kind we in Washington can do but little—while the minutemen on whom the burden really falls, and on whom the success or failure ultimately depends, are those like you here today—the people of every village and farm. We in Washington can read the messages that flash like the signal lanterns in the old North Church and we can point the way. And fortunately we can do this with all the assurance that Paul Revere had that the people can be depended upon to do the rest.

"For, borne on the night-wind of the past,
Through all our history, to the last,
In the hour of darkness and peril and need,
The people will waken and listen to hear
The hurrying hoof-beats of that steed,
And the midnight message of Paul Revere."

The Government can plan general food programs and the broad allocations of food to our armed forces, to our civilians, to our allies, and to the liberated areas, and we can outline some of the rules to bring about the fairest distribution for all, but the job does not end there. The American housewife who buys the three-fourths of all of our enormous food supply which our civilians consume depends on her grocer and butcher for much of her first-hand information.

That makes the nation's food dealer responsible for selling across his counter today not only food but also the Nation's food program itself to the 30,000,000 housewives.

It is the grocer's job today to help the housewife understand why she should conserve foods that are plentiful, why she should use those foods in greatest abundance, how this prevents waste, and how she can cooperate in many other ways. The grocer who does this fully and fairly and objectively is supporting his sons and his neighbors' sons in the fox holes and on the battlefields; the grocer who fails to do this fairly is not fully aware of his obligation and is weighing his responsibility with a heavy thumb.

The grocer is the quartermaster officer who is responsible for our enormous civilian food supply. The Nation's grocers handle three times as much food in a year as all the food for our armed forces and lend-lease combined. It is a serious and a sobering responsibility.

To meet this responsibility the Natich's grocers have done their best. They have adjusted their operations in many ways. They have economized on manpower and materials. They have drastically curtailed home deliveries, and have done away with unnecessary wrapping of parcels and nonessential promotional efforts. They have changed their hours so that women war workers can buy their groceries in the evening.

They have shouldered the added work of handling food coupons. They have met the difficulties if irregular deliveries of supplies to them, and, finally, they have done all this while hiring and training inexperienced help. The list of their achievements is too long to detail here.

Because of this splendid showing which you as food dealers have made, both individually and through your associations, we in the War Food Administration will continue to depend on you as we have in the past.

While we are discussing problems, it is a paradox of war that occasional surpluses of certain foods can prove to be nearly as difficult to meet successfully as the problem of short supply. In our all-out effort for production, with all the uncertainties of weather and of war, there are bound to be occasional oversupplies of some foods sometimes.

The only way to be sure to have enough is sometimes to have too much. The problem is to handle these occasional abundances so that waste is avoided, and also so that the farmer has a market that will encourage him to continue to produce. That problem will continue so long as we have war and so long as we are straining every effort to have enough.

Our whole food program, including support prices adjusted for various products in order to secure the desired balance to meet the demands, has stimulated our national food production to record levels. This has worked because of the untiring efforts and patriotism and genius of the American farmer and his family. The combination has resulted in a food-production accomplishment which we would not have thought possible a few years ago. It is natural that this tremendous production power cannot be turned on and off like a faucet and controlled so exactly that there are never any shortages and never any surpluses of particular foods. In this connection I want to go on record and say that in time of war I would rather be accused of missing the mark by occasionally having too much of some foods than too little. I believe we can all agree on that.

Let me mention one example to show how difficult is the task of balancing food supply with demand when we have the uncertainties of weather and other factors on the production side, and on the demand side the many unpredictables that are inherent in war. For example, this year the Government requires 86,000,000 cases of the major canned vegetables, which is more than 70 percent more than were asked for last year. Thus, if our civilian supply is to be adequate, it will be necessary for producers, processors, victory gardeners, and housewives with their canning to continue their outstanding effort. I mention this to illustrate the tremendous adjustments that must be made continuously to cope with the tremendous propositions and the swift tempo of war. I suggest that in these circumstances only a magician could maintain perfect balance between food supply and demand.

In connection with these temporary surpluses of some foods, let me sound a solemn warning. A food supply is a continuous thing. Food begins to disappear the moment it is produced. You cannot eat a record. We cannot supply our future enormous demands for food with current and past supplies. The temporary and local abundances of some foods which we are fortunate to enjoy now are the direct result of the fact that our farmers produced it, and our distribution programs conserved it—and that many more of the unknowns such as weather and other factors operated in our favor than in our disfavor. But we can't always depend on that. The only way, then, to insure this same fortunate position for next year is to continue all our efforts for maximum production and efficient distribution.

This means more Victory gardens than we had last year. Last year 20,000,000 victory gardens produced 8,000,000 tons of food. They helped to make it possible to remove point values recently placed on canned vegetables This year it is vitally important that we produce ever more food in victory gardens. The question of next year's food situation is being answered now.

We cannot afford to live in a fool's paradise in the midst of a temporary abundance of some foods that is more apparent than real.

I want to make one other statement about our large supply of food. Sometimes the Government agencies have more of one food or another than is needed. It is important to release these foods whenever it can safely be done. We have already resold canned goods to the trade for resale to civilians. We constantly review our inventories and release these stocks when they are not needed for known requirements. We are as careful as we can be in regard to stockpiling food so that we can come out as even as possible at the end of the war. That means matching our buying as closely as possible with our changing needs. But we know it is also part of our job to plan, as best we can now, for an orderly and practical release of stocks on hand when the fighting is over. We want to avoid the food dumping and disruptive trade which happened after the other war.

I believe that these post-war stocks can be handled best by reselling for distribution through the regularly established channels. Let me assure you here today that we will attempt to handle these operations through the established trade channels as fully as possible and with the least disruption to normal wholesale and retail markets.

In war or peace we know that the people themselves are the Nation's final reliance. That principle, established so many years ago, has become firmer through the years as actions by the people have dramatized it in times of crisis. The plowing of the Boston Common is simply a modern version of the historic stand at Lexington. And when Paul Revere galloped down the moonlit road from Boston, he carried, not simply the current message of that night, but he carried the principle of the strength of united action by the people. And he became something more than simply a dramatic figure in history—he became a symbol to which his countrymen have turned through the centuries for their faith and inspiration.

Keynote Speech at the Indiana Democratic State Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. RAY J. MADDEN

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following keynote speech delivered by me at the Indiana Democratic State convention, held at Indianapolis, Ind., on June 16, 1944:

Mr. Chairman, honored guests, delegates, ladies, and gentlemen: Indiana democracy is meeting today in convention for the second time since our Nation has been under the sadness and sorrow of World War No. 2. Great and historic events have taken place since we gathered here 2 years ago. At that time, the future of world liberty was hanging in the balance but through the indomitable courage of our fighting men and spirit of our people, today we can see victory on the horizon.

The eyes of America are riveted on every headline that brings news of the progress our heroes are making on the shores of France and in every other battle area of this war. Every heart is beating in unison and sympathy with the spirit and valor of our brave boys who are fighting to preserve our freedom. Our prayers are offered daily with the hope of an early victory and safe return of our loved ones. Our war aims are clear-cut and definite. Until the end, we must fight fire with fire until mass murder, mass brutality, and tyranny are no longer a threat to our freedom. Our Commander in Chief has told us that the price will be heavy and the way long and hard.

We are gathered here today to adopt a platform, select nominees and carry out duties which our Constitution imposes upon us as citizens. We should realize in our deliberation that there are two gigantic problems facing the American people today:

No. 1. Our most important duty is to bring about the rapid winning of this terrible war so that our men and women who are in their country's uniform can return home to their firesides where they may again enjoy life's peaceful pursuits.

No. 2. To prepare now for our post-war problems and to bring about an understanding and agreement between nations which will assure permanent peace to all mankind.

The election to be held on the 7th day of November will be the most important referendum in the history of our Nation. The men who head our National Government in the next 4 years will decide the destiny of America and the world for generations to come. The outcome of this election will determine whether the children or the grandchildren of the boys who today are on the beachheads of France and Italy, or in the South Pacific will be called upon to engage in another bloody world conflagration 25 years hence.

It is highly practical and necessary that the people of Indiana devote considerable study to the qualifications, experience, and past records of the officials upon whom they impose this solemn responsibility.

LEST WE FORGET

I believe it is proper on this day for us to briefly refresh our minds on a few of the accomplishments which are outstanding in the record of the Democratic Party during the past 11 years. On the 4th day of March 1933 a man of destiny became the President of the United States. The greatest economic crisis in the history of the Nation had our people in its grasp on that fateful day. Every man who labors for a living will retain that date indelibly in his mind because over 13,000,000 of his brothers were walking the streets and highways of this country looking for work.

Every farmer in Indiana and in America should remember 1931 and 1932, because their farms were being foreclosed by the thousands; corn was 15 cents a bushel; wheat, cattle, and other products were at rock-bottom prices. Some farmers were traveling the highways in trucks with pitchforks and ropes, defying sheriffs and threatening to hang the judges of our courts. The life's savings of our people were being wiped out overnight, and both the large and small businessman was bankrupt and despondent.

How proud I was on that inauguration day to hear this man of destiny say that he realized the plight of the common man and was going to do something about it. How proud I was that he was a Democrat when he promised to banish the disciples of special privilege and plunder and drive the money changers from the temples—the money changers who, under Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, had exploited the farmer, the laboring man and the small businessman of America for the special privilege of a few, and the oppression of the many. We all remember that fear clutched at the very heart and soul of this Nation. Communism and revolution were knocking at the door of America. It was at that hour that our Government was saved from communism and internal destruction by the Democratic Party under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

RECORD OF PROGRESS

Let us briefly review this great record of progress:

Through weak banking and security laws during the 1920's, unscrupulous promoters were robbing and plundering the American public. The Democratic Congress passed legislation, for the first time in our history, to protect and guarantee the savings of the public

The Securities and Exchange Commission was created to protect small stockholders against the bold and merciless Wall Street manipulator.

I will not take up the time of this convention by enumerating the numerous other progressive enactments similar to the home owners' loan, unemployment and old-age insurance, rural electrification, etc.

AGRICULTURE

The farmers of Indiana should not forget the total neglect of their interests during the long Republican years from 1921 to 1932. No other administration has done so much toward the economic strengthening of agriculture and particularly the small and medium sized farmer. The farmer should also reflect back to a former Democratic administration when Woodrow Wilson, against the bitter opposition of Republicans in Congress, passed the Federal Farm Loan Act. This act freed the farmer from the grasp of the financial buzzards and released him from paying a high interest and bonuses on mortgage renewals which in some instances went as high as 20 percent.

Our agricultural workers should not forget that under Republican rule from 1921 to 1932 annual farm income dropped from eleven billion to three billion. The farmers of America can thank the Democratic Party for the progressive farm legislation on the statute books today.

LABOR

For months Republican politicians and subsidized radio commentators have been trying to scare the voters—with the bugaboo of regimentation and communism. The greatest antidote against communism is employment, good wages, and security for the family. The Democratic Party has been the greatest barrier in America to protect us against the onslaught of communism.

Another red herring the Republican leaders are dragging over the political trail is the complaint that the labor organizations are organizing to inform their members what is going on in their Government. The real investigation should be centered on the stupendous slush fund which is now being gathered by the Republican leaders for this fall campaign.

Preliminary indications point to the fact that the Republican politicians, both State and National, will this year have a campaign slush fund which will make the money barrel of the Mark Hanna days and the millions Will Hays spent in 1920 look like chicken feed. The Democratic National Committee and the Democratic State committee must exert every effort when this campaign gets under way to prevent this reckless attempt to corrupt our electorate. These forces are trying to drive a wedge of political hatred and bitterness between organized labor and the farmers of America. The progress and welfare of the American farmer and the American consumer is interdependent. Prosperity for one means prosperity for the other.

The Wagner Act, which is labor's first bill of rights, was passed by this Democratic administration to protect our workers, and this legislation, more than anything else, has made America the industrial giant of the world. The Smith-Connally antilabor bill, which was enacted last year, has been responsible for most of the industrial unrest which we have experienced in the last 6 months. Man-hours lost by strikes since Pearl Harbor have been less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the total man hours. There is an element in our Congress which continually asks for legislation which would shackle the progress of American labor and rob it of its gains. It is indeed unfortunate that the great majority of Republican Representatives in the House and Senate have been giving their support and vote to this group. This same group combined their votes against the legislation which would have given our soldiers overseas an opportunity to cast a Federal ballot in the coming election. Since Pearl Harbor, the accomplishments of American industry and labor have been nothing short of a miracle.

INDIANA DEMOCRATIC LEADERS

Hoosier voters this fall should call to mind the deeds of some of our great Indiana statesmen like Marshall, Ralston, and Vay Nuys of former years, McNutt, Townsend, Minton, Schricker, and Sam Jackson of today. It is leaders of this type that Indiana and the Nation needs in this dark hour and crisis. People of Indiana must realize it is not only their solemn duty to inform themselves as to State issues and elect an outstanding Governor and State ticket but also to send to Washington a Congress which will uphold the hand of our Commander in Chief to bring about a rapid victory and a permanent peace. Our Governor especially should be complimented for the foresight and sound judgment he exercised in replacing our esteemed and beloved late Senator Van Nuys with an outstanding Democrat and statesman of the caliber of SAM JACKSON.

Our State has been fortunate in having as its Governor during these trying times a leader and statesman of outstanding quality whose common sense, good judgment, and a spirit of justice have made him beloved by all. Indiana can ill afford to lose the services of this brilliant, honest, and sincere public official, and I have no hesitancy in predicting that this convention will nominate him, and this fall the voters of Indiana will send Henry Schricker to the United States Senate.

Americans everywhere must guard against overconfidence and against becoming victims of well-organized propaganda which will destroy our unity. Selfish and misguided influences are at work not only in Washington but throughout the country in an effort to divide our people by arousing political bitterness, religious prejudices, and economic turmoil.

INDIANA REPUBLICAN LEADERS

The people of Indiana, regardless of party, were shocked and humiliated when they read the news items exposing the manipulations of Republican leaders who secured control of the party 2 weeks ago. Cherishing as we have since the days of Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson the two-party system for selecting our public officials through democratic processes, we deeply deplore the rape of the Republican Party committed at the recent State convention by sinister individuals.

We, in common with all citizens who take pride in the traditions and accomplishments of our great State, condemn as an affront to good government the reversion to Ku Klux Klan tactics employed by the so-called leaders of the Republican Party, who seek, by resurrecting bigotry and intolerance, to rise to positions of power in our national and State government. We had hoped that those methods which once bred scandal after scandal and which had been overwhelming and repeatedly repudiated by the people, had been buried forever.

We have heard with growing alarm and concern for the future of our democratic institutions the charge made by our Republican brethren that an unconscionable amount of money was used before and during the Republican State convention in the interest of the nominee for United States Senator. We look upon the office of Senator of the United States as one that should and must be free of taint and suspicion and hope that the great State of Indiana need not face the prospect of again bowing its head in shame because men selected for high places had followed false ideologies.

HOME FRONT

Ninety percent of the trouble, grief, and criticism which our President has endured on the home front war program has been caused by his desire to carry out his promise that there will be no war profiteers or blood millionaires created by World War No. 2. His policy of price control has kept down the cost of living and has saved us from runaway inflation. Two years ago, over 60 new Republican Congressmen were elected, largely through their party's program of creating bitterness and dissatisfaction against rationing and price-control regulations. The Bureau of Labor Statistics recently released the following information: "Between March 1943 and March 1944, the cost of living index increased less than 1 percent." This week when the price-control legislation was up in Congress for renewal, a number of Republican Members who last year fought this necessary war measure, reversed themselves and voted for price control. Could it be that victories at special elections and primaries are convincing them that the President was right?

Uncontrolled inflation would be almost as disastrous as the losing of the war. When the history of this war is written, the American people will know that the stupendous task of home front planning was as important as the military strategy on the field of battle. Thirteen million soldiers, sailors, and marines on the battle fronts of the world require food, clothing, weapons, ammunition, medicine, doctors, nurses, shelter, and a hundred other essentials. Thousands of ships, planes, tanks, trucks, and so forth have been built and sent in all directions. Millions of gallons of gas and oil have been shipped to operate this equipment. We have accomplished more in 2½ years than the Japs have in 35 years and the Nazis in 15 years.

Somebody had to ration; somebody had to curtail; somebody had to sacrifice; somebody had to regulate prices; somebody had to prevent inflation; somebody had to regiment; somebody had to take the selfish criticism of partisan newspapers and subsidized radio commentators. America and the world today can thank God that the Commander of the Ship of State during our darkest and most critical hour has been Franklin D. Roosevelt.

MEN OF DESTINY

Destiny has always provided America with great leaders at the time of its greatest need. Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Wilson were given to the American people by divine providence to save and perpetuate this great free Government. In 1933 our President guided and lifted us from our greatest economic depression. In 1937, he warned our country against the coming onslaught of the tyrants and dictators. History will record that his foresight and preparation saved the world from slavery.

On that Sabbath morning, December 7, 1941, when the radio waves carried the news of the Jap's violent and malicious attack, we were unprepared for war both from a military and naval standpoint. Immediately, political differences disappeared and we became united overnight.

SMALL NATIONS

A number of opposition newspapers and politicians are now endeavoring to create political capital and disunity by agitating at this time the future internal problems of the smaller countries of Europe. These same obstructionists contended up until the very hour of Pearl Harbor that America could not be attacked. Twenty-four years ago our present Commander in Chief was working side by side with Woodrow Wilson to effect the same principles as were later outlined in the Atlantic Charter. After victory, America will guarantee justice to smaller nations. Agitators are more interested in winning an election than winning the war.

FUTURE PEACE

General Arnold has said that no country on the globe is farther away than 60 hours by airplane. Sixteen years ago it took 33 hours to cross the Atlantic. Today, bombers fly in one-fourth of that time. Twenty-five years from now we will fly to Europe in 4 or 5 hours. Today, words spoken into a microphone can circle the earth in a fraction of a second. This fact should bring to our attention that we are no longer an isolated nation. These great accomplishments of modern invention and science should serve notice upon the people of the world that another war would destroy civilization.

There are empty chairs in millions of homes throughout the country today which were vacated by boys whose fathers 27 years ago went forth to defeat the aggressor and preserve world freedom. In 1919 these heroes returned, proud of the great victory which they had won. Their slogan was "We have won a war which will end all future wars." In 1919 they did not realize that bitter partisan politics would lose the peace and that their sons would be on another world battlefield a generation hence.

The great majority of Americans 25 years ago advocated and supported Woodrow Wilson in his program to preserve the future peace. Let us today recall the warning he gave America in 1919 in his last speech at Pueblo, Colo., the night before he was stricken with his fatal illness. He said: "I am representing the infants in the cradles of today, that they not be called upon to fight a world war 25 years hence. I would rather lose in fighting a cause that some day will succeed than win in a fight for an unjust cause which will some day terminate in failure."

I could go on indefinitely with statements from great Americans who were at that time fighting side by side with President Wilson. Among them were former President William Howard Taft; former Secretary of State, Elihu Root; Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University; former Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, and our present Commander in Chief, who was then Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Had the United States Senate cooperated with Woodrow Wilson 24 years ago and joined with other countries in a League of Nations, the league would have succeeded and been forceful and Hitler and the Japs could never built their gigantic war machine. This great international forward step was sabotaged by partisan politics under the leadership of the Republican bosses in the United States Senate of that day. These Republican bosses were more interested in defeating Woodrow Wilson and the Democratic Party and placing Warren G. Harding in the Presidential chair than they were in the welfare of humanity and the future peace of the world. Had Senators Lodge, Watson, Penrose and other Republican bosses cooperated with our war president, on a world peace program, we would not have had a Dunkerque, Stalingrad or a Pearl Harbor.

Every American should read the book As I Knew Them, written by Senator James E. Watson in 1935, where he tells in detail the regrettable tactics and strategy used by Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Republican Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, to defeat the League of Nations program 24 years ago.

The Republican platform in 1920 contained a plank advocating international cooperation with other nations to preserve the future peace of the world. When Harding assumed office, this plank was thrown out of the window. In fact, Senator Borah, in an interview the day after Harding's election, said: "This ends the League of Nations." I am today refreshing the minds of the delegates to this convention and the voters of Indiana, that the Republican Party cannot be trusted on international affairs, and any peace plank they adopt in their 1944 platform will meet the same sad fate as the peace plank met in their 1920 platform.

I believe the greatest single accomplishment of the Seventy-eighth Congress was the passing of the resolution which called for an international organization setting up machinery to assure future and permanent peace to mankind. When this resolution passed in Congress, notice was given to the nations of the world that America will, in the future, cooperate at the table of arbitration to settle international disputes and outlaw war. If this great forward step can be accomplished World War No. 2 will not have been fought in vain.

POST-WAR

While this, to my mind, will be our greatest peacetime goal, it by no means is the only problem which will confront the American people when the boys return home. We must not allow ourselves to be as unprepared for peace as we were unprepared for war. After victory, we must demobilize the greatest armed forces ever assembled in the history of America; we must reconvert to peacetime production the largest industrial set-up ever constructed in our history; we must find jobs for millions of dislocated men and women—our Government, organized labor, and private industry must cooperate in the performance of this task.

The returning soldiers must not be compelled to sell apples on the streets as they did in the 1920's, or take part in bonus marches to Washington as they did in the ill-fated Hoover regime. We must provide for the stabilization of the greatest debt in the history of our Nation; we must take care of and rehabilitate those who are injured and incapacitated in this war and for their dependents; we must provide for greater security from fear and want among the aged and the unemployed; we must aid in the speedy reconversion of our industrial structure from war to peace; we must cooperate with other nations in the reestablishment of international trade and credit so as to provide an outlet for our goods to the nations of the world. America needs everybody to aid in these tasks.

SPIRITUAL AID

We have found that progress in science, the wisdom and foresight of statesmen, and the mastery of military art has failed to keep the world from hatred and war. As a result we have reaped the whirlwind and now stand in the midst of a ruthless conflagration that is searing the souls of men and consuming their very lives. The world has placed too much confidence in its civic leaders and statesmen to protect it from struggle, strife, and war. In the future we must have the active cooperation and guidance of our Christian and spiritual teachers to help inculcate in the hearts of men and governments the doctrine of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Expediency and temporary advantage must disappear from the plans of statesmen, and a new international relationship will have to come into being, based upon the broad concepts of humanity and justice.

This will be a different and difficult task, to control a world surcharged with hatreds.

With the callous cruelties of the aggressor still fresh in the minds of the victims—the determination of the victims to reap vengeance—the priests, ministers, rabbis and teachers of all faiths will have to hold out the hands of guidance and lead the people back to the ways of peace.

Hatreds born on the battlefield where men violently kill each other will not be washed away by the simple declaration of peace. The souls of men that have been tried and seared will have to be healed, and in the post-war world America will need its churches to help do the healing.

We pray that when these marching men return to their homes, we will be equal to the task of helping them again to respect and love their fellowmen. We must teach them to cooperate rather than compete. It will be our duty to convince those who have survived the destructive institutions of war, that there are greater glories than international combat and that the creations of science were intended for a society of men in which each can live ethically, morally, and at peace with each other. International understanding and tolerance must be the corner stones upon which the post-war world will be rebuilt for progress, security, and permanent peace.

What Shall We Do About Oil?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM CONNALLY

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a very interesting address entitled "What Shall We Do About Oil?"

delivered by Judge J. C. Hunter, of Abilene, Tex.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Texas is in the oil business in a big way. Information developed by the Texas Mid-Continent Oil & Gas Association discloses that 174 counties of the State are now producing oil or gas, and leasing and development are being carried on in the remaining 80 About 50,000,000 acres, or approximately 28 percent of the area of the State, are now under lease. We have approximately 100,000 oil wells from which nearly 600,000,000 barrels were produced last year and from which our daily production is now more than 2,000,000 barrels, about 44 percent of the Nation's daily 4,400,000 barrels. Since Colonel Drake first discovered oil at Titusville, Pa., in 1859, about 28,000,000,000 barrels have been produced in the United States. Texas has produced more than 8,000,000,000. We have more than half of the Nation's proved reserves. The 1943 expenditure of the Texas industry was well over $1,000,000,000. The oil industry pays about 53 percent of all State business and property taxes. In 1943 it paid 23⅓ percent of the total cost of operating the State's public school system. Texas refineries process about 85 percent of the total quantity of oil produced in the State. The industry is a very large employer of labor at high wages.

Naturally we are concerned about the immediate and long-range future of oil. We want to continue actively to search for, discover, develop, produce, and refine it; and in the process, we want the industry to be economically strong and healthy so that it can perform adequate and efficient service. We want to produce oil and gas without waste and use them beneficially and wisely. We want to know what Government is going to do for and to the oil industry. We do not want Federal control—we want our conservation program and production regulations to be permanently under State jurisdiction and direction. We want the present limitations and restrictions which have been imposed upon the States and their regulatory agencies by the Federal Government, due to war necessities, relaxed, released, and returned to the States just as rapidly as war conditions will permit. We want the Federal Government, since, necessarily, it has assumed broad jurisdiction over all industry during wartime, to see to it that the oil industry is given the opportunity now to receive an adequate price for oil and its products, and require price-fixing agencies to give due consideration to the cost of finding, developing, producing, and conserving oil, including the replacement cost thereof, in order that the industry can render its full measure of public service in the war, and also in the peace to follow.

The Army and Navy are concerned about oil. The industry has and will continue to make available all petroleum products necessary to win this war. The military authorities do not doubt this. Apparently, however, they, and other high officials of Government, have become a little jittery about oil if we should have another war in 20 or 30 years. They have created the giant Government-owned Petroleum Reserves Corporation, with powers as broad and extensive as our western prairies, and announced that they propose to spend $150,000,000 to build, own, and control operation of a twelve-hundred-mile pipe line from Arabia to the Mediterranean Sea. Time does not permit detailed discussion of that project, nor opportunity to point out how it would put our Government directly into the oil business in competition with American citizens as well as friendly and presently allied nations. No to show how it would more likely be a stimulating cause of another war rather than serve as a safeguard to us if one should occur.

Some high officials have suggested that the Government condemn and buy many of our great producing oil fields, such as east Texas and many others, with the purpose of closing them in and hoarding the oil against the eventuality of another war. Secretary Ickes made a public statement not long ago in which he suggested that the Government buy and buy, store and store oil, in order that we might be prepared for any future war. He also stressed the oil policy of some foreign nations who have become participating partners of oil companies, and suggested that such a policy might be desirable for this country.

A very realistic and practical response to that suggestion is that while other countries had that policy they did not produce the oil, but the United States, through the skill and effective action of private enterprise, with a minimum of Government interference, is furnishing the oil to save the freedom of the world from demoniacal Axis destruction.

Congress is concerned about oil, and the United States Senate has created a special committee to explore the whole subject and formulate a Government policy on oil, both foreign and domestic.

The people generally are concerned and confused. They are inconvenienced and burdened by ration restrictions on gasoline and heating oil. They get many conflicting stories through the press and over the radio. They are probably wondering whether the United States is about to run out of oil or whether we have an abundance.

It is timely for all of us to ask: "What shall we do about oil?" It is not possible to formulate a sound answer to that question without knowing something about the industry's history and past experiences, and where it actually stands today. It is not my purpose to present a technical discussion but to state as simply as possible the course of action that is indicated by the trials and errors, and experiences of the past.

Let us begin with Colonel Drake when oil was first discovered by him 85 years ago. In the light of present-day knowledge it is obvious that he did not really know what he had discovered. He did not know that oil could be used in the multitude of ways that later experience has demonstrated. He did not know how it had been created; why nor how it was accumulated at that particular place; what were its characteristics and behavior in its underground prison; why it would flow through the pores of the sandstone into his well. He could not visualize any manner in which it could be wasted until after it had been lifted to the surface.

In that day the mind of man did not conceive of the natural accumulation of any liquid except at the lowest level of basin-like containers, comparable to pools of water on the ground. Of course, it is now known that oil is usually accumulated under great pressure in upside down containers, commonly designated as geological structures, or traps.

Colonel Drake was not concerned about these matters. Nor conservation, nor a possible shortage of oil. His problem was to find a profitable market for a new substance. In the early days "rock oil," or petroleum, was used for medicinal purposes. It was soon discovered that crude oil could be distilled and would thereby produce what was called kerosene, which was superior to whale oil, for illuminating purposes. This afforded a market and brought on the kerosene period of the petroleum industry which lasted well beyond the turn of the twentieth century.

In the years from 1910 until the early 20's the industry was in what we would now consider its fuel-oil period.

During the First World War, the amount of gasoline consumed for military purposes was relatively small, for the automobile and airplane were in their infancy at that time. Yet it has been said that even in that great conflict the allies "floated to victory on a sea of oil," produced, incidentally, largely by the United States.

The gasoline period of the industry followed quickly after the war in response to the rapid development of the automobile. Serious concern develeoped about whether we were about to run out of oil. At that time the industry's known reserves were only about one-third of what they are today. President Coolidge appointed a commission to study the problem and make recommendations on what should be done.

Looking back, we can well appreciate why Government officials and the industry, as well as the public, should have been worried and asking, "What shall we do about oil?"

Fortunately the industry found a solution and found it very quickly. Stimulated by a favorable price, they inaugurated a campaign of bold and aggressive wildcat drilling in search of oil, employing all the known techniques. This resulted in discovering oil in large quantities within a very short time. It was not long before we were talking not of shortages—but of a surplus of oil. Large reserves of oil were discovered in Oklahoma, followed by the Yates and Winkler fields in west Texas. The market could not absorb all of the oil that could be produced under the open-flow method that had always prevailed. In desperation the industry, to solve the problem, entered into voluntary agreements to limit the amount of their daily production. This met with only limited success because many producers would not cooperate.

To further complicate the situation, Dad Joiner made his famed discovery in east Texas. As the magnitude of that giant field was disclosed the lid blew off in earnest and the entire industry was plunged into chaos. Supply was so much greater than market demand that the price of oil dropped to disastrous levels and waste of oil was prevalent, both above and below ground.

That was a time to really ask, "What shall we do about oil?" Both industry and Government concentrated on the solution of the problem. We went through the hectic period of martial law in east Texas and Oklahoma, coupled with a measure of Federal regulation. Out of it all there slowly evolved a program of conservation and waste prevention, both physical and economic. There developed a public consciousness that oil and gas are irreplaceable natural resources and must be produced without avoidable waste.

The process was slow and difficult. Laws were enacted in Texas and other oil States invoking the police power to prevent waste to protect the general welfare. Engineers and experienced production men contributed their knowledge concerning behavior of oil underground. Production was limited to prevent physical waste and in the light of later experience it was limited to conform with market demand. Oil fields became great laboratories and the petroleum engineers, aided by the conservation authorities of the States, have developed an amazing amount of scientific information and regulations which have effected a high degree of waste prevention, and at the same time demonstrated that good conservation is also sound economics. The State Governors and legislatures have made the program possible through their leadership and action in the enactment of essential legislation. The courts have sustained the laws and regulations.

The Federal Government has helped by the passage of the Connally hot oil law and approval of the interstate oil compact which the States created as a necessary fact-finding, educational, and coordinating agency. It has also benefited the movement through the activities of the Bureau of Mines. This era might be referred to as the period of conservation and waste-prevention development.

The petroleum industry has made tremendous strides not only in the production of oil but also in the technology of how to use it. Twenty years ago very little was known about the quality of the products made from a barrel of crude oil, and the equipment was such that we were forced to take certain amounts of different products and try to find a market for them. Research engineers have not only learned a great deal about petroleum but they have put it to practical use in manufacturing better products and designing equipment which permits us to obtain more of the products we want and less of others not so important.

Technological progress has been so rapid in the industry that it is making products today in large quantities that only a short time ago were at the laboratory stage. Outstanding among these products are synthetic rubber, toluene, and 100-octane gasoline. Toluene has been produced in tremendous quantities by the petroleum industry for the bombs now being dropped on Europe and in the Pacific. It is the final "T" in TNT.

Probably the most important of these products is 100-octane gasoline which gives our planes that decisive margin of superiority over those of the Axis. This powerful gasoline provides quicker take-off, greater speed, longer distance, and improved maneuverability. Our production, now 400,000 barrels of 100-octane gasoline daily, is nearly 10 times the volume at the time of Pearl Harbor. The lack of 100-octane gasoline is probably one of the major handicaps of the Axis air force.

Technology is the great multiplier of our petroleum resources. The petroleum industry will probably continue indefinitely in the period of multiple products.

The dramatic story of the industry's achievements and contribution during the present war can hardly be appreciated by one who is not well acquainted with the record. We have changed our transportation system of oil to the Atlantic seaboard from a movement of ocean-going tankers to an overland movement by rail and two recently constructed big transcontinental pipe lines, as well as numerous other pipe-line construction. We have supplied the military forces with all their petroleum requirements, including 100-octane gasoline, toluene, and other critical products. We have supplied the railroads with their greatly augmented fuel-oil requirements. We have increased our daily production of crude oil 900,000, bringing it up to an all-time high of 4,400,000 barrels per day. We have carried on an active wildcat drilling, development, and production program under the handicap of shortage of manpower and materials, coupled with an abnormally low price ceiling imposed by the Government.

The great increase that has occurred in the cost of exploration, development, production, conservation, and replacement of oil has not been given adequate consideration by the Government in refusing to approve the Petroleum Administrator's request for a general advance in the price of petroleum and its products. As a result, thousands of small stripper wells face abandonment with the loss of their underlying reserves.

If the oil industry is to do an adequate and satisfactory job in searching for new fields, developing proven acreage, and preserving stripper-well reserves, it is imperative that the Government, through Congress and the administrative agencies, face this issue squarely and take immediate appropriate action to solve it through adequate price increase.

There is much confusion in the public mind about the extent of our petroleum resources. Undue emphasis has been placed upon the 20,000,000,000 barrels commonly referred to as our proven reserves. This takes no account of the natural gas of the country which can be converted into liquid fuel at slightly higher cost than gasoline from crude oil; it disregards the billions of barrels of crude oil that can be produced by secondary recovery methods, and it does not give recognition to the millions of acres of highly potential oil lands that have never been tested.

The truth of the matter is that we are nowhere near running out of oil, and but for the inordinate demands of war, we would today have a surplus of producing capacity that would have to be restricted in order to prevent physical waste and to conserve the supplies for the time when they would be needed. There are those who believe that this country should begin to hoard its oil, either in underground reservoirs or in storage tanks above ground. They question the ability of the country to meet its oil problems for the future and have a mistaken belief that we can protect the security of the Nation by freezing the situation we have today in terms of oil resources. This has never been the way to solve the problems of the petroleum or any other industry. We live in a dynamic and constantly changing world, and we only learn to deal with its problems by allowing them to allow them to develop in their normal and natural course. We are not in danger of running out of oil overnight. We are certain that we have supplies for many years to come, and that in the interval we will find more supplies, and if given opportunity, we will develop new techniques that will provide additional supplies from other sources.

The fortunate position we have occupied with regard to oil in this war was not achieved by attempting to build up a reserve for national security. It was achieved, instead, by allowing a free and dynamic industry to build its markets and to find the resources to supply its customers.

In the very process of using oil in ever larger quantities, we have discovered better methods of finding it and of supplying consumers with better products at lower prices. We cannot hope to solve the problems of the future by stopping progress and development as of this, or any other date. We can find the answer only if we go on in our normal evolutionary course of development as we have throughout the entire history of the oil industry. If we do follow the experience of the past and permit the industry to work out its own problems, we need have no fear of running out of liquid fuel.

Our country is particularly dependent upon oil for its way of life. We have by far the greatest proportion of the automobiles in the world, and we use 30 times as much oil per capita as the remainder of the world. This oil is a tremendous source of energy that carried us around the country in automobiles and railroads, and that drives thousands of machines in power plants and factories. It does work for us that could not be done if the rest of the world's population were our slaves, and it does that work very cheaply. The public has reason, therefore, to be tremendously interested in an abundant supply of petroleum as cheaply as possible and in the advantageous use of those supplies without waste. In this the industry and the public are in complete accord. Our task is to utilize petroleum efficiently to maintain and improve the standard of living with which it is so intimately related.

We have had an abundance of oil, not because this country was blessed with greater resources by nature than others, but because of the inherent initiative of the people and the freedom to carry on their business as they chose. Foreign countries are known to have larger potential reserves of oil, but due to government restrictions and other handicaps, they have not developed their resources to the same extent that we have. We were first to learn how to find oil efficiently and use it effectively, and Americans carried that knowledge to the far corners of the globe. As their resources are developed, they, too, may gain the benefits of this black gold that provides such tremendous amounts of energy at low cost. They will need the major part of their own resources, if they are to develop progressive economy and better standards of living.

In part, some of their reserves may be available to us, if needed, but we cannot depend on foreign reserves as a safeguard in time of war. Unless we can insure access to reserves by military control, ownership will be of no benefit whatever. If the United States Government, instead of American companies, had owned the oil resources in the Dutch East Indies and Saudi Arabia, those resources would not have been any more accessible today.

The way to insure sufficient oil for this country is to allow the industry to find its own methods of meeting the large normal civilian demands. In the very processes of carrying on its normal business, the industry will automatically insure sufficient oil for military purposes, even if there should be another war. The technologists already know methods for making liquid fuels from other products than petroleum. They know how to make gasoline out of natural gas and out of oil shales and coal that are found in such abundance in this country. At the present time, the cost of making substitutes is such that they are not competitive with gasoline from petroleum, but they are not so much higher that consumers would find it impossible to pay the additional cost. It is reported that synthetic gasoline could be made for 5 to 15 cents more per gallon than the present cost from petroleum. Such increases in prices would not be prohibitive, particularly if taxes on gasoline were eliminated. Furthermore, the constant improvements being made in these processes may in time reduce the cost to the point where it is actually competitive with gasoline from petroleum. We know also that we can make liquid fuel from agricultural products, at higher cost, and could fall back on this source permanently if cheaper sources run out.

In concluding this discussion of, What shall we do about oil? it seems apparent from the experience of the past that we should continue to depend upon developments of a free and competitive industry. We have passed through many successive stages, and the industry has always found an effective solution to its problems with the assistance of the States and the support of the Federal Government. In the process, a rather unique system of cooperation and teamwork has been developed to prevent waste and promote conservation and must be continued; and, indeed, it should be expanded so that new producing States will improve their conservation laws and practices and join the ranks of those already providing for effective utilization of our oil resources.

It is apparent that the solution of our oil problem requires constructive action on the part of the industry, the States, the Federal Government, and the public. The role that each of these should undertake can be summarized briefly as follows:

The industry must do the following: (1) explore for and discover new fields and develop them in an orderly fashion, so that the public will be assured of an ample supply at reasonable prices, (2) produce oil efficiently and without preventable waste, and (3) improve technology to secure more valuable and better products from crude oil and to manufacture low-cost synthetic substitutes as the need for them arises.

The States must contribute to the industry's efforts in the following manner: (1) Adopt adequate conservation laws and provide for effective administration, (2) protect private property rights correlatively, so that orderly development of all properties will be possible, (3) regulate production to market demand, in order to avoid economic as well as physical waste, and (4) maintain a sound and fair level of taxation upon the industry.

The Federal Government should support the program of the industry and the States by the following methods: (1) Establishing a firm policy that the Government will not enter into the oil business competitively with private industry, directly or indirectly, at home or abroad; that it will safeguard our domestic industry against undue encroachment by foreign oil, and that it will give strong diplomatic support to the end that our nationals shall have the assurance of operating in the petroleum industry abroad on equal basis with the nationals of other countries; (2) relax wartime restrictions as promptly as possible, and remove them entirely when the war ends so that the States will again have full jurisdiction over conservation and production regulations, and normal economic forces will again control the operations of the industry; (3) support and encourage conservation on the part of the States through such measures as the Connally Act and the Interstate Oil Compact Commission; (4) provide for an adequate price for petroleum and its products during the war emergency; and (5) maintain a sound and fair program of taxation upon the industry.

The public also has a vital role in bringing about sound oil policies. In this connection the most important measures are: (1) The creation of public opinion in support of sound policies of conservation and development; (2) the development of an appreciation of actual conditions in the industry and knowledge to determine what is sound policy; and (3) the realization that we are not going to run out of oil overnight and that ample supplies of motor fuels will be assured by one method or another, if private enterprise is allowed to continue its normal development and technological progress.

The public must realize that our oil resources do have some limit, however large, and that the time will come when new substitutes must be developed. The transition can be facilitated to the point where the consumer will hardly notice it, if public opinion is exerted in support of having industry find the solution to our problems as they arise. We do not need Government participation nor control in development of domestic or foreign oil reserves; and, in fact, such participation would prove, in the light of experience, to be a hindrance to discovery and development of additional oil. Government does have a proper function in domestic oil operations, but that function is to promote conservation and encourage development, rather than to enter into the business itself. The solution to our problem is right here at home and will be found in following the same policies that have placed this country in the fortunate position of being able to supply the oil; one of the major elements contributing to the victory of the United Nations.

Address of Hon. Winifred C. Stanley, of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. WINIFRED C. STANLEY at the New York State Conference of Mayors and the New York State Federation of Official Planning Boards, held in Syracuse, N. Y., on June 8, 1944:

The distinguished men and women who are participating in this conference are leaders in the complicated economy of our great Empire State, leaders whose policies and plans may well decide the future prosperity of New York. My pleasure in accepting the honor of addressing you today is accordingly accentuated by knowledge of the valuable service you are rendering in the interest of post-war planning. You are to be commended especially for the coordination and dispatch with which you are proceeding. The agenda of this conference presents a strikingly comprehensive program on the subject of planning for the period following cessation of hostilities. It is interesting to note that in addition to city planning there are included discussions on the vital subjects of post-war transportation, water routes and harbors, superhighways, air travel and airport development, municipal cooperation, and housing.

In Washington so many post-war plans have been submitted that we are reminded, a trifle ruefully, of the cartoon depicting a woman telling her friends of her chagrin because her husband is the only man at the dinner party who doesn't have a post-war plan to discuss. Many governmental agencies are working on the problem. Several congressional committees are also working on the problem. Since it seems sensible that creation of a single committee would economize on the time and effort both of Members of Congress and witnesses, your Representative at Large has introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of one joint bipartisan committee to plan post-war economy.

It is particularly appropriate that this conference should be held in the city of Syracuse, in which has been organized the widely publicized Syracuse plan. The citizens of this typical American city have wisely decided to replan their community so that it will be one of the most livable, functional cities in our vast Nation. It was only natural that Syracuse, established in 1825 as a village, would, in the course of time, and because of the tremendous increase in population to a new high of more than 200,000, outgrow itself. Residents of Syracuse are determined to do something about the overcrowding, the blighted areas, and the fiscal headache of tax delinquencies. When the plan is perfected, as without question it will be, the high economic potential of Syracuse will be utilized for post-war employment and city planning. Probably the most encouraging phase is the enthusiasm with which the general public is participating in the project. Members of the Syracuse-Onondaga Post-war Planning Council have displayed vision and foresight in fostering this enthusiasm.

When I think of Syracuse, Schenectady, Utica, New York, and all the other cities of our State, including, of course, my beloved home city of Buffalo, in which our distinguished chairman, Mr. Bertram Tallamy, and other members of the Niagara-Frontier Planning Board, are doing such effective work, I feel great faith in the future of our State.

You are more keenly aware than any other group that one of the most pertinent questions before this country—in fact, next to winning the war, probably the most important question, is the problem of post-war economy. It is a problem intimately associated with the winning of the peace. Able minds are concerned with the broad principles of this economy as it has to do with the world outside our shores. They are discussing our relations with foreign countries, the planning of world trade, and other related subjects. This question in its entirety is as complex as the world itself. It is obvious that all this activity designed to improve the condition of the world in which we live is admirable. Of necessity, however, there must be a logical approach to this tremendous problem.

As practical men and women, your activities and achievements as members of the New York State Federation of Official Planning Boards and the conference of mayors represent the most realistic approach yet made to the whole situation. There isn't any better place to initiate an answer to the question of world betterment than right here in our own realm of effort. To phrase the idea in a homely way, the first step in the plan for a program of world improvement is to give our own backyard some much-needed attention. To phrase it in another way, "post-war plans begin on Main Street."

It is encouraging to note, in the well-written pamphlet issued by the State Division of Housing, Governor Thomas E. Dewey's statement that "planning for peace is an important wartime job." That seems to be the theme of this entire conference. The Governor goes on to say: "We can set new and higher living standards for the people of this State through the building of large and small scale housing developments by private enterprise supplemented by State aided projects for families of lower income. To do the job well, we must enlist the full energies of both private and public endeavor.

"It rests with every community to foster collaboration now for post-war civic reorganization and to build an even better State in which to live."

We pride ourselves as New Yorkers upon our leadership in the vanguard of progress. Our huge State with its population of 13,500,000 people represents one-tenth of the Nation. In the matter of post-war planning, you who represent us in this vital field are making it possible for New York to live up to her reputation as a leader. Our State cash surplus of $163,000,000, earmarked for rehabilitation and reemployment purposes, as well as your effective, practicable ideas, and those of the New York State Post-war Planning Commission created by our brilliant Governor are the most tangible, concrete examples of planning recorded thus far. Certainly coordination and cooperation between municipalities, agencies, and State government are the most effective means by which to implement the need for a smoothly-functioning post-war economy. This conference is an indication that New York State officials and executives recognize this fact.

Another quality which will be of invaluable assistance in coping with this subject of post-war economy is a sense of perspective. Rather difficult to illustrate, it is reminiscent of the anecdote set forth in Reader's Digest, wherein a woman is riding on the Fifth Avenue bus in the teeming metropolis of New York, scanning a map of Manchuria. A fellow traveler, under the influence of some strong beverage, takes a seat next to her, observes the map, gazes upon Fifth Avenue, and inquires in patent confusion, "Are you sure you're on the right bus, lady?" The New York State representatives here assembled are not only "on the right bus," but are forging forthrightly ahead in the interests of community and State improvement.

Turning to the national picture, we find that many of the subjects in which you are interested are now before congressional committees in the form of proposed legislation. For instance, several bills dealing with aviation have been introduced. We have studied not only the bills but the letters expressing opinions on them as well. Some who write to us share an Utopian view of what has variously been called "Tomorrow's World," "a brave new world," etc. They seem to believe, quite naively, that immediately upon the cessation of hostilities, we will step into this new era, with the ease displayed by the fabulous Alice in Wonderland, as she stepped through the looking glass. The hard work which all of us must continue to do is forgotten. This is especially true in reference to the helicopter. One of Washington's many ingenious, intelligent newspaper women, recently spun a hypothetical yarn about a woman living in Florida, who uses a helicopter for little shopping jaunts. To the writer's amazement, people began telephoning to ask where such a little helicopter might be purchased.

Seriously, however, on the subjects of aviation, housing, transportation by rail, highway, or water route, we who represent you in Congress welcome the opinions and comments of the members of an audience such as this, composed of experts on these matters.

Presently Congress faces many grave problems. The House conferees have agreed to accept the Senate's decision to increase the debt limit to $260,000,000,000 from the present ceiling of $210,000,000,000. This brings to mind the weighty problem of taxation. There seem to be two critical questions involved. Do we possess the determination and good judgment to stop continued deficits after the war? To do so will be difficult. But unless we follow this course, it seems an impossible task to keep our currency sound. Next, what will fe do about carrying the debt? At present rates, interest on the debt might amount to $6,000,000,000 a year. It seems to many of us that every new proposal for Government spending must be scrutinized with an eagle eye.

Then there is the vital subject of government by law, as opposed to government by men. That is an issue which constantly engages our attention. In a recently decided case involving an appeal by the Motor Freight Carriers, Inc. (representing about 200 truck-operating companies in New England) the United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia, has ruled that orders of the War Labor Board are not subject to judicial review. It is the considered opinion of many men and women that there should be access to the courts for redress of grievances such as those expressed by the Montgomery Ward Co. and the Motor Freight Carriers. It is the conviction of many of us that despite the emergency which necessarily entails the delegation of many important powers, due process should not be suspended as to orders of the War Labor Board and other executive agencies. It was Charles Evans Hughes who said during the First World War: "While we are at war, we are not in revolution. We are making war as a nation, organized under the Constitution. The Constitution is as effective today as it ever was and the oath to support it just as binding."

And in one of the most famous Supreme Court cases in history, the Milligan case, this doctrine was set forth by the learned Associate Justice Davis:

"The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people equally in war and in peace; and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented * * * than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine would lead directly to anarchy or despotism."

Many are asking the question: What will the pattern of our future economy be? Whether we call it capitalism or free enterprise, there seems to be an increasing trend among the American people expressing the desire to return to that typically American system which rewards individual efforts and free competition. Business men and women in this country do not want any planned economy, which would preclude opportunity to choose one's occupation or career, to begin a new venture, to develop new inventions and products. The pioneer spirit which made this country the greatest in the world still exists, stronger than ever. Americans are used to the right to invest their money in a business, and they are ready and willing to run the risks involved. They don't seek a sure thing. They do ask the right to make a choice and take a chance, according to their good judgment. Every survey shows that the wish of the majority is for relaxation of Federal control. If we expend as much time and effort on the problem of encouraging private enterprise and reconversion to peacetime economy as we have in building up our gigantic war production, we need never return to the excessive Federal control employed during the emergency times through which we are passing.

Nevertheless, we must have cooperation between the Federal and State governments in the difficult adjustment period. There is no quarrel as to this need. But there is a definite feeling that the emphasis of recent years has swung too heavily to the side of Federal control. Better coordination and understanding between Federal and State governments are undoubtedly the answer.

An example of conflict over State and Federal control arises in the Supreme Court ruling on June 5, 1944, holding that insurance is in interstate commerce and, therefore, should be under the regulatory powers of the Federal Government. There has already been approved by the House Judiciary Committee a bill which would continue State control. The Supreme Court's decision concerns antitrust proceedings against 196 stock fire insurance companies operating in 6 Southeastern States. The majority opinion states that to say insurance is not commerce would be to set it apart from all other business in the Nation. On the other hand, Chief Justice Stone, in the minority opinion, has expressed the belief that the immediate effect of the decision is to withdraw from the States the regulation of insurance, and to confer it on the National Government, which has adopted no legislative policy and which has evolved no scheme of regulation with respect to insurance.

Thousands of letters addressed to Members of Congress deal with the desire of all Americans for a "just and lasting peace." Many of the communications ask what Congress had done to help implement the attainment of this ideal state. The passage by the Senate of the bipartisan Connally resolution, the overwhelming adoption of the streamlined Fulbright resolution by the House of Representatives, the creation of the United Nations Rehabilitation and Relief Administration, the continuation of lend-lease, and the extension of the reciprocal trade agreements are results of congressional action.

It is true that whenever the subject of peace is mentioned, the air positively glitters with generalities. Everyone has a pet theory or notion. In my humble opinion, the maintenance of peace, once it has been attained, will demand the same constant attention which we must devote to the preservation of good government or friendship, or of any other desirable state or relationship. Peace has often been symbolized as a dove, but nevertheless it cannot be captured by any "net" of blueprints or peace plans, no matter how cleverly drawn.

One of the most memorable events during the term of the Seventy-eighth Congress was the address delivered by the brilliant representative of our brave ally, China. Her exquisite beauty, to which no camera has ever done justice, her flawless diction, and her melodious voice constitute sufficient reason for the welcome which she received. But these were not the attributes which won her the acclaim of the House of Representatives. It was rather the passionate sincerity with which she voiced her convictions. Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, conceded to be the best speaker ever to address the Congress, said these words concerning peace: "We of this generation who are privileged to help make a better world for ourselves and for posterity should remember that, while we must not be visionary, we must have vision so that peace should not be punitive in spirit and should not be provincial or nationalistic or even continental in concept, but universal in scope and humanitarian in action, for modern science has so annihilated distance that what affects one people must, of necessity, affect all other peoples."

As for the subject of peace treaties, there has been considerable discussion as to whether the rule that treaties must be adopted by a two-thirds vote of the Senate should be changed. There are some who believe that the Members of the House should have a voice in the adoption of treaties. It has been suggested that a majority vote in each House be required. My own opinion favors leaving the vote in the Senate, but providing for a reasonable factor of safety. Under such an amendment a treaty could be adopted by a vote of seven-twelfths of the Members of the Senate present.

Concerning all these problems, the key is public opinion. It is public opinion which constitutes the dynamo of our democracy. Undoubtedly the most encouraging sign in these troubled times is the keen interest in public affairs, in legislation, and in world cooperation, presently displayed by the American people. The mail a Representative receives in this year 1944 is as varied as the types of trees in verdant Washington.

The task of providing adequate hospitalization, rehabilitation, and educational opportunity for returning servicemen and servicewomen is well under way. Popularly referred to as the G. I. bill of rights (H. R. 1767), the National Servicemen's Aid Act of 1944 is being considered by the conferees and is almost ready for further action. It contains provisions for unemployment benefits, employment centers, and loans, as well as for the benefits mentioned above.

Veterans' preferences will be enacted into substantive law by passage of the Starnes bill (H. R. 4115), reported favorably by the Civil Service Committee, of which I am a member, and passed by the House. We now await a report from the conferees on this legislation.

No other legislation receives more careful attention and consideration than that providing for benefits for our gallant service men and service women. The letters they write from far-flung military theaters are extraordinary. They reveal intelligence of the highest order, adaptability, and that keen sense of humor which is so typically American. A boy stationed in England sent us a notice that he had been awarded a good-conduct ribbon. "But don't be surprised," he wrote modestly and humorously, "Over here we maintain that any fellow who can eat Spam can win a good conduct award. We call them 'Spam ribbons.'" And young, heroic Major Richard Bong, visiting the halls of Congress, carried his countless medals and ribbons in his pocket, rather than displaying them on his uniform. Said one of our colleagues, "Well, it's evident that he isn't a politician."

Judging from observations gleaned from the voluminous mail we receive, it is my opinion that today we need a renaissance of respect for the Constitution of the United States. Those who disregard that great document forget that it is not entirely the foundation stone of all our cherished rights and liberties, but also the only real protection afforded to minority groups. No thinking person should enter the cool and cloistered serenity of the exquisitely beautiful Lincoln Memorial without reflecting upon the obligations we owe our country in exchange for the privileges we enjoy by virtue of our citizenship.

And yet, we have taken those rights and privileges far too frequently for granted. We have forgotten that the Constitution wasn't created easily and quickly, but rather was the result of 4 long months of discussion and debate in the heat of the convention at Philadelphia. We have forgotten that we should be as eager to accept civil responsibility as we are anxious to enjoy the blessings of American citizenship.

"It were but a trifle even if the walls of yonder Capitol were to crumble, if its lofty pillars should fall, and its gorgeous decorations be all covered by the dust of the valley. All these may be rebuilt. But who shall reconstruct the fabric of demolished Government? Who shall rear again the well-proportioned columns of Constitutional liberty?" We owe it to ourselves to protect the "glorious edifice of Constitutional American liberty."

There should also be an increase of respect for the Congress of the United States. It has been my privilege, one deeply appreciated, to serve as a Member of the Seventy-eighth Congress. My brief service has convinced me that there are nowhere to be found more intelligent, earnest, and conscientious men and women than those who serve the people of our Nation as their duly-elected Representatives. Considering the size of this great legislative body, the multiplicity of problems faced by its Members, and the diversity of opinion on every subject which exists among the millions of citizens in our vast country, it is amazing with what efficiency Congress transacts the tremendous business of legislation on a national scale. My admiration is expressed impartially, since reapportionment in New York State has abolished the position of Representative-at-large. My experience has convinced me that today Congress constitutes the greatest bulwark of our Constitutional form of Government.

Undoubtedly, you remember the striking scene in The Memphis Belle when the young aviators are receiving their last instructions before leaving on a dangerous mission. The commentator's voice throbs with tension as he relates how these boys, the richest cream of American youth, who just a few months before were perhaps inattentive in school rooms, listen alertly to every word. "Their very lives," he says, "may depend on how well they learn this last lesson."

Today we realize poignantly that the life of our republic itself may depend on our ability to learn and retain the lessons of citizenship. Our priceless heritage isn't a gift to us, but a lifetime job, and surely there is no better time than these dramatic hours following D-day to rededicate ourselves anew to those principles and ideals we hold so high.

It was Pitcairn who expressed the idea so eloquently, "America expects knowledge—knowledge of our history, knowledge of our literature, knowledge of our ideals. America expects faith—faith in its form of Government and faith in your own capacity to be part of that Government. America expects effort. In America the key to opportunity bears the label "work." And, above all America expects patriotism. Patriotism in word and thought and deed. It expects you to so live that America will be a better place because you are part of it."

You are helping constructively and intelligently to make America a better place. New Yorkers may well repose confidence in the leaders participating in this conference. Under your wise guidance, our State will continue to advance.

This is the second day since D-Day marked the beginning of the long-awaited invasion. In years to come we may read in American history books the classic words spoken by Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower as the most tremendous military invasion of all time began: "Great battles lie ahead. I call upon all who love freedom to stand with us. Keep your faith staunch—our arms are resolute—together we shall achieve victory."

The men and women of the Empire State join in the prayer for victory every lover of freedom breathes today.

Recognition for the WASPS

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WINIFRED C. STANLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Miss STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the New York Times on June 16, 1944. All of us hail the gallantry of our American men who serve in the greatest air force of all time. It seems equally fitting that tribute should be paid to the members of the Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots' organization:

RECOGNITION FOR THE WASPS

The Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots—WASPS—have performed valiantly in many types of war service, including ferrying planes, towing targets, carrying out searchlight and radar missions and meteorological flights. They have been supporting the combat services at nearly a hundred different stations. They are an outgrowth of the Fifinellas, a name designating the female "Gremlin," and the WAFS, meaning Women's Auxiliary Ferry Service. Many of the original women pilots who have been in the air since 1942 are still active among the WASPS. Their accident rate has been low. They fly the equivalent of more than 7 times around the earth every day and pilot planes of many types and capabilities, from trainers up through the Thunderbolt, Mustang, Marauder, and Fortress.

Thus far these able and patriotic women have not received the award they desire and deserve—namely, military status. Both the Secretary of War and Gen. H. H. Arnold have urged this. A bill now before Congress to achieve it merits passage. The WASP has every right to be as much a part of the military machine as the WAC or the WAVE.

Address at Thirty-ninth Annual Convention of Brith Sholom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the thirty-ninth annual convention of Brith Sholom at Atlantic City, N. J., June 18, 1944:

I am especially happy to be here today. First of all because the occasion is such an important one in the life of your organization, and secondly because it gives me the pleasure of meeting personally the men of Brith Sholom who are carrying on its fine work.

As an active fraternalist myself I can understand and appreciate your interests and activities and the opportunities which they offer for the performance of humanitarian service. In its own field of endeavor Brith Sholom has established a notable record and I want to extend my congratulations to this thirty-ninth annual convention upon the achievements of the order and the various lodges.

From intimate personal contact with many individual members in Philadelphia I am somewhat familiar with the aims and accomplishments of Brith Sholom and hold in high regard those spiritual and philanthropic ideals which motivate its being. I join you in the sincere hope that present events may hasten the day when the people of all the world again may live under the "covenant of peace."

Until that day comes, however, and until we rid the world of the disturbing forces which have brought upon humanity the havoc and suffering it now endures, we face grave issues of conflict and restoration abroad and internal unity and post-war readjustment at home.

Even as we are gathered here our armed forces in France, in Italy, are engaged in bitter struggle, carrying out the long-planned assault upon Hitler's fortress Europe. And in the far-off Pacific, Japan itself feels the first of a series of terrific air blows on their own homeland while our Navy points a spearhead toward the Philippines.

The greatest concentrations of ground, air, and naval might ever conceived or thought possible are participating in these efforts by our armies of liberation. Upon the outcome rests the answer whether the future is to be ruled by agencies of aggression, brutality and barbarism or whether freedom and the God-given rights of human beings are to prevail.

This is a time of test, of trial, and of faith for the people of America—a test of our mettle, our courage and endurance; a trial of our breadth of vision, our statesmanship, and our ability to concentrate on the paramount objective of victory above other, lesser, issues; and a time for humble renewal of our faith that the Lord who made possible this Nation will give it the strength to survive this crisis in our history.

In this grave hour none may count himself a patriot worthy the name who puts personal greed or partisan gain before the cause for which we fight and the unity which that cause requires and demands.

Yet, even under these extreme conditions, calling for the utmost reasonableness and restraint, for fair consideration of the other fellow's point of view, there are some persons who either cannot or will not cast aside the old habits of internal political feuds and of social and economic rivalries of the past. And even religion is not exempt from their intolerance.

I mean those who mistake liberty for license.

I mean those who insist upon full exercise of their own rights, privileges, and immunities, but at the same time encourage the denial of them to others.

I mean those blindly bigoted who exalt religious or racial prejudices above the common good of the whole country to buttress their own political position or to advance selfish, sectional ends.

I mean those who substitute a policy of obstruction for one of deliberative legislation.

I mean those who, although they are close witnesses to the effective marshalling of America's tremendous might under the guiding genius of the President yet deny their own eyes, preferring picayune fault-finding and political bickering to wholehearted cooperation.

But we must not let the destructive delay of the pettifoggers stay our march toward the day of peace with victory, nor permit the peddlers of poison whispers to divide our ranks.

The path of progress has never been smooth. In spite of self-imposed obstacles America is making headway and will continue to advance toward its ultimate goals. When the record of this crucial struggle comes to be written, history will recognize the constructive deeds—and the doers—while the "little group of willful men,' the time wasters, the puny politicians who could not rise to the needs of the hour, and the demagogues, will be lost in obscurity.

In our indignation of the moment we must not lose the long perspective of the historic drama in which we are all playing a part. We can take comfort from the wisdom of the ages handed down by generations of your own faith in the Old Testament where it was written:

"The memory of the righteous shall be a blessing; but the name of the wicked shall perish. The lip of truth shall be established forever; but a lying tongue is but for a moment."

There have been periods in our past when unscrupulous men have sought to fan the flames of religious bigotry, or race hatred, or national animosities for their own political profit or to achieve some economic or social advantage. Many other groups too have felt its pangs.

But always the sound judgment of the great mass of Americans has seen through these schemes and the noxious and deadly poisons have been washed away in the clear, clean spirit of brotherhood which is the foundation stone of this Republic.

This, our way of life, which makes it possible for people of different faiths and varied origins to live together in mutual self-respect and good will, is the way we want to keep America.

This is the thing for which your brothers and sons are fighting—just as their fathers fought 25 years ago. Just as today so there were then efforts to malign the Jews here. But as Ray Murphy, past national commander of the American Legion, said back in those days:

"One need not raise his voice in defense of the American Jew in the World War. He needs no defense. History will ever speak for him in words that none may controvert.

"It is only human to forget, but as long as America is truly American, neither our country nor our people will fail to remember the part our Jewish boys played in that war. The gallantry of their service is written in the records of our Government.

"Those written records may perish, but if time should ever dim the memory of that service in the hearts of the American people, there will yet remain a record that neither time nor tempest may destroy * * * the American cemeteries in France where, side by side—one beneath the Cross of Christianity, one beneath the Star of David—gentile and Jew lie pillowed in eternal glory."

Now, again, the soil of France is hallowed with the blood of American youth.

They come from every part of this broad land, from the farms and the wheatlands, teeming cities, the mining towns, the rural villages. They spring from myriad races and varied nationality backgrounds—but they are all American boys, Protestants, Catholics, and Jews.

Fighting shoulder to shoulder, united in the faith of American brotherhood, in common love of God and country, they seek to preserve each their own individual right to be what they are.

We, here at home, can do no less than to make certain that their sacrifices in our behalf shall not be in vain. Our Army, Navy, and Air Force will win the war abroad but they depend upon us to see that it is not lost at home.

Security after the war can come about only through intelligent exercise of citizenship in the selection of those whose power it will be to build the peace. But neither a President nor Members of Congress can do the job alone. It is up to you and all Americans to make certain that they feel the pressure of the great masses of people everywhere to carry out the universal aspirations of mankind: to enjoy in peace his inalienable rights in a world cleansed of economic and social oppressions and exploitation, of the spirit of nationalism in its narrowest sense, and of the prejudices of racial and religious bigotry.

It is for you and our neighbors, for the great mass of average men and women, who do the most suffering in war, to have something to say as to how we shall do our living afterward.

Only in that way can we assure a future when peace shall bless the people of the world with none to make them afraid.

Evidence Against the Insurance Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it has been assumed by many Members of Congress that people engaged in the insurance business are generally in favor of H. R. 3270. I can testify to the House that this is very far from the case. The insurance agent who attempts to maintain any degree of independence in his business is against this bill. From a very large file of letters which I received commending me upon my first speech against this bill I have selected one, the substance of which I quote herewith:

I have been in the insurance business for many years and have had many scraps with the Bureaucratic Board of Underwriters. In fact I was one who was fined for using my own judgment as to the company in which to place a policy. It's needless to tell you, I did not get scared nor have I ever ceased to tell them of their unfair methods. I place my business where I please but if this legislation should be passed, with the present set up in California, I and other independent agents may be in difficulties. It would take too much space to say what I think of these bureaucrats who are always criticising and calling their Government officials, bureaucrats.

Furthermore, it has been contended that small business would be in favor of the bill because of the false claim that its passage would work against Federal regulation, but I am able to quote one of the most active small businessmen in America as follows:

May I express my hope that you will oppose the passage of H. R. 3270—which would exempt fire-insurance companies from the antitrust laws.

This clearly is a proposal which if enacted would have several evil results.

It would continue the present system under which big industrial and commercial concerns get their fire insurance at less than cost; while the huge profits and salaries of the stock fire-insurance companies are collected from the small commercial and industrial concerns, and small householders and small farmers, by means of rates far above cost.

The very smallest concerns are the hardest hit, by this present, and past, special privilege to the big commercial and industrial concerns.

Finally, from citizens generally there is constant reiteration of the knowledge that the fire-insurance companies pay back to their policyholders in losses considerably less than half of the amount of money they collect in premiums. In this connection I quote a paragraph from a letter received from a citizen of my own State:

Some 20 years ago I spent a year of my time and my own money, along with a Mr. Lange, in attempting to secure fire-insurance-rate regulation here in California. The rates on fire insurance here are notoriously high. Much higher than the so-called national rate accepted by the fire-insurance companies. It amounts to a ratio of approximately 65 percent for expenses and 45 percent for costs. The total amount of overcharge in this State must be now running about twenty-five million annually.

Post-War Highway Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of New Mexico. Mr. Speaker, the House Committee on Roads has been working for many months on a road bill. Involved in the new bill is a change in formula whereby the most sparsely settled States with relatively large areas will get a little less proportionately than they have heretofore received.

However, the Western States are not going to be too disappointed with this decision. They realize that the chairman of the Roads Committee, the Honorable J. W. ROBINSON, of Utah, has long understood the problems of the West and has been and is now the chairman of the caucus of the Western States of the House of Representatives. While this committee has not reported out as favorable a bill as he might have liked and as some of us might have desired, it is probably the best bill that can be obtained and as good a bill as any Western State has a right to expect.

As evidence of the public acceptance of this bill in the Western States themselves, I present an editorial from the Albuquerque Tribune of Wednesday, June 14, 1944, entitled "A Break for New Mexico," which expresses approval of the new bill. The editorial follows:

A BREAK FOR NEW MEXICO

New Mexico and other public-land States will get a break in post-war highway construction if the recommendation of the House Committee on Roads is followed.

This committee has recommended a sliding scale of Federal highway funds apportioned on the basis of the amount of Federal land within State boundaries.

Sparsely populated States, of which New Mexico is one, lost heavily by one change made in the basis of apportionment. Under the old allotment system funds were made available on the basis of one-third for population, one-third for area and one-third for post road mileage. Under the new basis the allotment is one-half for population, one-fourth for area, one-fourth for post road mileage.

To compensate for the fact that Federal lands cannot be taxed by the State, the public-land States will get a much larger share of Federal funds than those States having less than 5 percent of Federally held land. The Federal allotment will be increased by a percentage of the remaining cost equal to the percentage that Federal lands in the State is of the total area.

Under the bill as reported out by the committee New Mexico would have to provide about 24 percent State funds against 76 percent Federal funds for the first year of highway construction after the war and about 30 percent against 70 percent Federal funds for the next 2 years.

New Mexico's tentative share of the $1,500,000,000 authorized in the bill for 3 years' construction has not yet been computed.

A sobering thought is how to raise the money to match Federal funds and at the same time pay interest and principal instalments on the State's present highway debentures.

Electricity Used and Overcharges, by States, in 1943

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important issues confronting the American people today, and especially for the post-war period, is the power question—how they are to secure an ample supply of electricity at rates they can afford to pay. We are in an electric age and this issue vitally effects us all, from the largest manufacturer to the remotest tenant farmer.

I have devoted years of work and study to this question. As co-author of the bill creating the Tennessee Valley Authority, as a leader of the fight in the House for rural electrification, and as chairman of Public Power Bloc in the House for years, I have witnessed, and in my humble way have contributed to, one of the greatest economic improvements the world has ever seen.

With the creation of the Tennessee Valley Authority, providing the Nation with a yardstick showing the American people what electricity should cost them, with the developments on the Columbia River, and with the development of rural electrification, demonstrating to the world that electricity can be supplied to every farmer in America at rates he can afford to pay, our country has leaped forward into the electric age, a new civilization, if you please, the like of which our people has scarcely dreamed.

If we men in public life will only carry on the fight with the same devotion and determination our brave men are displaying on the various fighting fronts, when this war is over and our victorious troops come marching home they will not find this a land of depression and despair, but they will find it a land of hope and opportunity with the most "high, exciting, gratifying prospects" spread out before them and their children this world has ever known.

If we do our duty, they will find an electrified America showering its blessings alike upon the strong and the weak, the rich and the poor, supplying the energy to transform our unlimited raw materials into finished products, supplying employment to untold millions, and stimulating and enriching every commercial enterprise. They will find it lightening the burdens, supplying conveniences, and improving the health in every home, taking light and life and hope and relief from drudgery to the farm homes of the Nation and making them the most desirable places on earth in which to live.

But this cannot be done, and it never will be done, if we permit selfish interests to monopolize the power business, squeeze production, and raise rates in order to pay enormous dividends on watered stocks.

This is one of the greatest economic issues on earth today, and no Member of Congress can dodge it long. As I have said before, electricity is the lifeblood of our advancing civilization. The cheaper the rates the more freely it flows, and the more freely it flows the greater are its benefits to mankind.

The power business is a public and not a private business. Electricity is now a necessity of our modern life, and it must be handled by a monopoly of some kind either public or private; for no community can afford to have a half dozen, or a dozen, or more, different concerns supplying electricity to its citizens. The overhead expenses would be too great. And, besides, the water power of this Nation already belongs to the Government. It is public power to begin with.

When I began this fight the American people were using only 40,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity a year. Last year, 1943, they purchased and used 184,000,000,000, to say nothing of the amount generated and used by those concerns that make their own power, such as the Ford Motor Co. For that 184,000,000,000 the American people were overcharged more than $1,200,000,000, as you will see by examining the tables I am inserting as a part of these remarks.

When we created the Tennessee Valley Authority in 1933 there was no rural electrification in America, and the domestic consumers of the Nation were paying an average of 10 cents a kilowatt-hour. Today they are paying an average of 3.57 cents a kilowatt-hour, or about twice the rates now paid in the T. V. A. area.

Today we have a system of rural electrification that covers practically the entire country, and, as soon as materials are made available, we expect to extend that service to reach every farm home in the Nation. The farmers are demanding it, and they are going to get it.

In 1933 the domestic consumers in the T. V. A. area were paying an average of 10 cents a kilowatt-hour for their electricity; today they are paying an average of 1.86 cents a kilowatt-hour—although at that time the power company was buying the power produced by the Government at Muscle Shoals for less than 2 mills a kilowatt-hour wholesale, while the municipalities and cooperative power associations are paying the T. V. A. an average of 4.25 mills a kilowatt-hour wholesale for that same power today.

At that rate every dollar expended on the T. V. A. will be paid back within a generation—with interest. Remember that while the private power companies were paying less than 2 mills a kilowatt-hour wholesale for this power at Muscle Shoals, they were charging residential consumers 10 cents a kilowatt-hour for it; and now when the municipalities and cooperative power associations are paying the T. V. A. 4.25 mills a kilowatt-hour wholesale for this same power, they are selling it to the residential consumers for an average of 1.86 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The same thing is true of the vast development on the Columbia River and the Colorado. Nothing has ever done so much for the people of the far West as has the Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and Boulder Dams, as you will see from the tables I am inserting.

What is being done in the Tennessee Valley and the Columbia River areas can be done for the entire Nation. It must be done, and it will be done; and the sooner the better.

While there were 184,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours generated with coal, gas, oil, and water power and sold in 1943, there were 230,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of undeveloped water power going to waste every year. It should be harnessed and used to help rebuild America after this war.

Look at the figures for California. The people of that State were overcharged $48,955,147 last year, in spite of the cheap rates in the Los Angeles area provided by Boulder Dam. If it were not for Boulder Dam, the people of California would be overcharged more than $100,000,000 a year.

And if we could get the power generated at Shasta Dam and Hetch Hetchy distributed at yardstick rates, it would just about wipe out that $48,955,000 annual overcharge the people of the State are now paying, which falls largely on the people of the San Francisco area and the rest of northern California. That is the reason the private power interests are turning heaven and earth to get control of the Shasta Dam power, just as they are now monopolizing the power from Hetch Hetchy, in flagrant violation of the Raker Act.

Look at the State of New York, overcharged $217,543,269 for electricity last year, according to the Ontario rates just across the line, and yet many of the Representatives for that State oppose the development of the power on the St. Lawrence, which would provide 10,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours a year of the cheapest electricity on earth and furnish a yardstick for New York and New England that would likely result in a reduction of rates in that area of more than $340,000,000 a year. Oh, I know the opposition will say that the Ontario system pays no taxes. I have shown before that the taxes paid by private power interests in New York amounted to only about $47,000,000 a year, which taken from $217,000,000 the people of the State were overcharged for electricity last year would still leave an overcharge of $170,000,000.

The taxes paid annually by private power interests in that area, including New York and all the New England States, amount to only about $87,000,000 a year, which taken from the $340,000,000 overcharges they paid last year would still leave a staggering burden of net overcharges in New York and New England amounting to $253,000,000 a year, according to the Ontario rates.

All this means higher rates, smaller consumption, and less of the benefits of electricity—one of God's greatest gifts to man.

While we are taking civilization to the rest of the world, we might do a little missionary work here at home.

Personally I have done it; I began at home. The people I represent enjoy the benefits of the cheapest electricity in America. They get their electricity cheaper than do the people of Buffalo, N. Y., in hearing distance of Niagara Falls, where a large part of Ontario's cheap electricity is generated, and cheaper than do the people of San Francisco in sight of Hetch Hetchy, or the people of Sacramento, in reach of Shasta Dam; and cheaper than do the people of Illinois, Pennsylvania, Ohio, or West Virginia, where they have the cheapest, finest coal on earth, as well as gas, oil, and water power; and cheaper than do the people of Texas, Arkansas, Oklahoma, or Louisiana, where they have enough natural gas going to waste to electrify the entire South at rates cheaper than we are now paying in the T. V. A. area, and cheaper than the people of Ontario now enjoy.

The people of Ohio were overcharged more than $91,000,000 for their electricity last year, according to the Ontario rates, as you will see from the attached tables; which, after deducting the $16,000,000 taxes paid by private power companies in Ohio, left a net overcharge of $75,000,000, or about $15,000,000 more than the entire wheat crop of the State would have brought if the farmers of Ohio had shipped every grain of it to Chicago and paid the freight themselves; while the extra burdens of overcharges paid by the people of Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana, and other Southern States from Virginia to Arizona outside the T. V. A. area, equaled, on an average, the value of from 1,000 to 2,500 bales of cotton to the county. And in Pennsylvania, Illinois, Virginia, and West Virginia, where they have an abundance of the finest, cheapest coal on earth, as well as gas, oil, and water power, the conditions are just as bad, or worse.

Electricity can be generated with coal, gas, oil, or water power anywhere in the United States and distributed at the T. V. A. yardstick rates, the Tacoma rates, the Bonneville rates, or the Ontario rates without loss on legitimate investments.

Read the tables below, look at the overcharges for your own State, and ask yourself what you have done to relieve the situation. Ask yourself what you have done to extend this service to the toiling farmers of your State.

These are questions the people are going to ask you. Do not wait for your successor to answer them. Look over these tables, take a day, a week, or a month off to study them, and then tell the people you are sent here to represent what you have done and what you propose to do in order to relieve them of this enormous burden.

Tell them what you propose to do in order to provide the blessings of cheap electricity to every human being in America and make this the richest, the brightest, and the most prosperous country in all the world—now and for generations to come.

At this point I am inserting tables showing the number of kilowatt-hours used by the residential, commercial, and industrial consumers of electricity during the year 1943, together with the cost thereof and the overcharges paid; and also a composite table showing the totals.

I hope every Member will study these tables carefully.

The matter referred to follows:

Here is the table showing the amount of electricity used by the residential consumers in every State in 1943, the amount paid for it, and the overcharges according to the T. V. A. rates, the Tacoma, Wash., rates, the Bonneville rates, and the Ontario, Canada rates:

Wallace Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oil City (Pa.) Derrick of June 17, 1944:

WALLACE AGAIN

While magnificent performance is being rendered by our Army and Navy in France, Italy, and the Pacific, things are going haywire on the political and economic fronts at home.

There is a dangerous political situation developing in France due to the Allied disinclination to support De Gaulle. Whether he is persona non grata to Churchill or Roosevelt, or to both, is something we do not know. This may pass off, but should it delay or prevent French military or underground collaboration with the Allies, this rupture with De Gaulle may prove to be serious.

Now comes Vice President WALLACE with a pamphlet issued by the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations in which he says the United States, in its own interest, should promote the economic and political freedom of India, the Netherland Indies, and other colonial areas in the Pacific, and should help bring defeated Japan into the ranks of a free Asia after war. "It is to our interest to approve and cooperate with all trends which lead to our own standard of government of the people, by the people, and for the people," he says.

This is sophomoric logic. Are the 318,000,000 people of India capable of governing themselves? The two religions in India, Moslem and Hindu, are fanatical groups. Each would want to dominate the government. If India were independent which of them would? Our system of government is all right for us, but how do we know it would be to nations which have absolutely no concept of democracy, whose people are incapable of exercising any voice in their governments and who, unless held in check, might start another world conflagration at the drop of a hat.

Nations which through ignorance or lack of adaption to modernism are incapable of ruling themselves must be ruled by other nations which have great administrative capacity. This has been the role of Britain in India, Arabia, Burma, Malaya, Egypt, and much of Africa for upward of a century. Would Mr. WALLACE destroy this administrative power in a night? There is a certain virtue in imperialism. It keeps backward but potentially troublesome nations in check.

If we regain the Philippines we are to give them their freedom in 1946. This means that after the billions of dollars we have spent on them we are ready to wash our hands of them. Eventually those islands will be exploited by predatory nations and thus become a constant source of annoyace to the world.

What is particularly mischievous in the Wallace article on India is what it may do to stir up contention with Britain at a time when Britain and the United States are giving everything they have to win a war involving to a tremendous degree the future of both. WALLACE'S inclusion of the East Indies will stir up the animosity of the Dutch. Now he is over in China, whither he was sent with the blessing of President Roosevelt. For what purpose? The good Lord only knows.

To clap the climax Mr. Roosevelt has told National Democratic Chairman Hannegan that WALLACE is again his choice for Vice President, although the President was told by Hannegan that "nearly everybody is dead set against WALLACE on the ticket and that this is particularly true in the South and Middle West." To which the President replied: "I had a talk with HENRY about the situation before he left for China, and I personally want to see him on the ticket."

No matter how much WALLACE rocks the boat the President cannot now disavow his utterances. He is his choice again for Vice President and he goes to China on his recommendation. What a satisfaction it would be if the American people were to kick that whole kit and caboodle out of power. This is the people's year of opportunity.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago I made a brief visit to my district and had an opportunity to get first-hand information as to the people's views on governmental affairs.

The people are most interested in winning the war and getting the boys back home as soon as possible. With the first news that the invasion was on came fervent prayers from all, and the people joined with the Members of Congress in calling for divine guidance and protection for our brave boys fighting everywhere, as we stood with bowed heads in silent prayer. I shall never forget my feelings and emotions on that occasion and more than ever before I realized what this war and all its horrors mean to those who are fighting the war and to their loved ones; what it means to our country and to the world today and for generations to come. We, as the elected representatives of the people, realized more than ever before what a free government should be and we thanked God that we still have a chance to continue as a free government, and the people are more determined than ever before to protect and to continue our form of government, of, by, and for the people.

I hope it will be comforting to the mothers, fathers, wives, children, and loved ones of those in our armed services that Congress has provided everything which the armed services have requested, both for the finest training possible, and for an abundance of the best and latest modern equipment of every kind for their protection and to enable them to end the war victoriously. I am happy that I have supported all legislation to provide this excellent training and equipment.

Every citizen realizes we are all in this war together and that each has his part to perform. Some must fight, some must supply the equipment, while others must produce food. We all must do our full part without fail. We must buy War bonds and back our boys to the full limit of our ability in everything that will help win the war.

At the same time, the people are demanding that their tax money and their War bond money be expended for winning the war and paying the legitimate expenses of government. They have had enough of "planned extravagance" by bureaucratic theorists. They want good common sense applied to the management of all Government departments and every effort made and every resource fully utilized in the war effort. They deeply resent any and all maneuvering for political advantages that would prolong the war. They realize that we have the best admirals and generals in the world. These officers have devoted their lives to the study and mastery of the art and science of war, and the people want these military and naval authorities to run the war and to determine the war strategy. They are the only ones in America qualified and trained to determine strategy and to execute the plans for conducting the war.

In addition to having the best military and naval leaders, we have the best Army, Navy, and Air Force in the world, fully trained and equipped with the best and most modern implements of war. These forces are doing a fine job, and under such able leadership, they will win the war, with the aid and cooperation of American industrial management and American labor, together with the American farmer and the American taxpayer and bond buyer, and we will win the war regardless of who is elected President in November. I think we will win the war more quickly if a Republican President is elected because he would leave the conducting of the war and the determination of war strategy in the hands of the military and naval experts who are now in charge, and he would not attempt to put Harry Hopkins and his like forward as military strategists. He would greatly aid the war effort by putting our Government in order, by putting competent persons in charge of the various Government activities and by stopping the boondoggling, the mismanagement and the waste and extravagance that have been ever present since the New Deal came into power. He would protect and defend our constitutional form of government and prevent the establishing of a totalitarian form of government.

Next to winning the war, the people want to win the peace and reestablish constitutional government by law. They want cooperation among the nations of the world that will prevent future wars. They are rightfully determined that they will not lose here at home what the boys are fighting over there to preserve. They are wondering what secret agreements have been made and whether such understandings may now exist which would be a bar to world peace. They are quite worried over the reports of what seems to be very poor diplomacy in our foreign policy, and already come stories that our foreign policy has caused us to be hated by most of the governments of the world. The President has gone on the false theory that we could make lasting friends of nations by giving them money and by being overgenerous with our charity.

Real Democrats, as well as Republicans, want a return to constitutional government. They want the legislative branch to make the laws and the executive branch to administer them, and they want the courts to be free and unpampered. During the past 11½ years the New Deal administration has attempted to take over legislative functions, and pack the courts; has established a strong bureaucracy which now practically governs the people with rules, regulations, and directives, many of which are unreasonable and intolerable. It has practically destroyed local government. This bureaucracy was brought into being by Executive order, and its purpose seems to be to regiment everything and everybody, to definitely establish a government of planned economy about which the President boasted so much a few years back, an economy that was planned by the bureaucratic heads now in control. This bureaucracy can be ended only by the people who are determined to see that order and common sense replace the wild bungling, waste, and mismanagement of this administration. The people realize that unless our Nation stops the waste of the taxpayers' money, chaos and bankruptcy will result. We must remember that no bureaus in Wahhington were ever abolished by the voluntary action of the present administration, and if these many and useless bureaus are to be abolished, it must be done over the protests of the bureaucrats.

The people know that when the New Deal came into power our national debt was about $20,000,000,000. Mr. Roosevelt, as a candidate in 1932, expressed grave fears that we could not survive as a nation with such an enormous public debt. The first bill he advocated and asked Congress to pass was the so-called Economy Act, which was specifically titled "A bill to preserve the credit of the United States Government." This bill economized on the pensions and benefits paid to our war veterans. It reduced the payments made to most of the veterans and took all payments away from many of them. When this was accomplished, all pretense of economy was gone; and the New Deal entered upon the greatest spending spree ever known.

But the payments taken from many veterans were never reestablished. From that time on we have heard no fears expressed by the President or those high in his administration as to the solvency of the Government, although the national debt was more than doubled before the present war began, and now we are advised that we are faced with a probable national debt of over $350,000,000,000. It is estimated that all the property in America is valued at about $350,000,000,000. This, added to the debt of the local subdivisions of government, amounts to a greater value than everything in the country. Our forefathers spent hundreds of years of honest effort and, through their endurance and thrift, accumulated a strong and wealthy United States. In 11 short years the New Deal has squandered and wasted practically all those who had gone before were able to accumulate. The people remember that after the passage of the Economy Act the New Deal adopted a policy of spending, under the false theory that we could have prosperity by borrowing and spending. It was even boasted that the New Deal would tax and tax, and spend and spend, and elect and elect. The President said we should not be concerned about how large the public debt was because "we just owed it to ourselves." We notice that when we pay taxes we do not "pay them to ourselves," and the increased taxes being paid definitely show the fallacy of the President's theory about "just owing ourselves."

The fact is that we have in Washington the greatest, the most powerful, and the most expensive bureaucracy that has ever existed. This bureaucracy is steadily and surely taking from the people the freedoms and liberties granted them under our Constitution as a Republic, which freedoms our forefathers fought and died to establish and preserve.

There is one civilian employee in the War and Navy Departments for every six men in uniform, and this number does not include the thousands of Army and Navy men who are performing clerical work, or the thousands of WAVES, WAC's, SPARS, and so forth. There is a total of 3,556,909 civilian Federal workers, which is over six times as many as were on the pay roll when President Roosevelt took office. This civilian bureaucracy is costing the people over $8,000,000,000 a year. It is not confined to Washington but is in every section of our Nation, with branch offices everywhere. In many States there are several times as many Federal employees as there are State employees. In Indiana there are 33,400 Federal employees and only 9,419 State employees. As one example of New Deal extravagance and waste, I might mention that the O. P. A. employs 2,700 lawyers, with 500 of them in Washington, to write rules and regulations which are so technical and involved that no one can understand most of them; while Britain, with a rationing and price administration which has worked very well, has a regular staff of only 10 lawyers.

Of all the many and various freedoms declared for by the President, the Vice President, and the First Lady, there is no mention of freedom from bureaucracy or freedom of private enterprise and personal initiative.

Apparently the right hand of many bureaus does not know what the left hand is doing. Chester Bowles, O. P. A. Administrator, in a magazine article of May 8, 1944, predicted that no end to rationing of any meats or canned goods could be expected before 1945. His statement was:

> Termination of rationing, whenever it is, will be attended by many difficulties. * * * If I were to make a guess my timetable would be something like this: Meat: some relief in 1945, with luck, and possibly end when the war in Europe is over. Processed foods: when the war in the Pacific ends.

While this article was being circulated, canned goods rationing was ended and most meats were made point-free, and, mark you, Mr. Bowles is supposed to be running the O. P. A. Now, to make the matter more confusing, Mr. Bowles has told Congress that he was quite confident that point-free meat will go back on the rationed list in 30 to 60 days, or perhaps early next year. Many people think rationing is being managed from a political standpoint rather than from the necessities of the situation, and from the actions of the O. P. A., the W. F. A., the W. P. B., and other regulatory agencies, these opinions seem to be wholly justified.

The people remember that in March 1942 Attorney General Biddle made a speech to a group of New Deal officeholders in which he urged them to "hold the political line," and stated that "the New Deal is a political party." Michael Streight, the toastmaster at this meeting, arrogantly boasted that "the New Deal is more dynamic than fascism and more revolutionary than communism."

The people of all parties recognize that the New Deal is not representative of the Democratic Party's philosophy of government. It is as foreign to the principles and policies of the Democratic Party as it is to those of the Republican Party. They realize that the New Deal is, as Attorney General Biddle said, "a political party," regardless of under what party label its members may hold office.

The New Deal has fully demonstrated its inability to properly run the Government. The President has placed impractical and inexperienced personnel in charge, and their actions and their rules and regulations have shown an utter disregard for the rights of our citizens and have worked useless and great hardships on our people.

The reports of the investigations of every congressional committee has shown an alarming state of affairs. The Byrd committee and the Truman committee have exposed the most wasteful and reckless spending of Government money in all history From the time the New Deal caused little pigs to be slaughtered and crops to be plowed under, up to the present moment, we have had nothing but mismanagement and waste. Even today our farmers cannot get the farm machinery needed to cultivate their land, while great quantities of this much-needed farm machinery has been and is being sent for foreign countries.

The American people have been looking in the mirror of the past 11 years. That mirror shows the true picture of the greatest bureaucracy ever known and the greatest waste and mismanagement in all history. It shows our people are governed largely by bureaucratic rules and regulations and by Presidential directives, not created by laws, but by Executive orders of the President. Between March 1933 and December 1942 there were 3,565 Executive orders issued, and alphabetical agencies have been created so fast it is difficult to keep count of them, although as a candidate in 1932 the President promised to reduce the number of boards, bureaus, and commissions. The people realize this overgrown bureaucracy is a rank departure from constitutional government and will permanently change our form of government unless it is ended real soon. We cannot expect the New Deal to do any differently in the future than it has done in the past. Therefore, the people are determined to elect a Republican President and a Republican Congress in November and save our form of constitutional government, ano when the boys come home in victory they will be happy that we have saved here what they fought for over there.

The people know that most of the so-called shortages are not real shortages at all but have been created by the unwise and unwarranted action of the W. P. B. The people will gladly do without anything and undergo any inconvenience if, by so doing, it will assist in winning the war. What the people complain about is the useless and unnecessary restrictions placed upon them by incompetent bureaucrats, who have as their goal the ruination of private business and the establishing of a totalitarian form of government. The people know that every un-American organization, every group opposed to the form of government established by our forefathers, have formally gone on record for a fourth term for the President. They know Earl Browder and Harry Bridges, whom the President released from prison 2 years ago, have carried the torch and blazed the way. They nave chartered the course which will likely be followed by the New Deal convention.

We have been taught that the proper way to cure an illness is to find the cause and then remove it. The people know it accomplishes nothing to condemn the heads of the various Government departments, boards, bureaus, and commissions for their unwise and unwarranted actions. It does no good to complain of the Hopkins, the Tugwells, the Biddles and their kind or the thousands of impractical crackpots, fellow travelers; or the inexperienced young so-called economists, because they are only the illness; they are simply doing what their Chief would have them do. The President appoints them to office, he fixes their policies, he approves what they do and he keeps them in office. He is the cause, and I firmly believe the voters will remove this cause in November.

The people know that today there is only one branch of government which is not under administration control and that is the Congress. This probably accounts for the New Deal anti-Congress tirades and for all the propaganda against the people's representatives. Congress is the only branch that can curb the dictums of the bureaucrats. The people realize that their representatives are fighting to prevent the bureaucrats from controlling the finances of the Nation and from ruling the people through rules, regulations, and directives, and to preserve constitutional government, with its checks and balances, which have made this country great.

The people know that, if a Republican majority in Congress is elected in November, our form of government is saved, and they will elect a Republican majority.

Oil Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, we have just finished the appropriations for the Army and the Navy. More than $80,000,000,000 have been made available for their use. There was no disposition to argue with them. They presented their estimates of what they would need and we gave it to them. No single thing that can be bought with this money is to be denied or withheld.

In this same session we refused to do anything about one of the most critical of the supplies. Oil is needed in greater and greater amounts. We could have insured the supply a few days ago when we voted on the Disney amendment.

The bill would have provided a 35-cent per barrel increase in the price of crude oil. It would have insured against shortage of supply for all the tanks, planes, ships, and the many other forms of oil-powered equipment which the $80,000,000,000 will buy.

The Office of Price Administration, in its persistent and distorted representations of the oil price question got out big posters and sent them to Members of Congress to show that the increase in crude-oil prices would cost Government $175,000,000 annually. Well, suppose it did? Are we stinting on anything else that is needed to win this war? Think of it as an insurance premium to guarantee that the $80,000,000,000 will not be wasted, for wasted it will be, and countless lives with it if we fail on oil supply.

The O. P. A. also used a poster to show that the consumer at home would be penalized $375,000,000 a year. It would increase his cost of living, said O. P. A.

When something has been taken from a man, it is not inflationary to give it back to him. I have heard of no concern outside the price-control circles on this point. The consumers would like to be able to use their cars. They have been driven into higher cost transportation by the stupid, blundering, and malicious policy on oil.

I am making these remarks in the hope that some of us may give some thought to this matter when we go home. Something is going to be needed. Nothing which will increase total supply is proposed by the people who have been given the authority on this question. There is a subsidy proposal and as to my own district it will be a kind of life preserver for the man with the little wells, but it will not increase the total supply. A subsidy is static, a price increase is dynamic.

An oil price increase has been sought, requested, and demanded for many months. There is nothing inflationary about it. It would be creative. Every new oil field found and every old one stimulated adds not alone to the current supply, which is our first concern now, but to the wealth of the Nation. An oil field goes on and on, for years, an addition to the Nation's supply, a means of employment, and a source of taxable wealth.

As I said, we did not solve the problem by refusing to pass the Disney amendment; we merely postponed its solution. There were 178 of us who tried to solve it. Some may have been influenced by the O. P. A.'s representations that nothing was needed to increase oil supply. The consumer knows there is not enough, the Navy knows it, for it has been warning its shore stations to conserve every drop and get along with as little as possible. The Petroleum Administration has recently told us how desperately short of heating oil the New England area was last winter. In places they were down to a single day's supply of kerosene and one tanker at sea had to be diverted to Boston to prevent suffering. The oil producers know that nothing can be done under the price now frozen at the level of 1941, for their costs have increased to the point where they have nothing left for expansion of operations.

A solution must be found. The price-control officials have said that their refusal to do anything is final. They are sustained and comforted in their attitude by the refusal of Congress to make them do their duty.

It is still a congressional problem. It will undoubtedly be put before you again a little later. I recommend that you think it over some more.

I'm a Little Mockingbird

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, like our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Mississippi, Representative RANKIN, many of us have heard the sweet voice of the mocking bird as he sings near the entrance to the Capitol during these dark days of war.

Following the remarks made by Congressman RANKIN the other day, an employee of the other body, Horace C. Carlisle, has been inspired to write a beautiful little poem entitled "I'm a Little Mockingbird," which I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD:

I'M A LITTLE MOCKINGBIRD

(Tune: Listen to the Mockingbird)

I'm noted not for beauty,
For beauty, for beauty—
I'm noted not for beauty—
But for songs of cheer that issue from my mouth.
I sing—to sing's my duty,
My duty, my duty—
I sing—to sing's my duty,
In the rhythmic realm of music in the South.

CHORUS

I'm a little mockingbird,
Yes, a little mockingbird,
Whose songs of inspiration catch the ear.
I'm a little mockingbird,
Yes, a little mockingbird,
Thrilling all the Sunny Southland with my cheer.

My heart sings in its sorrow.
Its sorrow, its sorrow—
My heart sings in its sorrow,
A sorrow that was never told in words.
The songs I sing, I borrow,
I borrow, I borrow—
The songs I sing, I borrow
From my Sunny Southland's other singing birds.

A Time for Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, there has been no time in the war now waging when we could neglect unity at home in favor of the privileges and customs of peacetime. The hour for unity and the hour for war struck as one note from the clock of history. But such is human nature that when the fortunes of war turned from those of loss and retreat to those of defense and attack many of us at home concluded that the emergency had passed and that we might well resume the situation of optimistic spectators waiting for the game to be over. This is a great error. The time for unity is now, and it will remain now until it is replaced by the time of victory—complete, final, world-wide victory.

Mr. Speaker, we find no lack of unity in our armed forces, nor in the armed forces of the Allied Nations as a whole. Divisions do not disband with every favorable turn of strategy. The Navy continues to plow the sea, and the air forces remain in forward flight. It is only at home outside of the defense industries, the transportation lines, and the works that produce for war, that we find the tendency to listen for the command: "As you were."

Mr. Speaker, it is not demanded, nor should it be demanded justly, that because a war is in progress we should abandon the ways of representative government. The machinery of ordinary administration of domestic affairs must go on; the courts must function, and the Congress must legislate for all the needs of the people. Party rivalry aimed at developing the best policies and the best candidates for public office must continue. But we must recognize that all these things are subordinate to the main enterprise that faces us now of winning the war. The householders must expect that, with war needs doubling and trebling the burden on the productive and conserving capacity of the Nation, that capacity must be enlarged at all costs, and we must reduce our freedom of action and scale of living at home that the product saved may enhance the war effort. No matter how we may seem beset by regulations, deprivations, and calls on our money and our energy, we must remember that the Nation as a whole and the principles for which it stands are even more beset and if the Nation falls, so must we all.

This is not a war for the rights of certain classes of individuals. It is a war to uphold the basic principles of national life as set out in our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution. It is the common heritage of all human right that is attacked and that must be defended and preserved. Individuals in a conquered country lose all their rights.

Our goal is not victory alone, but early victory. Saving blood, sweat, tears, and treasure. A material shortening of the war would mean more to all of us than all the reforms, political victories, changes of policy, and adjustments of the burdens of citizenship that all the factions, blocs, and partisans could catalog in an era of peace.

Let us not delude ourselves in the belief that our fighting forces are substituting for us. They have their job and are doing it. The man at the controls of a B–29 and the men firing the guns ask of us nothing more than that we back them up at home in the purchase of bonds, the payment of taxes, and in obedience of those regulations that are made to set free for war all the surplus energy and materials we can possibly spare. They simply ask us to do our job while they are doing their job.

Mr. Speaker, if we are to retain our functions as citizens by participating in political discussions, let us do so with an eye to proportion. We cannot expect all the sacrifices to be made by our armed forces, and unless we give them a better example we will find our tendency to separate at home will have a bad effect on those from whom we expect far greater unity, obedience, devotion, courage, and sacrifice on the battle front.

For over a century and a half philosophers and historians have spoken of our democracy as an experiment. Lord Bryce predicted we would be wrecked on the rocks of selfishness and class animosity. Even Lincoln over 80 years ago posed the question whether our Nation as first conceived "could long endure." Let us find the same solution in union that Lincoln found—the Union that gave strength—the Union that gave continued life to our country.

Mr. Speaker, Rome fell when selfishness and corruption displaced the unity that bound the empire together. We may well take a lesson from history for if we abandon unity now in pursuit of individual or class advantage we will have nothing left worth fighting for.

The nineteenth century opened by the triumph of democracy as a design for government after the great revolution. The twentieth century opened with the rumblings of a counter-revolution that professed to see a lack of efficiency in a democracy. Groups rose that sought to mobilize forces, not through common consent but by manipulating power so as to divide peoples in a nation into two classes, the governing and the governed. Arbitrary power achieved a certain material progress at the expense of common liberty.

This was followed by designs of nations for a similar use of power against smaller nations. Supermen dreamed of supernations and in the language of Mussolini democracy was sneered at as an "outmoded experiment." The counter-revolution was on from the beginning that struck down voluntary unity of effort and substituted for it the selfish plans of a few backed not by consent but by dishonesty and force. The only defense is a swing back to free and equal cooperation for the common good. This is our hope today—that unity may bind every class and every citizen in a common effort to avoid conquest and to live in the free air of peace.

A. F. of L. Endorses International Office for Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the May 1944 issue of the American Federationist, the official organ of the American Federation of Labor, is devoted to a presentation of labor's place in international affairs. It is gratifying to find this great organization addressing itself not only to an assertion of its rights but to an assumption of its duties and responsibilities in the international field. This is not a new approach for labor; in fact, no group has contributed more richly to the promotion of international cooperation in the broad sense than have the organized workers, functioning through their respective free trade unions. It is probable that Samuel Gompers, more than any other one person in the world, was responsible for the establishment of the International Labor Office in Geneva. The I. L. O. today stands as an eloquent tribute to his great work.

Today, labor joins with a number of other groups in asking for the recognition of education in the new world machinery, when that is set up. Labor, recognizing the need for an International Office of Education, is today pressing for the establishment of such an office. The issue of the American Federationist to which I have just referred, carries an article by James Marshall, one of the vice chairmen of the American Association for an International Office of Education. This article merits a large reading audience, for the principle it sets forth is a sound and truly social principle.

I therefore ask permission to have this article printed in the RECORD.

One of the vice chairmen of the American Association for an International Office of Education was Msgr. George Johnson. Monsignor Johnson has just passed away. He literally gave his life for the advancement of the fine ideals and principles for which he has stood through all his life. Many eloquent tributes have been paid him, resolutions of sympathy and of praise have been pouring in to his relatives and to the authorities of his church. Among the tributes paid to this great man was a resolution adopted by the Washington Central Labor Union, which simply tells the story of the man's greatness. He sought to help every child of every race and creed. He lived his faith in his every act.

The resolution expressing the tribute of the Washington Central Labor Union to this great cleric and great educator is as follows:

Whereas Msgr. George Johnson, a noted educator and cleric, passed away today while delivering a commencement address; and

Whereas Monsignor Johnson has rendered a great and rich service to the promotion of truly social concepts in and through education; and

Whereas Monsignor Johnson always concerned himself for the welfare of every child, regardless of race, rank, or creed, seeking ever to help all children: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Washington Central Labor Union mourns the loss of this great public servant; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the rector of Catholic University, to the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and to the sister of Monsignor Johnson.

LABOR'S INTEREST IN AN INTERNATIONAL OFFICE FOR EDUCATION

(By James Marshall)

In the proceedings of the sixty-third annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, held last October, there is a small but important recommendation of approval for a general plan for an international office for education. Thus an overwhelming section of American labor went on record, well in advance of other organizations and agencies, in recognition of the importance of education to post-war peace and stability.

This is no accident. Labor leadership has long seen the connection between oppression of labor and illiteracy. All of labor knows that the strengthening of the position of labor is closely linked with the development of educational opportunities. All of labor knows equally that world understanding and international relationships need, as a sound base, the widening of educational opportunity. It does not take elaborate charts to show the relationship. A quick glance over the map will show that coolie wages and substandard living go hand in hand with restriction of education to a favored few; hand in hand with a denial to large masses of people of the most elementary opportunities for educational advancement.

There is certainly a connection between low standards of education and substandard conditions of work. The illiterate, uneducated country using sweated labor is a continuing threat to the workers in lands with high educational and living standards. This is true not only when you look over the broad map of the world. It is true within any one country. The same rigorous law applies within the United States. The difficulties in organizing labor have been greatest in those areas of the country where illiteracy is highest, where educational opportunity is most restricted.

Such factors were unquestionably in the minds of the delegates to the 1943 convention of the American Federation of Labor. But labor leadership also recognized that plans for world peace and security cannot be left dependent upon the old devices of politics and government and international economic schemes. The rock-bottom basis for peace is, of course, a genuine understanding among peoples and nations. While no overnight miracles are to be expected, such genuine understanding can only come about by the intelligent, flexible, and wise use of the forces and instrumentalities of education.

There was a wise note of caution in labor's conclusion—a caution which it is essential we keep before us; namely, that education is not something to be imposed on a people from without; that it must be home grown, though it may be helped and encouraged and nursed along by the friendly influences of international cooperation.

The report of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor reads strikingly:

"Just as the international labor organization was made an agency of the League of Nations potent for lifting the status of labor throughout the world, the proposal is now maturing to include a department of education in addition to that of health under whatever agency may replace the League of Nations. We believe that labor should favor such a proposal.

"However, this agency should perform research and clearance functions and should not be used for any plan to impose cultures or ideologies upon nations or regimes. In such an agency labor should emphasize that education is more than formal schooling and that ways should be developed to assist adults in making the experiences of life educational of mind and spirit. Culture is not limited to study of the humanities, but is the experience of a people in their work, their group activities, including politics, their creative enterprises, their recreation and play.

"Labor could well insist in a world educational agency that the cultural autonomy of nations should be not only safeguarded and developed but enriched by opportunities to share the knowledge and experiences of other nations. Culture achieved through the educational experiences of life is a process of integration. As L. P. Jacks has so well stated:

" 'It is only as a laborer that man is capable of education or worthy of it. The men of science, the artists, the poets, the philosophers, the heroes, the saints, the captains of industry, and the captains of salvation—what are they in last analysis but highly educated laborers, found most frequently in communities where culture and laborer are working together in alliance, least frequently where they have drifted apart, as, alas, they are drifting in these days? The great task of our times, once more, is to reunite these separated elements.' "

These considerations were the very ones that led to the formation 2 months after the American Federation of Labor convention of the American Association for an International Office for Education. That association aims to bring the same message about education to the American layman.

As in the American Federation of Labor report, it was recognized that education is an essential prop to a peaceful world order. As in the American Federation of Labor report, it was recognized that this proposal must not be confused with the problems of victorious and vanquished countries. Indeed, the declaration of the American Association made it clear that the establishment of an International Education Office did not mean that "the nations of the world must step in and dominate or watch over local schools or national school systems. Aside from the fact that if we want a democratic world this would be an undemocratic way to go about it; people do not accept outsiders telling them what they must know, how they must think or what they must think is right and what wrong. We cannot tell the German schools, for example, what they must teach and hope to succeed. There is evidence that even totalitarian, authoritarian Germany has failed to control the minds of many of the younger Germans."

Emphasis is placed by the association on the point that: "There is a way, though, through education—through education which is not authoritarian, which does not attempt to make people docile subjects or keep them forever immature. We can, through education, create better attitudes in people and build up in them better thinking processes. We can through education show them reality and truth and dispel many fears which cause aggressive behavior. We can through education make clear the interdependence of men as neighbors, as nationals, and as citizens of the world."

This declaration and the interest of the American Federation of Labor and of other forces in the labor movement and among the general public have already had their results. Our Government has taken the first steps toward collaboration in the designation of a committee to meet with the Allied Ministers of Education in London. But these steps are preliminary and tentative. For the time being, they relate only to the immediate postwar reconstruction needs. The broader and more far-reaching purpose of a permanent International Office for Education is yet to be agreed upon.

But even at this stage there are several distinctive elements that must guide the efforts to set up a permanent International Education Office.

In the first place, the idea must be accepted, the concept that education is, and must be utilized as, an instrument for the promotion of understanding among nations without which there can never be an enduring peace. The political and economic peace machinery cannot possibly work for long if it depends solely on Government experts. It must be supported by a public, worldwide, which understands the peace machinery and, even more important, understands other peoples. In the second place, such an office must not be thrust off into the when-there's-nothing-better-to-think-about area of international interest. It must have adequate moral and financial support from the nations of the world every day in every year.

And, in the third place, it must not be another conference of Government officials or even educators alone. Education for world understanding must follow from the participation of the peoples of the world. This means that delegates to such an International Office for Education must include worthy representatives of broad sections of the people or at least be selected by them—just as representatives to the International Labor Office are not solely representative of or chosen by governments.

The action of the American Federation of Labor and the sponsorship of the American Association for an International Office for Education by such outstanding figures as George Meany, secretary of the American Federation of Labor; Selma Borchardt, of the American Federation of Teachers; A. Philip Randolph, international president, Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Clinton Golden, C. I. O. representative on the War Manpower Commission; Mark Starr, educational director, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union; J. Raymond Walsh, director, Department of Education and Research, Congress of Industrial Organizations; Owen D. Young of the General Electric Co.; Henry I. Harriman of the New England Power Association and business representative on the I. L. O.; Beardsley Ruml, director, Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and James G. Patton, president, National Farmers Union, give testimony to the alertness of labor and industry to world needs.

As the country at large becomes aware of the needs to be met by an International Office for Education and as it expresses that support, official action of our Government will, no doubt, follow.

Thanks to LaFollette

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to call attention to and to include in these remarks the following editorial, which appeared in the Evansville Press, of Evansville, Ind., on June 14, 1944, and approves the conduct of our colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAFOLLETTE]:

THANKS TO L'FOLLETTE

The resignation of Robert W. Lyons as Republican National Committee man is a personal victory for Congressman CHARLES LAFOLLETTE who risked his political neck to support a principle.

It is a triumph for decency in Indiana and fair warning to organization hacks, Republican or Democratic, not to consider as private property a trust assigned them by the voters.

Ku Kluxism was the issue in this controversy and apologists for Mr. Lyons referred to the ravishment of this State half a generation ago by this plague of intolerance and gangsterism as something which might be epitomized as "youthful indiscretion."

It was the same kind of "youthful indiscretion" which produced Hitler, led to the enslavement of nine-tenths of the population of Europe and has brought our young men to the Norman beaches in a death struggle to keep it from enveloping the world.

We can forgive folly which is sincerely repented, and even forget it if given a chance; but we cannot, in times like these, endorse it, even by inference.

Mr. LAFOLLETTE'S courageous action will have a definitely cleansing effect upon Indiana politics in general. Immediate popular approval of his stand is fair warning to those who would use public power for petty, personal purposes. The incident reverses an evil trend and establishes LAFOLLETTE as a leader in the new Republican Party, now just emerging.

It is said that old organization men whose policies he has crossed will attempt to get even by working for his defeat in the election next November. The sincere friends of decency and good government should remember this and, by their votes, demonstrate that they appreciate his kind of public service.

Hog Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions:

RE: THE PRICE DISCRIMINATION AGAINST HOGS MARKETED IN NORTHEASTERN INDIANA

Since the W. F. A. has established a ceiling price for hogs in northeastern Indiana at 10 cents per hundredweight lower than the ceiling for central Indiana, and

Since the hogs from these areas are principally consigned to the same eastern packers, and

Since the hogs produced in these areas are believed to be of similar quality; and

Since freight rates are practically the same from the two areas; and

Since W. F. A. ceilings are said to be established from the market histories of the respective areas which must then indicate a longtime discrimination against northeastern Indiana hogs;

We, the undersigned members of the De Kalb County, Ind., U. S. D. A. War Board, hereby resolve, That the Office of Price Administration, the War Food Administration, and the director of Purdue University Agricultural Experiment Station be petitioned to: (1) Establish the causes of the discrimination in price against northeastern Indiana market hogs; and (2) State and Federal agencies take the necessary action to correct this discrimination; Be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be submitted to all Federal and State agencies concerned, as well as to other county U. S. D. A. War Boards in northeastern Indiana; to the press and read at public meetings.

ARTHUR H. LAUTZENHISER,
Chairman, De Kalb County A. A. A.
WILLIAM B. KLOCK,
Field Supervisor F. S. A.
LESTER E. BOGER,

ALBERT YODER,
District Farm Bureau Chairman.
C. E. BAKER,
County Agricultural Agent.

RE HOG MARKETING REGULATION EVASIONS

Whereas we, the undersigned members of the De Kalb County (Ind.) United States Department of Agriculture War Board, acting under instructions from our superior officers, urged farmers in 1943 to produce more pork as a patriotic duty and assured them that they would receive at least the floor price for their hogs as set by the W. F. A.; and

Whereas the farmers did respond to this plea for more pork by producing the country's largest hog crop for 1943–44; and

Whereas farmers marketing these hogs have had to oftentimes accept prices below the floor price established for this area and which was promised by the Government; and

Whereas farmers have had to submit to unusual, unorthodox, and unethical practices on the part of buyers in the bypassing of the floor price; and

Whereas pork products are retailed to consumers on the basis of O. P. A. ceiling prices which are independent of prices paid farmers; and

Whereas the packer is subsidized $1.30 per hundredweight on all hogs, regardless of the weight of the hogs, to enable the packer to make a profit on the hogs processed even if he has to pay the ceiling; so

We, the undersigned members of the De Kalb County (Ind.) United States Department of Agriculture War Board, petition the respective Federal authorities responsible for formulating and carrying out the food-for-freedom program to:

1. Keep faith with the hog producer by making the support price apply to all weights of market hogs and thereby eliminate floor dodging.

2. Provide that packers resorting to unusual practices, not common prior to the price support regulation so that the farmer is penalized by unusually heavy shrinkages in weight of hogs as a result of these practices, be made to disqualify themselves for subsidy payments in so doing.

3. Investigate the hog-marketing system in northeastern Indiana and withhold subsidy payments from packers who have in any way evaded or colluded with others to evade the purpose and intent of the W. F. A. in establishing a floor for hog prices; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this instrument be sent the War Food Administration, the Office of Price Administration, the United States Senator and Representative in Congress for this county, the National and State United States Department of Agriculture war boards, the county United States Department of Agriculture war boards of this market area, and to the press.

ARTHUR H. LAUTZENHISER,
Chairman, De Kalb County A. A. A.
WILLIAM B. KLOCK,
Field Supervisor, F. S. A.
LESTER E. BOGER,
Field Agent, Albion P. C. A.
ALBERT YODER,
District Farm Bureau Chairman.

County Agricultural Agent.

Slovaks Praise President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, no finer Americans reside in my district than those affiliated with the National Slovak Society of the United States of America. Thousands of their sons fight on every battle front of the world and on the seven seas. Thousands of its membership are employed in the great Pittsburgh steel industrial district—the district which makes steel for the ships, planes, tanks, and guns needed by our fighting men. Members of this organization are a loyal group led by Mr. V. S. Platek, president. They love peace and are willing to fight and die for it.

I am happy to include in my remarks the resolution of the National Slovak

Society, which was adopted on May 21, 1944, endorsing the great leadership of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt:

Whereas shortly after America's declaration of war we, in the name and on behalf of the membership of the National Slovak Society, gave allegiance and full faith to the President of the United States and pledged our wholehearted and unconditional support of the Chief Executive and the Congress of the Nation in their determination to protect the honor of America and its ideals of right and humanity, and dedicated our lives, our fortunes, our all, to that great and holy cause; and

Whereas today the field of white of our society's service flag is studded with almost 3,000 stars of blue, 29 of which have already changed to gold—to tell the world that 29 of our brethren have made the sacrifice in this the greatest of all wars, so that the most precious things of life, the God-given rights of man—freedom, justice, and the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's own conscience—may not perish from the earth; and

Whereas we know that the war must be fought to the bitter end—until the United States of America and her allies are victorious—if Americans are to live as freemen and not as slaves; and

Whereas we know that the President has not failed the Nation in the critical days gone by, will not fail us in the critical days which face the Nation—days that will end in an assured victory: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved at the annual meeting of the Supreme Assembly of the National Slovak Society, now in session in the city of Pittsburgh, That an expression of renewed confidence and continued faith be trasmitted to His Excellency, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt; that we continue to have unbounded faith in his great understanding of the problems of the world; that we continue to have implicit faith in his efforts to solve those problems, which deep faith is merited by his masterful conduct of America's part in the global war during the many months since Pearl Harbor; that we pray to God on high to bless him with health and inspire him with wisdom to guide our Nation safely through the dangers of the global war the men and women of America are now fighting, shoulder to shoulder with the Allies; and, God willing, to lead our Nation to a just and lasting peace; be it further

Resolved, That the original of this resolution be subscribed by each member of the supreme assembly and be transmitted to His Excellency, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and that a copy be spread upon the records of the society.

Given at Pittsburgh, Pa., on this 21st day of May 1944.

Admittance of European Refugees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RUFUS C. HOLMAN
OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, there has come to me a clipping from a newspaper dated June 15 last under the caption "Westbrook Pegler remarks: Roosevelt's 'thousand refugees' mere sample." I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROOSEVELT'S "THOUSAND REFUGEES" MERE SAMPLE

(By Westbrook Pegler)

Always a champion of unpopular and losing causes, I find myself skeptical of President Roosevelt's notice to Congress that 1,000 European refugees will be brought to this country immediately and confined in a vacated Army camp and his assurance that, when the war is over, they will be repatriated.

This Nation has immigration laws adopted for the purpose of excluding undesirable persons. These laws have been administered insincerely in recent years and evaded often. As in the flagrant case of Mrs. Earl Browder, an active, alien Communist posing as a harmless and nonpolitical housewife.

The people of the United States are the sole authority on desirability, and yet, in justice to them, it must be admitted that the provisions which they have adopted for their own protection are extremely liberal and more so than those of the other countries in the family of more or less free nations on our side of the war.

Nevertheless, even this generosity has been flouted openly in recent years by the admission of individuals in the guise of visitors who were legally ineligible to settle here, when it was known that real conditions would make it impossible to deport them, regardless of their active conduct, or their attitude toward the American form of government.

Past performances in many fields instinctively suggest that the promise—that these refugees will be repatriated after the war and meanwhile restricted—will not be kept. Past performances suggest also that once a principle has been conceded by the importation of 1,000 European aliens with no pretense that they are eligible or suitable for permanent residence here, the number that will be brought in later will be limited by shipping facilities, individual pull exerted through personal friends and organizations within the United States, and public tolerance.

The latter will be a weak and leaky barrier against the immigration of Communists and others who won't like our way of living and doing and will do their damnedest to make us live and do their way; and against continental crooks, who would be no asset to any nation.

The public tolerance operates through Congress, and Congress is beset and bedeviled by propaganda and pressure which attack as a Fascist and a bigot any man who, in the interests of his own country and his own people, undertakes to restrict immigration to those who have something to offer. It is almost heresy to say that not all immigrants and refugees are ennobled by their sufferings abroad, but there is nevertheless much biographical data to prove that many who came here shortly before the First World War for asylum from European tyranny did not join the native American youth in destroying those tyrants, but instead joined alien groups and movements and tried to destroy the American system. The whole native public is not organized to counteract the pressure on public men exerted by the organized pressure groups which call the United States a melting pot but, in reality, have in mind something more like a central park of the entire world where anyone may enter as a matter of right.

The United States is, in reality, an exclusive organization. It has rules of eligibility and, like most of our unions, reserves the right to reject applicants who do not meet certain requirements. These restrictions are unjust to no foreigner, because no foreigner has any rights in the matter. If he is admitted to residence and later to citizenship, that is a privilege—not a right. The United States can decide to exclude all immigration, if it comes to that, and to restrict the right to vote and hold public office to natives and, I believe, should do so.

Obviously the first 1,000 are to be just a sample, because 1,000 refugees more or less in southern Italy would make no appreciable difference in the problem of feeding and governing the region. But to this country the difference could and probably will be great, with other thousands following on, with the conditions of their immurement gradually relaxed and with carefully selected distress cases flaunted in the public eye in an appeal for sympathy and unwary kindness, all for the purpose of revising the law retroactively to confer legitimate immigrant status on unselected thousands with complete disregard of the legal standards of desirability.

Of course, this is all based on an assumption that there will be not 1,000, but many thousands, and that, once they are here, that will be the last the country will hear of their return to Europe after the war.

Agricultural Extension Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK
OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD remarks of Hon. James F. Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization, at a luncheon meeting yesterday at the Department of Agriculture for Extension Service workers who have been with the Service for a period of 10 years or more.

I desire particularly to call attention to one statement which I know will be of interest to many throughout the country. It is certainly of great interest to me. Mr. Byrnes said:

For example, there are now about 10,000 Army trucks ready for disposal. The procurement officer of the Treasury who handles the disposition of all surplus war materials of this kind, is cooperating with the W. F. A. in getting the bulk of these trucks into farm use. The plan is as follows:

1. State A. A. A. committees obtain information from Treasury procurement regional offices on the number and types of trucks that might reasonably be available to the State.

2. On this information, they notify county A. A. A. committees of the probable number and types of trucks that might be available for each county.

3. The county committees give farmers a letter certifying need for a truck to haul essential crops.

4. The farmers present these letters to truck dealers.

5. The dealers contact the regional procurement office, present the A. A. A. letters, and buy the trucks.

6. Dealers pay procurement ceiling price, and sell the trucks to farmers at O. P. A. ceiling prices for used trucks. If necessary the dealer reconditions the trucks. The maximum dealer margin over purchase price and repairs is approximately 17 percent. Prices and margins are controlled by Government regulations.

I am glad to have this information, because farmers are certainly in need of automotive equipment, particularly trucks, and I think the information will be of much interest, and the entire speech is one of enlightenment.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I think it a splendid thing for persons who have served 10 years or more in the Extension Service to organize a fraternity of this kind offering an opportunity to people with a common interest to meet and exchange ideas.

You would not remain for 10 years in the Extension Service unless you were really interested in the work. Only those who are interested in their work will ever make much of a contribution to its success. I am told that your Director was one of the founders of your fraternity and that its first chapter was organized at his home in Montana. I am not surprised because from beginning of the Extension Service to this date he has labored efficiently and zealously for every cause that promised to increase the efficiency of the Extension Service.

I was not the legislative father of the Extension Service. But as a friend of the legislation father, I was close to him at the time of its birth. I do not have to tell you that I refer to the late Congressman A. Frank Lever, of South Carolina. He represented the congressional district adjoining the one I represented. He was here for some years before I became a Member of the House. From him I heard of the dreams and hopes of those who for some years had been working to establish the Extension Service. I did what little a new Member of the House could do to assist Mr. Lever in his fight. That was in 1914. Through the years that have passed I have kept in touch with the Extension Service because I have been privileged to enjoy the friendship of a man who gave the best years of his life to the Extension Service, your former Director, Dr. Clyde W. Warburton.

All of us have cause to be proud of the work of the Extension Service during the war period. It seems to me that whenever a war program has been suggested, whether it was to recruit manpower for the farms, to sell bonds or fight inflation, everyone would immediately suggest that the Extension Service be entrusted with the major responsibility. How well the service has responded to every appeal is known to you and to the people. They have been able to exercise leadership only because they had won the confidence of the farmers of the Nation.

As they have time and again called upon farmers to increase quotas and to do many other things, it was inevitable that they should meet with some complaint from the farmers. To complain is the inalienable right of every American. Some of the politicians and writers who heard these complaints were not all acquainted with our farmers. Because of the complaints and particularly because the Agriculture Department was not run entirely in accordance with their views, they assured all of us that we were facing a great disaster; that the food shortage this spring and summer would be so terrible that the morale of the war workers would be destroyed, production curtailed, and the war lost.

These prophets of disaster are now without honor either in their own homes or any other home. Marvin Jones is calling upon man and beast to aid in the consumption of some surplus crops, and he will shy from a crate of eggs just like a mule will shy from a steam piano.

The American farmer rallied to the call of his country in its most critical hour; by his ingenuity and long hours of work has abundantly supplied the American war machine with food and fiber. Instead of famine at home we have enjoyed a feast. No Army or Navy in the history of war has been fed as well as our soldiers and sailors are being fed.

The Extension Service provided the leadership and the American farmers demonstrated they could do what was regarded as impossible.

Many forces combined to bring about the increased yields of 1942 and 1943, but when the story is written it must be said that there was no greater contribution than that of the 1,700,000 boys and girls, members of the 4-H Clubs. They had been trained for farm life and, like trained soldiers going into battle, they were an inspiration to the recruits and brought about our victories on the farms of the Nation.

Our bumper crops give cause for serious thought. If with reduced labor supply and a greatly reduced supply of farm machinery we could produce the bumper crops of 1942 and 1943, we should certainly be able to do it when the boys return to the farms and the supply of farm machinery is greatly increased. I know that you can think of many offsets. Many old men who are today hanging on to do their part in winning the war will retire; many women will return to the home from the field. But necessity has caused us to devise new methods, and with increased supplies of machinery and labor we can look with confidence for abundant crops.

We must continue to export our surplus wheat, cotton, and tobacco. For 2 years from the 1st day of January following the termination of war we will guarantee loans at 90 percent of parity. The full significance of this provision is not generally realized. It will give us time to plan in the light of conditions that exist after peace has been restored.

However, you who are agricultural thinkers will not wait until then to plan for the future. You will not be lulled to sleep by the security given by these loans. Borrowing money upon a crop is not the goal of a farmer. Crops are grown to be marketed for consumption—not to be stored. As stored crops accumulate, they hang like a sword over the market. Thinking farmers will realize that they have a vital interest in the removal of trade barriers which will enable them to sell abroad their surplus crops and enable the purchasers to pay for such crops.

As to our food crops, our domestic demands plus the requirements of the people of the liberated nations until they can get back to normal will consume all that we can grow. As our shipments abroad cease, whether we will have sufficient demands at home depends upon whether we have full employment at home.

Because this is true, the farmers of the Nation have a very vital interest in the reconversion program. We now have pending in the Congress three bills, one to provide for the speedy termination of war contracts; another for the disposition of surplus property; and a third for the payment of more liberal unemployment compensation benefits. The first is the most important because it will help to provide jobs. It does not cause the Government to give anything to contractors. It only provides that Government promptly pay what it owes and promptly remove its machinery and materials from a plant in order that the manufacturer may promptly return to civilian production and more quickly give jobs to workers.

If, in addition to this, there is a prompt revision at the end of the war of the system of war taxation so that men will be encouraged to invest money in industry, there is no reason why we should have a recurrence of the unemployment that we suffered in the days following the last war and again in 1932.

Of course there will be some unemployment but it should be of short duration. It will necessarily be aggravated in some industries and in some areas. If the Congress, by guaranteeing that State unemployment funds shall not be reduced below an amount equal to a year's contribution, can induce the States to increase the weekly benefits and pay such benefits for a longer period, it will help to sustain the demand for the products of the farm.

Because of the measure of success we have achieved in holding the line as to prices and wages, the farmer is in much better position to grapple with post-war problems than he was after the First World War.

From 1920 to 1921, in 1 year alone, the farmer's net income was cut in half, from six and eight-tenths billion dollars to three and six-tenths billion dollars. As the curve of farm income hit bottom, the curve of farm mortgages skyrocketed.

From 1920 to 1922, the outstanding farm mortgage debt increased from eight billion to over ten billion dollars. By 1924, it increased to $10,665,000,000, and the interest rate to the farmer on this huge debt averaged 6.3 percent.

It was not until 1933 that the curve of farm income began going up and the curve of farm-mortgage debt began falling below the 1920 level.

In 1943 the net income of farmers reached the all-time high of twelve and five-tenths billion. The farm-mortgage debt has dropped to five and six-tenths billion dollars and the interest rate has been cut to 5 percent.

We must preserve these gains and we must continue our present farm-productive output.

There seems to me to be one important missing link. Like no one else, the farmer has to face the hazard of crop failure as a result of weather. A sound system of crop insurance is necessary to assure the farmer a stable income. Legislation on this subject is now pending in Congress, and I believe its early enactment will enable the farmer to move into the post-war era with greater economic security than he has ever enjoyed before.

Steps are being taken by Government to put surplus machinery into the hands of the farmer. Some farmers have been led to believe that they will not be permitted to buy this machinery at a fair price. Under a program which has just been formulated they will pay what the Government receives plus a reasonable charge for handling.

For example, there are now about 10,000 Army trucks ready for disposal. The Procurement Officer of the Treasury, who handles the disposition of all surplus war materials of this kind, is cooperating with the W. F. A. in getting the bulk of these trucks into farm use. The plan is as follows:

1. State A. A. A. committees obtain information from Treasury Procurement regional offices on the number and types of trucks that might reasonably be available to the State.

2. On this information they notify county A. A. A. committees of the probable number and types of trucks that might be available for each county.

3. The county committees give farmers a letter certifying need for a truck to haul essential crops.

4. The farmers present these letters to truck dealers.

5. The dealers contact the regional Procurement office, present the A. A. A. letters, and buy the trucks.

6. Dealers pay Procurement ceiling price, and sell the trucks to farmers at O. P. A. ceiling prices for used trucks. If necessary the dealer reconditions the trucks. The maximum dealer margin over purchase price and repairs is approximately 17 percent.

Prices and margins are controlled by Government regulations.

This general plan went into effect only this month. The merits of the plan at this stage of development are that it assures prompt disposal, chiefly to farm use, at controlled prices.

A few reports of excessive margins have been received on truck sales before this plan was adopted. For example, in one case reported from Sumter County, S. C., exorbitant profits have been alleged. This is being investigated by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Instances of this kind may have arisen where dealers bought trucks directly from Army depots before the present plan was worked out. The Office of Materials and Facilities, the A. A. A., and Treasury Procurement are confident the new plan will work fairly and expeditiously.

Arrangements are being worked out with Treasury Procurement for the disposal of surplus agicultual machinery in Army depots, navy yards, etc. Procurement will notify the State A. A. A. (in the State where the equipment is located) of the types and amounts of machinery available. County committees will give farmers letters certifying need, and letters will go to dealers and then to the regional Procurement office. The procedure under consideration is virtually the same as in the case of surplus trucks.

The plan is to have dealers pay Procurement ceiling prices and resell at O. P. A. ceiling prices.

Much has been said about surplus jeeps. Only a few hundred have been disposed of by the Army. Several thousand nonstandard types, minus repair parts and in bad condition, apparently are not in active use by the Army. Some of these are being torn down for repair parts by the Army. Disposal of jeeps for farm use does not appear practicable for some time to come but when they do become available steps will be taken to release them to farmers as needs may justify.

W. F. A. has proposed that miscellaneous used items be sold through county farm auctions. Procurement is considering this as the most practicable method suggested to them, and the auction method will be used experimentally in the near future.

We can all be heartened by the assurance that plans are being perfected to lessen the difficulties incident to the transition from war to peace. But it would be tragic if we allowed our interest in conditions following the war to divert us from the task of winning the war. Today our fighting men are only upon the beachheads of Europe. They have not landed on the shores of Japan. The roads to Berlin and Tokyo are still long and bloody. This is no time to relax in our efforts. This is the time for us to put every ounce of our strength in the effort to increase production on farm and in factory, and thus hasten the day of victory, hasten the day when our fighting men can return to their homes.

Wake Up, America

OF

HON. FRED E. BUSBEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, the forces of Americanism may lose the coming election, for want of getting out the truly representative American vote. This situation may be likened to the time-honored maxim which runs:

For want of a nail the shoe was lost; for want of a shoe the horse was lost; and for want of a horse the rider was lost.

Likewise, constitutional representative government may be lost to the American people if they do not awake.

Until recently, the communistic movement in America has been an undercover affair, carrying on its subversive activities largely in secret, and with little effect on our American form of government. This is so because their teachings are so repugnant to the free men and women of our country, that it has been found most difficult to convert people to the cause of the Communist doctrines.

Politically, the Communist Party has never been large in numbers, but in recent years they have adopted the technique of infiltration into other organizations, taking undue advantage of and using those organizations for their own nefarious ends. To illustrate, there are many members of the American Labor Party of New York who are not Communists, yet they have been so indifferent to what was happening right in their own organization that the radical Reds gained and are today in control of that organization.

Basically, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, popularly known as the C. I. O., is a labor union, having great influence in labor circles. The great majority of members of the C. I. O. are honest, law-abiding American citizens who believe implicitly in their country, and to whom the views and beliefs of the Communists are abhorrent. Cunningly, the Communists set about to gain a foothold in this labor organization, and they have succeeded in their infiltration to the point where many important offices are now filled with Communists, which insures their control of the organization known as the C. I. O.

Notwithstanding the great majority of membership of the C. I. O. would never admit they could be even influenced, yet so strong has become the pressure upon them that they find themselves almost powerless to oppose this control forced upon them by their leaders.

These cunning leaders have assumed such arrogance that their members are compelled by them to pay extra dues which are used to further the Communist cause politically. The amount of money thus filched from the honest, patriotic laborers is unknown, but admittedly it reaches many thousands of dollars.

I still have confidence the rank and file members of the C. I. O. will at the proper time throw off this yoke that has been forced upon them.

To identify this movement which is becoming daily more intensive and more securely entrenched in the political fabric of the New Deal, as well as holding a threat over the success of American principles in November, we know it as the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

Make no mistake, the P. A. C. has a purpose, a sinister one. What is that sinister purpose? To attain the greatest possible power and influence in and over the Government of the United States.

How do they propose to attain that power and influence? By combining their communistic philosophies with the New Deal, to bring about the election of Mr. Roosevelt for his fourth term as President of the United States and a subservient Congress. Successful in this, they will be forever entrenched in high places in our Government structure.

This "red" spectre of communism is stalking our country from east to west, from north to south, unrecognized. But the sinister purpose is there, thriving on our unsuspecting population, particularly in communities where there are large groups of factory and industrial workers.

How may this spectre be recognized? They are well and accurately described in a recent report issued by the Special Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives, in which it is declared "the Communists will attempt by stealth and subterfuge to do through the Political Action Committee what they have failed to do when functioning as a political party under their own name, that is, to gain political leadership over millions of voters."

What are they doing to establish domination over our people? Cited is the UE Guide to Political Action, published by the Communist-dominated United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, a standard textbook for this insidious movement. I cite their methods to get out the vote in the forthcoming election campaign:

First. Workers are urged to secure the use of their union meeting halls for registration purposes, where they must register under the watchful eyes of their Communist chieftains. Woe betide the worker who fails to register, as these chieftains control his bread and butter.

Second. Special hours for registration purposes, and time off with pay, is the demand of these political chieftains.

Third. Checking of union membership lists against lists of registered voters. And God help the worker whose name is missing!

Fourth. Shop stewards instructed to check up on every employee to insure registration for voting. Imagine the lot of any individual who may fail to comply with this requirement.

Fifth. Visiting in the homes of unregistered voters.

Sixth. Unions furnishing automobiles to transport members to registration offices.

Seventh. Prizes for percentage of complete registration in shops and departments in industrial plants.

Eighth. Special registration stamps issued for checking with payment of dues.

Ninth. Registration en masse urged in shops, to insure 100 percent registration for voting in election.

Tenth. Compulsory registration in certain union organizations.

Eleventh. Instructions to precinct captains for canvass to insure registration of sympathizers with cause.

Twelfth. Women's auxiliary organizations for registration purposes.

Thirteenth. C. I. O. canteens opened all over the country for use of men and women in service.

We must not fail to recognize that the Political Action Committee is guided by some of the most cunning men in the country, in effective organization work. We might be better off next November, in our efforts to preserve our ideals of Americanism and the constitutional structure of our Government, if we take some lessons from this guidebook.

We cannot afford to overlook the success already attained by the C. I. O.-P. A. C., in defeating well qualified, experienced, able Members of Congress in primaries held during the past 2 months. This was due in part to the apathy and complacency of those people who did not vote.

Let this be a warning of things to come in November, if we continue that same apathy and complacency, and do not work, and work hard, day and night, to be at them at their own game.

It is high time those entitled to vote become alert, awake and ever mindful of the incontrovertible fact that the Political Action Committee never sleeps. We cannot sit idly by and watch this thing creep up on us. We must have action and more action. We must have the courage of our convictions and be willing to fight for those principles in which we believe.

Browder and Hillman are spending huge resources to register every last vote they can control, and their work will be unceasing to get out to vote every last man and woman, come the election.

You may say "It can't happen here." It can happen here. It has already happened in isolated cases in Alabama, in Texas, and in California.

We must go to the four corners of our country, urge and arouse our people to their duty to register, and vote on November 7.

Let us say to them: "Browder, Hillman, and the Communists are registered. Are you?"

Let us say to them: "Browder, Hillman, and the Communists will vote. Will you?"

The following figures, carefully authenticated, of the number of people who failed to vote all over the United States in 1940, are cause for alarm:

Wyoming had 37,791 men and women of voting age who did not vote in 1940.

The failure of our people to vote in the various States in the coming election may be a direct contribution to the downfall of our Government. Wake up, America.

Remarks on the Coming Campaign and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following series of remarks on the coming campaign and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. The series consists of remarks I have made concerning the alliance between four of the leading radical groups in America and the New Deal, the alliance having been planned by Sidney Hillman, who is now its leading spirit. I offer these remarks for the consideration of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, hoping also that the voters of the Nation will take due notice and be guided accordingly:

FOREWARNED IS FOREARMED

We have in this country today a well-organized, well-financed movement by the leftist wing of American labor to control the Congress. They propose to defeat any Senator or Representative they cannot control. A short time ago C. I. O. leaders announced they had set aside $750,000 to be used in the election of a friendly Congress. Later they announced that each member of the C. I. O. would be asked to contribute $1 toward the campaign fund which would give them something like $4,000,000 to work with. Already they have made their influence felt. In the Alabama primaries several weeks ago they defeated for renomination Congressman STARNES, who had been very active in the Dies committee work. Two weeks ago they defeated another Dies committee member, Congressman COSTELLO, of California. They boldly announce that they are going into every district the sitting member of which they do not control. With a campaign chest of $4,000,000, it would mean nearly $10,000 to spend in every district. That is quite a fund to be used against any sitting Member of Congress who will not take orders from the C. I. O. What do you propose to do about it? (Weekly News Letter, May 29, 1944.)

A HELPLESS DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Four of our extreme left-winger groups, the Communist Political Association, the American Labor Party, the Liberal Party (an offshoot of the American Labor Party), and the C. I. O. Committee for Political Action have all recently nominated and endorsed President Roosevelt for the fourth term. Where does this leave the regular Democratic Party? Does it not place them in the position of having to ratify a Presidential nomination already made for them by these four left-wing party groups? What else is there for them to do? Real Democrats don't like the idea of these radical groups leading their parade, but there is nothing they can do about it. The play has been taken away from them. They cannot change the situation. The Democratic Party is helpless. From now on, if Roosevelt wins in November, the real Democrats—both North and South—must play second fiddle to these radical groups who have been embraced by the New Dealers. (Weekly News Letter, June 12, 1944.)

AN UNHOLY ALLIANCE

The New Deal, the United States Department of Agriculture, and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee have teamed up against the American farmer. This unholy alliance was first shown on July 5, 1940, when the United States Department of Agriculture put on a radio skit to advertise oleo as a substitute for butter. The alliance was next demonstrated when Hoyt S. Haddock, of the C. I. O., testified before a congressional committee on June 21, 1943, that "oleo has a greater food value than butter. * * * The price of butter should be rolled back to 25 cents per pound * * *. The country would be better off if we had stopped producing butter altogether."

The attitude of the New Deal toward the farmer is summed up in the words of Jay Franklin, a semi-official mouthpiece of the New Deal, when he states in his book, For What We Are About to Receive: "The farmer has arrogated to himself all virtue and all knowledge. He has voted against progress and civilization, against the city, against science, against art. He has exhausted our soils, as he has exhausted our Treasury when given half a chance. Sooner or later we shall discover, as the Roman Church discovered, as England discovered, as Soviet Russia discovered, that the pagan, the landed proprietor, the Kulak, is simply so much mud on the paths of progress and must be swept aside if society is to advance. The American farmer as a political institution is a danger to our civilization."

Every man who milks a cow should keep an eye on the C. I. O. Political Action Committee headed by Sidney Hillman, of New York City. The New Deal may have started out to save the farmer; but following the leadership of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, it is now trying to destroy the farmer. (Weekly News Letter, June 12, 1944.)

WHAT LIES AHEAD?

American boys are fighting and dying all over this world so that American principles and ideals may be preserved for posterity. It is disturbing therefore to read in the daily papers a story from Detroit that says "The United Automobile Workers (C. I. O.) have asked General Motors Corporation to fire five war veterans who belonged to the union before entering service, but failed to maintain their membership after getting their old jobs back when discharged from the armed forces." If by any chance the boys on the beaches of France should read this story, what would they think? Would they not ask, "Are we to return to jobs that will be denied us unless we bow to the demands of radical labor leaders? Is this a sample of the liberties, the privileges, and the rights of American citizenship for which we fight?"

All fair-minded Americans believe that labor is entitled to its place in the sun; that it is entitled to decent hours, better working conditions, good wages, and collective bargaining rights. These are the things that the rank and file of labor believe in and have fought for. They should be preserved. But when C. I. O. labor leaders require a man to contribute to their political campaign fund in order to retain his job, even when the man is opposed to their political program, then public opinion turns against labor unions that have such leaders. "Labor racketeering" and "forced labor shake-downs" will eventually destroy the cause of labor. (Weekly News Letter, July 3, 1944.)

THE C. I. O. POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE

Sidney Hillman, whose political ambitions are attracting wide attention throughout the Nation, capitalized on World War No. 1 and is now capitalizing on World War No. 2. Born in Russia, he arrived at Ellis Island August 10, 1907, at the age of 20. Seven years later, with no experience as a labor leader, no experience as a journeyman, he raided the membership of the existing garment makers' union and organized the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, which he dominates today. The First World War gave him his opportunity to put the young organization on its feet. The Government then, as in this war, insisted that manufacturers of clothing for the armed forces have satisfactory union contracts. Through the aid of the late Justice Brandeis, Felix Frankfurter, and Prof. W. Z. Ripley, Hillman had things his own way in the wartime clothing industry. Mr. Roosevelt, at the request of Frances Perkins, brought him into national labor prominence with the advent of the New Deal; but it was the coming of the Second World War that gave his union, together with that of the textile workers which he had taken under his wing, their present boom period of prosperity, which set in motion his political activities.

We look upon the two World Wars as terrible tragedies, but Hillman, looking back over his career, can say: "It is an ill wind that doesn't blow somebody some good." Were it not for the war, with the tremendous expansion of our industrial plants, and the general upheaval which a war creates, the A. F. of L. would soon clip his wings like nobody's business, just as it has done in the past. Hillman's ambitions are to elect a President and a Congress of his own choosing, not necessarily a Congress or a President "friendly" to labor, but rather a Congress and a President "friendly" to the Hillman philosophy. In order to accomplish this he has made an alliance with the Communists to form a united political front. Commenting upon this alliance, Mark Sullivan, Fulton Lewis, and other newspaper and radio commentators have pointed out that no one questions the right of anyone to engage in legitimate political activity, but the American people should be made acquainted with the purposes and aims of this radical labor leader.

As a youngster in Russia Hillman was schooled in revolutionary activities. In 1921–22 Hillman went back to Russia for a look-see at a time when pretty much of the world was frightened by the "great experiment." He found nothing frightening about it. Instead, he made arrangements then and there to do business with the Communist government and gave it his blessing. The question we ask today is "Should American labor follow the lead of Hillman in political matters?" (Weekly News Letter, July 10, 1944.)

Pending Insurance Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARION T. BENNETT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a recent Supreme Court decision has raised anew the issue as to whether or not the Federal Government shall control the insurance business or whether it shall remain within State control. Much misleading propaganda has befogged this issue. The following editorial from the November 5, 1943, edition of the Watchman-Advocate, of Clayton, Mo., is an accurate statement of the case as it affects the record of Congressman WALTER C. PLOESER:

THE INSURANCE ISSUE

Recently, the St. Louis evening newspapers have been manufacturing a great deal of news about the insurance bills before the Congress. Screaming, editorially, the reader would get the impression that someone was trying to steal something.

These insurance bills (introduced by Senator VAN NUYS and Representative WALTER) are obviously and candidly bills introduced at the request of the stock fire insurance companies to clarify the intent of the Congress. The bills declare that the supervision of the fire insurance business shall be left to the several States. The Congress can pass the bills or not as it chooses. It happens that the Federal court in Atlanta recently threw a New Deal indictment brought by the Justice Department out of court on a demurrer. This is not new, for the courts have held for more than 75 years that the regulation of insurance companies is not a Federal job. The St. Louis papers, New Dealish to the stooge degree, do not tell the people that the entire plot by the administration is to get into its control the many millions of dollars of insurance policyholders' reserves.

One St. Louis evening newspaper in an editorial tried to impugn Congressman WALTER PLOESER's announced support of the bills. This newspaper has attacked the Congressman unfairly before. It is not because they actually doubt his integrity. PLOESER's most bitter enemies very likely secretly respect the integrity of the Congressman. But the New Deal hates PLOESER as much as it hates any other man in the United States who opposes their views, and this newspaper must do the bidding of the master. In the case of the other evening newspaper, it is more a case of the distorted and muddled opinion of what constitutes liberalism. That newspaper, once great, is for free enterprise as it applies to itself but also for everything and everyone else being cartelized and regulated in the good old Fascist style.

We are sure that the Congress will pay little or no attention to these newspapers. The purpose of this editorial is to remind these critics that Congressman PLOESER commands the respect of the people partly because of his liberal and progressive insurance record.

Some States may have made a mess of the handling of the insurance business but, on the other hand, many of the States have done a splendid job. Missouri, under the infamous rule of the New Deal's Tom Pendergast and Insurance Commissioner Emmet O'Malley did a most deplorable job of handling the insurance business. Now, let us remember, who was it who first called to the attention of the public the dishonest conduct of the O'Malley insurance department? Who was it that first denounced the notorious "Missouri Rate Compromise?" Who was it that first defied the insurance department and sent someone hurrying to see where the rats may be hidden? If our memory and the record serves us correctly it was none other than insurance man WALTER PLOESER, in October 1936. For a further memory refresher the place was Columbia, Mo., and the occasion, the 1936 Insurance Agents Convention. Insurance man PLOESER did this in a speech before the Convention, which he made in opposition to a resolution of endorsement for the notorious New Dealer O'Malley. PLOESER braved the anger of most of the insurance fraternity in Missouri by so doing. Since then, he has merited undying gratitude for his courage at a time when it was most unpopular to be courageous. If the word of insurance men is accurate, he has brought about other reforms in the insurance business. His record in the past is one of constant battle against monopoly He is one of the few men of the country who knows a monopoly when he sees one, and that includes the New Deal governmental type, too.

In 1942, Attorney General McKittrick threatened to come to St. Louis and speak against PLOESER on this insurance issued but after reflection remembered his only and disastrous encounter with PLOESER before the Small Business Committee of the House in the spring of 1942. One newspaper's trumped-up bluff with McKittrick never developed. We think we know why. Read the committee hearings on this same subject and you will learn that PLOESER made McKittrick look ridiculous. In 1943 the Federal Court of Atlanta confirmed PLOESER's opinions.

There are two sides to this issue, and manufactured news only draws attention to extreme political bias.

Address by Hon. Edward Martin, Governor of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARVE TIBBOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by the Honorable Edward Martin, Governor of Pennsylvania, at the meeting of the Republican State committeee at Philadelphia on May 20, 1944:

Mr. Chairman and fellow Americans, the Republican Party has a right to be proud of its record.

Pennsylvania has seen 5 years of Republican rule turn a $71,000,000 deficit into a $100,000,000 surplus with lowered taxes, and at the same time an increase in appropriations for education and welfare activities of $40,000,000.

This action speaks louder than promises.

In the Nation three-quarters of a century of Republican Party administration strictly adhered to the policies of a strong Union of States with full assurance of the sovereignty of each State; of a stable and sound currency recognized over all the world; of low and equitable taxes; of protection of the public credit by lowering indebtedness and balancing budgets; of taking our place in the world to preserve peace and goodwill on earth; of maintaining trade restrictions necessary to preserve living standards in America by protecting wage earners, and of giving a square deal to every citizen through safeguarding his freedom of action.

These policies made us the most prosperous and the most respected Nation in the world.

What is the situation that confronts the United States after almost 12 years of New Deal rule?

We find ourselves entering the most difficult and dangerous period of American history.

The close of the war will find resources exhausted, trade vanished, industry paralyzed, and shipping disordered. Inflation will breed confusion and unrest. These threats to this Nation existed even before the dark clouds of war blackened the skies of the world.

There is no easy solution of the problem. It is far more difficult than those confronting us at the end of World War No. 1, or the Spanish-American War, or the War Between the States.

The Republican Party solved those problems. They were solved by hard work, sacrifices, tears, sweat, humility, and common sense. We can solve our problems of today by the same means if we have the courage to use them.

We must start with the fact that government cannot create wealth. All it can give is equal opportunities. The solution of our problems must be undertaken without class conflict, sectional hatred, or political demagogy.

The American economic-social plan has become the most colossal and the most complicated and interdependent system in the history of civilization. Fifty years ago we felt ourselves remote from the world. Our domestic problems were few, as our people had simple tastes. In that time more than 50 percent of our people literally supported themselves. They raised much of their own food. They had their own transportation, their own food, and their own water and fuel.

Now water is furnished by a corporation. Food is hauled and preserved for us. Transportation depends upon the oil supply. We buy power and light. We haul our children to school.

Capital has been combined into great corporations. Labor, lawyers, farmers, doctors, and ministers, groups and classes have their organizations. We are a bloc-conscious and group-ridden people.

Regardless of this, we must all recognize that the rights of the whole people are paramount to the rights of any section, class, or group.

We are all on the team. The various economic and social groups in America are players on that team. The refusal of any player or group to play will destroy the American team. Production will stop, people will go hungry, and in time they will perish.

During the peace period of 1927 to 1941 we had a total of 1,945 strikes, or an average of 138 per annum. For the war year of 1943 we had 3,737.

Some of these strikes directly affected the food and water supply. The rights of the public must be safeguarded and Government must have the courage to guard the rights and the lives and the well-being of the people.

We must approach this serious problem with the understanding that the soldier, the mechanic, the miner, the farmers, and the small businessman are all partners in this great enterprise. In the vast fields of social and economic conflict the Government must be the firm umpire and the impartial arbiter. The Government is not a good businessman and should stay out of business.

What are some of the things that have America by the throat while we are fighting a war for our very existence?

One out of every 41 Americans is now employed by the Federal Government. There are one-third as many on the civilian pay roll as in the armed services.

Federal employees greatly exceed the number named by both State and local governments. This swarming army of tax-eating locusts are snooping and prying into the private affairs of American citizens in ways never contemplated by the founders of the Republic. They are interfering with freedom of action.

It is all costly and non-American. Money is being spent in wild recklessness by Washington. When Federal employees in 1941 spent $157,000,000 for telephones, telegrams, printing, and travel costs it was time to call a halt. Those costs are far greater now.

The Federal Government will have no money when the war ends. But it will have the most enormous debt in history, a gigantic debt of almost $300,000,000,000.

At the low rate of 2½ percent, the yearly interest on the conservatively estimated national debt of three hundred billions following the war's end will be seven and one-half billions a year. This gigantic yearly charge for interest alone is twice the total largest peacetime Budget in the whole history of the United States prior to 1930 and six times the size of the whole national debt at the outbreak of World War No. 1.

Shortly after World War No. 1 the whole cost of Government per year was less than $3,000,000,000.

During the depression the national annual income fell to sixty billions. In hard times the burden of the debt charges alone would be crushing.

This war has shown all of us that Government is a hard task master, and a most inefficient one. The heartless corporation is a "sob sister" compared to Government with its iron-hard regulations. Bureaucrats become a law unto themselves. Daily they make new regulations which are not understood by lawyers, management, labor leaders, farmers, or even by Federal employees themselves.

Regardless of the fact that the Constitution has been ignored and frequently evaded, and that our domestic problems have been recklessly handled, the Republican Party cannot win by griping, complaining, and fault finding.

We must have a better program. We must convince the voters that we have the will and the ability to put that program into effect.

I firmly believe that we have better men and better policies and are in a better position to win the war and establish a permanent peace than our opponents.

In the very near future there will arise the question of "swapping horses in the middle of the stream." We will be told there should not be a change during the war. But the people will vote a change if we have a better horse to offer, a younger horse with a better understanding of the problems of our country, who will put country above self and will not compromise for personal popularity.

Great Britain changed horses in midstream and took Churchill for Chamberlain. She would have been beaten in this war if she had not changed. The new horse must be able to work with other horses. We must have teamwork rather than individual performance.

There are certain fundamental issues and vital problems that must be considered by the Republican Party and by the people of this country.

We must spend less money. The public pay roll must be decreased. Fixing that pay roll at the amount expended at the beginning of World War No. 1, which was twice the size it was during the administration of President Hoover, would save us $5,000,000,000 annually.

Agriculture is America's basic industry. It depends upon production, prices, and distribution. The farmer must be encouraged by a market for his products at a profit. He cannot depend upon subsidies and governmental grants. Profitable markets are his greatest concern.

Workers from the days of Lexington and Concord have always been stalwart in their Americanism. We want the man who works with his hands to have a profit from his labor, so he may educate his children, plan his own security, and build his own home, so he may be in fact independent. He has a right to organize, bargain, and strike, but this cannot interfere with the rights of the public which are at all times paramount, and this rule applies with equal responsibility to capital.

The happiness of a country depends upon a sound financial system. Governmental budgets must be balanced. Debts must be reduced, and taxes made equitable. Our monetary system must be made so sound that the American dollar is worth 100 cents anywhere in the world.

The rights of the State have been recognized since the formation of this Government. Decentralization of government is necessary in a republic to preserve liberty. This means that each level of government—Federal, State, and local—has its functions to perform. One must not encroach upon the other. The legislative, the executive, and the judicial must be kept separate.

A government of laws, and not a government by men, is essential. The growth of bureaus has lessened the power and prerogatives of each branch except the executive.

We must have the courage to allocate to each level of government its functions and the tax sources necessary to carry those functions into effect. We must end this going to Washington and the State capitals with a tin cup and begging for help, unless we want finally to destroy local government.

The source of taxes—which is labor, agriculture, and industry—must not be destroyed. At all times they must have governmental protection.

Abraham Lincoln once said he did not know much about a protective tariff, but he did know that if we buy steel rails in a foreign country that country has the money and we have the steel rails, but if we make the steel rails in America we have both the steel rails and the money.

If we furnish money for other countries to start business, the same principle applies. When we loan to our own people we create business which means more employment at home and more taxes for the Government, thereby lessening taxes on business already in existence. If we loan to other countries they have the business and the results therefrom.

We must make clear beyond misunderstanding our position in our relationships with other nations. At the close of the war very great and very grave problems will face us. We will have the selfish and greedy nations. We will have the hungry and desolate peoples. Our own country will be tired of war.

We need a united country now, and we will need a united Nation then. We must have at the helm men of vision and understanding.

From the days of William McKinley, John Hay, and Theodore Roosevelt, the Republican Party has ably handled international affairs. The acquisition of the Philippines and Puerto Rico gave us great concern. The Democrats opposed, but the problems were courageously met and handled to the entire satisfaction of the American people by the Republican Party.

The Republican Party will be able to stop the greedy nations of the post-war years. We must feed the hungry, discourage the selfish, and lead our own people in the American way.

The nations now united for self-preservation must collaborate so that peace may be preserved. It may be necessary to use force to maintain the observance of peace and good will.

On our part this may mean a powerful navy, a large army, strategical air bases and airways, and a great merchant marine. In order to maintain peace we must have uninterrupted access to sources of water, coal, ore, oil, rubber, and lumber. All this must be done under the provisions of the Constitution, and at all times and at all costs we must never surrender any part of the sovereignty of the United States.

Summed up the following could be our program:

First. The use of all our energies to speedily win this war.

Second. Work for permanent peace in collaboration with other nations.

Third. The preservation of the sovereignty of the United States.

Fourth. A program for veteran rehabilitation, reemployment, and an opportunity to succeed as a recompense for sacrifices made in the service.

Fifth. A government of thrift and economy and the elimination of all unnecessary supergovernment. Bad management destroys the confidence in all government, even good government.

Sixth. A policy toward agriculture, labor, and management, that assures them equality of opportunity and freedom of action with a minimum of interference by government.

Seventh. Simplification and decentralization of government.

Eighth. An end to the economy of scarcity and a clear recognition that the economy of plenty is the only economy for America.

Ninth. The disposition, once the war is over, with all possible rapidity, of surplus lands, factories, and matériel acquired by the Government for the prosecution of the war and the full reestablishment of an economy of full private competition.

Tenth. A program of conservation of our natural resources to protect future generations, which is rendered enormously imperative as the result of the waste of war.

Eleventh. An adequate program of national defense to safeguard America and secure peace for the world.

And finally: For victory we must have unity. The most effective unity is voluntary. Regimentation and force are not effective in America, even among servicemen. The plan of willing discipline in the American armed forces has produced an unbeatable Army and Navy.

Every American is interested in seeing that rule by men is not substituted for rule by law. Individual interpretation of regulations will destroy much of the unity needed to win this war. Nor can unity come from a struggle over power or profit.

We must all understand that if we lose the war we lose everything. This applies to labor, capital, agriculture, and those in public places. Nobody is immune.

We will not get any place by one group smearing another, or by creating class hatred. Racketeering in politics, labor, or business is outrageous to free men.

In this country men cannot long remain free, united, and self-respecting when forced to be subservient to others. The way to victory is through unity. And unity is created by shoulder to shoulder effort in a common cause and a common understanding.

We must have a stable order of government. The old, sound ideas of thrift and self-responsibility are needed as greatly today as in the days of Benjamin Franklin.

The war clouds will pass away and then if those living on this continent with its tremendous natural resources will use the ability which God in his wisdom gave us, we can conquer new frontiers of health, happiness, and independence. We can give then of our blessings to the less fortunate of the world, and in that way assist in the coming of peace and good will toward men.

Above all, we must keep our hearts and minds attuned to the spiritual frontiers of America. There can never be any end to these spiritual frontiers so long as American men and women continue to have courage, determination, and purpose.

The Inter-American Bar Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Col. William C. Rigby at the luncheon meeting of the Chicago Bar Association on June 6, 1944:

The luncheon meeting of the Chicago Bar Association, held Tuesday, June 6, 1944, in the rooms of the Association, 29 South LaSalle Street, Chicago, Ill., was called to order at 1 o'clock, Forest D. Siefkin, chairman of the committee on international and comparative law, presiding.

Chairman SIEFKIN. Ladies and gentlemen, it gives me great pleasure to introduce to you today Col. William C. Rigby, a member of the bar of this State and of a great many other States, who has been active in international and inter-American affairs for a great many years. He will talk to us on some aspects of the Inter-American Bar Association. Colonel Rigby. [Applause.]

Col. WILLIAM C. RIGBY. It is certainly a pleasure for me to come back home to Chicago, where I practiced—I can hardly realize it—for a quarter of a century, before the last World War. And when I went into the Army then, of course I had no idea of doing anything except doing my bit and coming back, but I got tangled up with some special things, so I stayed in the Army, and when I retired it seemed easier to practice in Washington and New York than to come back here, and that is my explanation for not coming back to the city I still look upon as my home.

The Inter-American Bar Association—I want to talk informally, if I may—really was organized in 1940. We took advantage of the presence in the city of Washington of lawyers from pretty much all over the continent at the Eighth American Scientific Congress. One section of that was what they called the Juridical Section. There had been in the air for some time before that the thought of the value of an organization of the lawyers of the continent. It took definite form first, really, in the American Bar Association as a result of the report of the Committee on International Bar Relations, created, I think, in 1932, fathered by Dean Wigmore, and in 1934 the committee made a report.[1]

It was quite a distinguished committee, and the committee report was that the lawyers were the only professional body of standing that had not, in some form or other, organized across the lines of the nations, internationally, and that because of the fact of the differences in the commercial laws of countries, and of the fact that the lawyers generally were the leaders of public opinion, it seemed especially fitting that the lawyers should in some form organize. They called attention to the organization of the International Law Association founded in 1873, and various others, and finally the International Union of Advocates organized in Belgium in 1928, and to the fact that it was organized on the basis of a representative association to represent not individuals—not to have individual membership, but to represent the different bar associations—and they recommended that any new organization of the lawyers should be on that basis.

If I may read just a sentence, they recommended that "in the first place"—and I am quoting from page 622 of the American Bar Association Reports for 1934:

"In the first place, there need be no expectation of seeking to achieve practical results in any specific field of law. Time alone can lead to such possibilities. Propaganda should be no part of the aim.

"Next, there need be no express purpose of assimilating the laws of different nations. National independence and variance will always be inevitable, as well as healthy, in the vast field of law. And so far as assimilation may sometimes be desirable, it is usually better attended to by other existing bodies.

"Thirdly, there should be no desire to represent in any way the national governments. The legal profession, like the medical and the engineering professions, has a social existence and traditions independent of the forms of government. National politics should not enter into a fraternal affiliation of the bar.

"Fourth, and finally, there need be no purpose merely to promote professional clientage by exchanging references or otherwise. The public interests of the profession must be kept separate from the interest of personal profit."

Along about the same time, and beginning even earlier, back, I think, as early as 1928, under the leadership of Dr. Honorio Silgueira, of the Argentine, who was President of the Argentine Federation of the Bar for several terms in succession, a very distinguished lawyer, conferences had been held between first the lawyers of the Argentine and of Brazil; then that was extended. They included in annual meetings Chili and Peru, and began to develop the idea of an intercontinental association of the members of the bar. And so, with that foundation, from the two ends of the continent, we took advantage of the presence of lawyers, as I have said, from the different countries, at the Eighth American Scientific Congress in 1940, and under the stimulus of resolutions passed by the American Bar Association in 1937 directing its Section of the International and Comparative Law Committee to explore the field and prepare proposals, a draft constitution was prepared. The job of preparing the draft fell to the chairman of the Latin-American Committee of the Section, who happened to be myself at that time; and it was submitted to various committees, and finally was submitted at the meeting of the Eighth American Scientific Congress. It was approved and signed tentatively ad referendum by representatives of a number of bar associations present from pretty much all over the continent, including the representative of the American Bar Association, Mr. William R. Vallance, as Chairman of the Section at that time; and an organizing committee was chosen. The matter was presented then to the different bar associations.

The American Bar Association, at its following meeting that fall in Philadelphia, ratified the signature of its representative, Mr. Vallance; and with that lead-off, the national bar associations of, I think, 16 of the countries, had ratified it by the time that our first conference was held in March 1941, including Canada to the north, and down to Argentine and Chile to the south, practically all of the larger bar associations.

One or two odd things came up. In Guatemala the President has forbidden any bar association at all. And some peculiar things came up in some of the smaller countries. The Canadians came in all right, and we have had their representatives at each of our conferences. The Canadian Bar Association has been represented by a former president, Mr. McCarthy, whom many of you know; and Mr. St. Laurent, the minister of justice; Senator Maroud, of Quebec, and others; and we expect a good Canadian representation, I may say, at the forthcoming conference in Mexico. We have had very hearty support, on the whole, from Canada.

Our first conference was held in Habana, as I have said, in March 1941, and we had representatives at the time not only of those national bar associations, but also from a very good portion of the bar associations of States and cities of this country, and some from some of the others. The Chicago Bar Association, I am happy to say, joined very early; the Illinois State Bar Association also, and we now have the Illinois Women's Bar Association. The Bar Association of New York, the State Bar Association and the Association of the Bar of the City of New York and the New York County Lawyers' Association came in early, as did the Missouri and the Texas State Bar Associations, those of Pennsylvania and of the city of Philadelphia, and others. Later on we got the American Foreign Law Association and the American Society of International Law, the Federal Bar Association, and others, so that we have had, have now, a very strong representation, generally, of the bar associations of this country.

The purposes of the association and the method of its foundation followed the lead of the 1934 Committee of the American Bar Association. It is strictly an association of associations. It has no individual members. The members are of two classes: First, the national bar associations; and then, I might say, all others, which we describe as constituent geographical associations. They include State bar associations, city, county bar associations, other local associations, and then any associations of lawyers, even of wider scope, devoted to any specific branch of the law, such as the Federal Bar Association—the association of the lawyers in the Federal service of the United States—and, as I have said, the American Foreign Law Association, the American Society of International Law, and that sort of thing.

The governing body of the organization is its council. It is organized roughly along the same lines as the American Bar Association. It meets in conference from time to time, the general conference corresponding roughly to the assembly of the American Bar Association, and the council is composed, first, of one representative from each national bar association member. Each national bar association member is entitled, as a right, to one place on the council. There are, then, 15 other elective councillors elected at large by the members of the association. That, of course, is planned to give representation to what we call the constituent geographical associations, the local associations, and others.

Each national and each local association, each association member, has one vote in the conference. It may have whatever number of delegates it sees fit. It may appoint its delegates in any way that it determines for itself; but at the conference meeting the delegation must determine among itself how to cast its vote and who shall cast its vote for it and be recognized as its representative; and unless there be disagreement among the delegation itself, its vote is recorded in that way.

The purposes of the association generally are substantially the purposes of bar associations usually. They are stated in the constitution to be:

"To establish and maintain relations between associations and organizations of lawyers, national and local, in the various countries of the Americas;

"To provide a forum for exchanges of views;

"To advance the science of jurisprudence in all its phases, and particularly the study of comparative law;

"To promote uniformity of commercial legislation;

"To further the diffusion of knowledge of the laws of the various countries throughout the Americas;

"To uphold the honor of the profession of the law;

"And to encourage cordial intercourse among the lawyers of the Western Hemisphere"; and finally,

"To meet in conference from time to time for discussion and for the purposes of the association."

At the first conference in Habana we were under the presidency of our first president, Dr. Manuel Fernández Supervielle, who was at that time also the president of the Bar Association of Cuba—the Habana Bar Association. We held a week's conference there, just short of a week 1 day. The proceedings of that meeting have been published in both Spanish and English. The plan is ultimately to publish them also in the other two languages, official languages, French and Portuguese, but those editions are not yet out. Some 22 resolutions were adopted at that conference, and I might just briefly, perhaps, indicate to you the type of thing that they cover, because it is those things in which we are interested.

The first one was a declaration of unreserved devotion to the democratic principles on which the American republics were founded, and the second that the president of this conference be directed officially to request in the name of the association all the governments of America to organize the National Commission of Aviation recommended by the Pan-American Conference of Aviation at Lima in 1937. Then there was a resolution that—

"Whereas the present legal provisions of the republics of the Americas for international judicial assistance, especially between the tribunals of the common law and those of the civil law systems, are uncertain, inadequate, inefficient, and expensive of operation;

* * * * *

"Resolved, That this association favors the execution by all the states of the Americas of treaties or their adherence to a convention providing a simple, expeditious, effective, and inexpensive system whereby the tribunals of each country, by invoking the assistance of the tribunals of others, can procure the service of documents and obtain evidence"— and that sort of thing, to simplify that as between the courts of the different countries.

Then there was a resolution to express the hope that the law schools of the Americas prescribe as a condition of entry or requisite for a law degree or doctor of jurisprudence a high moral standard, and directing the executive committee to encourage discussion among the bar associations of the Americas on the subject of the formulation of a code of ethics, the results of which shall be submitted to the association at its next conference.

Then, a declaration that the conference recognizes the advisability and feasibility of incorporating in the civil law of the Latin-American countries the institution of the trust along the lines upon which it exists in Anglo-Saxon countries, and recommends the enactment of adequate laws so that in this important matter the two great systems in force on the American continent may be brought into harmony. I think you all know that in the civil law there is no provision for the creation of trusts, and that is one thing that our good friend, Dr. Ricardo Alfaro, former president of the Republic of Panama and a member of the Hague Tribunal, has been greatly interested in; and he succeeded in getting enacted in Panama a statute whereby you can now provide for a trust in that Republic, and banks can accept trusts, and trustees can be appointed. And that has been copied more or less in some of the other countries. It was enacted, I think in toto, in Puerto Rico, which, of course, is part of the United States, but has the civil law. It has been copied more or less in Venezuela, and to some extent in Mexico; and that is an illustration of the kind of thing we are trying to promote. I might digress to say that it is an illustration of one of the basic values, as we see it, of the existence of the Inter-American Bar Association.

Mr. Otto Schoenrich, of New York, in one of the early addresses said that between the countries to the south of us and the United States the political forms of government rather tend to bind us together; that is, their constitutions are largely modeled on ours, however, ably or otherwise carried into effect. They believe in democracy, and their constitutions are like ours. On the other hand, the ordinary commercial law is such as to make it difficult to do business together, because theirs is the civil law and ours is the common law. They don't have a chattel mortgage, and it is very difficult to provide some way of selling goods on credit, because, basically, the pledge, as they understand it, means you have to put a pledged article into a man's hands, and he can hold it. There are quite a number of things along that line where practically the differences, partly in tradition, partly in method, between their systems and ours have just tended to keep us back in the development of commercial relations with them, and between their and our businessmen. For instance, the difference between the two systems in this particular thing of the organization of the trust; there is an illustration of that.

Then there was a resolution that a study be made of organizing some better method of international copyright system, following up and elaborating the present copyright convention, and to request the associations and organizations that are members of the Inter-American Bar Association to work with all the means at their disposal for the achievement of that purpose. And a resolution concerning immigration, naturalization, and citizenship laws looking toward—we can't unify them, but making them more harmonious than they are—and resolutions concerning legal documentation; and double taxation; and to establish a system of exchange of information on administrative procedures in the different countries; and we have had a very active study of administrative law—in those countries it is so much more developed than it is with us—and for the creation and organization of an academy of comparative law.

There are a number of other things. And then, a study of what could be done toward the organization of peace in the world in some way. Right at the beginning one of the things that was recognized was that after war conditions are over there will have to be some hope of something better than we have had, and that the lawyers of all the countries, because of their training, because of their position, as Dr. Supervielle said in one talk, in the way they stand between government and their clients—representing their clients and the people on the one hand, being in touch with Government officials on the other—are in a peculiarly good position to undertake to advise on that subject, as on other subjects.

That, of course, was before we were in the war. We planned the next conference at Buenos Aires in 1942, but because of transportation difficulties, that conference was postponed. Plans were going forward for that, but transportation difficulties and other situations made it impracticable to carry out our plans. We held, instead, simply a meeting of our council in Washington. Then we held our next conference, actual second conference, in Brazil, at Rio de Janeiro in 1943, and despite difficulties of transportation a very active conference resulted. The president at the time of this conference was Edmundo de Miranda Jordao, who was also the president of the Brazilian Bar Association, and that conference coincided with the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Brazilian Bar Association. We had a very good delegation there from Canada, and we had succeeded in getting a number down from the United States. We got travel priorities for but one man, our good friend, George Maurice Morris, former president of the American Bar Association. He was able to go down, with priorities, on the plane. I might say, incidentally, that our secretary-general, Mr. Vallance, succeeded in going down without any priorities of any kind, and so did Mitchell Carroll, of New York, the present chairman of the American Bar Association's Section of International and Comparative Law. One or two others just started out as adventurers on their own, and in one way or another quite a number of United States and Canadian delegates did get down there. There was a very active conference.

We discovered one thing, that our plan of placing proposed resolutions before the entire assembly didn't always work so well as it had at Habana. At Rio it resulted in a rather confused kind of meeting, but a very active one. Very greatly interested in it, everybody was, but it resulted in a hundred and twenty-two resolutions, instead of the comparatively few that the resolutions committee had recommended that they be boiled down to. So we are planning now, in our meeting in Mexico this August, to change that part of the plan just a little and have the resolutions committee report to the Council and let the Council do more active work in finally boiling them down, in open public meeting, of course, a step along the same lines as the American Bar Association made, and for much the same reasons.

The four official languages are the four languages that we have in the different countries here in this continent, and it worked very well at Habana and at Rio, and I understand that we can fairly expect it to work in the same way at Mexico City. We will have one of these translating-machine apparatuses that the International Business Machines Co. puts out, by which you have the translation of each talk as it is given, given over the different wires by translators standing by the speaker; and you put the receiver up to your ear, and turn the knob as you want to, and you hear it in French, or in Spanish, or in Portuguese, or in English, as you see fit.

We have 14 committees and sections now working along very much the same lines as were outlined in those first resolutions at Habana. I think the list of them is very much the same as it was at the 1943 conference. There is the commission on inter-American academy of international and comparative law; a committee on immigration, nationality, and immigration laws; a section on industrial property, patents, and trade-marks; a committee on the law of trusts and trustees; a committee on unification or coordination of legislation relative to the civil status of persons; a committee on taxation; one on administrative law and procedure; one on customs laws; one on customs law; one on commercial treaties; one on the protection of intellectual property; one on national centers of legal documentation and bibliographical indexes of law materials; a section on legal education; a committee on comparative constitutional law; a section on comparison of civil and commercial laws; a committee on communications, including air law, telecommunications, maritime and highway transportation; one on industrial, economic, and social legislation; one on penal law and procedure—by the way, our Canadian friend, Mr. McCarthy, is its chairman—one on territorial waters and ocean fisheries, and some of you may remember that Ed Allen, of Seattle, is very interested in fisheries, and there will be some of them that will talk fisheries all day long if you let them talk to you about the deep-sea fisheries and the difficulties between the jurisdictions, the claimed jurisdictions of the different countries—and a committee on on post-war problems, of which I think I have said our good friend George Maurice Morris is the Vice Chairman for the United States.

Of course, you are all of you aware that all kinds of propositions have been made in the discussion of post-war problems—it was at the last meeting of the American Society of International Law, I believe, when its president Mr. Coudert, said it had got to a point where a man who didn't have a solution of the post-war problem question ready to tell you about, and submit to you, was like a man that didn't have a dress suit. He just didn't exist, hardly; there are so many of them. But of course, it is a most vital, a most serious problem, and while we certainly don't want to be in the position of advocating any one plan or any other plan, I think that we can begin to see a kind of general agreement of thought that after this war there must be some method adopted, if it be possible, working toward the end of securing more permanent peace; and that probably there should be something a little in advance of the idea of an article of confederation, which was the basic idea of the League of Nations, largely. It must be something, perhaps, beyond a mere agreement among nations requiring the affirmative action of the legislative powers of each individual nation in order to carry into effect what the central authority may determine, something more along the lines of a constitution rather than of our old Articles of Confederation. There should be some provision for some kind of international judicial system; perhaps something for putting into effect some executive—and perhaps probably necessarily some power, police power, armed power, whatever you call it, to carry into effect the decisions—and some kind of rule-making, perhaps legislative, authority. I am only saying what I gather is rather generally in the minds of people talking about it now.

For the Mexico conference we desire to invite, of course, the cooperation of the delegates of the different associations, and their help, especially, along the line of the work of any committee or section in which they may be interested. When we say that our regulations provide that any papers anyone desires to submit should be submitted 30 days in advance of the opening date of the conference, which is on July 31, it is in order that there may be time to mimeograph them, and to translate them into the different languages of the conference. The physical arrangements are under the care of a local organizing committee in Mexico City. I have forgotten to say that our president this year, Dr. Carlos Sanchez Mejorada, is the president of the Barra Mexicana, the Mexican Bar Association, a competent lawyer who has proven himself an excellent executive, in making the arrangments. Some of you may know him. He is counsel, I believe, in Mexico for the American Mining and Smelting Co., and other large American interests.

We are to have the use for our meeting of the Palace of Fine Arts. The Government has been good enough to put that at our disposal for that purpose; and for our section and committee meetings, the Castillo de Chapultepec. We are well provided; and the Government has been good enough to let us have the assistance of a clerical staff, and that kind of thing. That is the only way in which we accept any aid from the Government, or any government, because one of the things we have been insisting on, is to keep the Association an association of independent lawyers not under the control of the Governments, or a Government organization in any way. Because of that we are going to have to ask delegates when they register to give us a registration fee of—don't let me scare you now—25 Mexican pesos. I think that means $5.15 in American money; and of course, we all of us pay our own expenses. The hotels have placed, I think, 20 percent of their space available for use down there, and we make reservations through our office in Washington, and we have the schedule of the rates, the hotel rates. They are about the same as the better hotels in this country.

The arrangements for transportation—both the railroads and the airlines are trying to cooperate as much as they can and we know in these wartimes it is not so easy to be sure you get down there, but they tell us that once you get across the border, we can be taken care of. [Applause.]

Chairman SIEFKIN. Does anyone want to ask Colonel Rigby any questions? I don't think he said what the date was. It is July 31 for a week, isn't it?

Colonel RIGBY. Yes.[2] Registration is that day, and the large meeting is that evening. Then we break up into sections and committees for the next 4 days, and over the week end let the resolutions committee be struggling with what the sections and committees have brought in, and with what any other delegates may have offered; and let the other people see the sights around the neighboring communities. Monday we meet for the resolutions committee to report to the Council; and Tuesday we meet for the final meeting; and of course, they provide more or less entertainment, and that kind of thing that usually goes with it.

MEMBER. Are the resolutions submitted before?

Colonel RIGBY. No, not necessarily. Proposed resolutions are offered, or sent, directly to the section, or the committee, if it is proper for such a committee, or to the resolutions committee. The sections, with their committees, are to report by Friday evening, so the resolutions committee is to have over the week end and until Monday to digest them. They report on that day, Monday.

MEMBER. Are formal credentials necessary for the delegates?

Colonel RIGBY. Whatever the president of your own member association determines to give you. There is a credentials committee to whom the credentials are submitted, and that committee will present at the opening session the roll as made up from the credentials submitted. Others will have to go before the credentials committee as they may come in later on.

MEMBER. What other countries besides Guatemala refused to join the Inter-American Association?

Colonel RIGBY. Costa Rica joined, and their Lu's Anderson was one of our executive committee members. Then they passed an integrating bill act in the Parliament of Costa Rica which destroyed the existing bar association, and the new integrated association has not as yet joined us. El Salvador has not joined. Honduras joined, but is not very active.

MEMBER. There were two more.

Colonel RIGBY. Nicaragua, I think, is not in. They are the small countries. The large countries, I may say, are all in. Paraguay was the last one to come in, Paraguay and Uruguay, so we have a complete representation of the continent except those three or four small Central-American countries.

MEMBER. We have representation of the foreign colonies there like British Honduras, French Guiana, Dutch Guiana, and so forth?

Colonel RIGBY. No, the only British dominion that has joined is the Canadian Dominion. None of the others have.

[2] The conference runs from July 31 to August 8, 1944.

MEMBER. What are the dues; $100 a year?

Colonel RIGBY. It depends on the membership. National associations pay from $50 to $500. An association with 5,000 members or above, like the American Bar and Canadian Bar pay $500. Then it scales down to $50 for an association with less than 100 members, and there are a few of them. The dues for the local associations, geographical constituents, scale down from $100 to $25.

MEMBER. Are the local associations entitled to a vote?

Colonel RIGBY. On everything, yes, except that in the election of the councillors—they may take part in the election of only 15, because the balance of the councilors are appointed as of right by the different national bar associations. The American Bar Association has its own councilor. On other things, on the resolutions, there is no difference at all between different classes of the associations. There is this limitation, that no resolution can be passed except by a two-thirds vote, and that vote must include the affirmative vote of at least a majority of the national associations. The purpose of that, of course, is to prevent either end of the continent from over-riding the other on any question that might come up. If we disagree with our Latin-American countries, or vice versa, we want to avoid either party over slaughtering the other.

MEMBER. May I ask the Colonel a question and make a statement that may interest him. The question is: Should associations such as the Chicago Bar Association join the Inter-American Association as an independent group, as an independent national association?

Colonel RIGBY. It is very strongly our desire and our understanding of the value—of course, if we had only the national American Bar Association as the member from the United States, we would be completely overruled by the representatives of the 20 national bar associations to the south of us. It is only because of the membership of the various constituent associations that the United States and Canada are not completely overruled in everything. And, of course, frankly, our financial support necessarily comes from the various constituent geographical associations in the United States. We don't have very much financial support from these small national associations to the south of us.

MEMBER. That is an answer, Mr. Chairman, which of course I expected, but I wish Colonel Rigby to emphasize it and make it clear to those of us who are here. The statement which I wished to make is known to a few members of our International Law Comparative Law Committee at the Hague, and that is: At the last meeting of our committee in April there was a long discussion about the coming conference to be held at Mexico City, and the matter was discussed as to how many members of our committee and how many members of this association might join with us in visiting Mexico City at that time, primarily for that purpose, and as you, Colonel, have explained to us, the arrangements made there, we are now, I think, more particularly disturbed over the question of transportation. That matter was discussed quite fully, and I see a gentleman here who talked about it quite a good deal at that meeting, Mr. Solberg, and I simply voice what he said at that time, that we hope that this Chicago association will be able to make arrangements so that a very good delegation, not only of our committee, but of the association itself, may be in Mexico City next August 31, I believe you stated.

Colonel RIGBY. July 31 to August 8.

Chairman SIEFKIN. Thank you very much, Colonel Rigby. We enjoyed it very much. [Applause.]

APPENDIX

Membership in the Inter-American Bar Association is open only to lawyers' organizations of the following types: National associations, State and local associations, and professional associations of lawyers devoted to particular branches of the law. Individual lawyers may participate in the activities of the association only as delegates of a member association. C. I. O. Political Action Committee

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Westbrook Pegler from the Washington Daily News of June 20, 1944:

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK, June 20.—Long-distance telephone records subpenaed by the Dies committee have revealed a close relationship between the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. and the following:

The White House and Mrs. Roosevelt.

Vice President HENRY WALLACE.

The Department of Agriculture.

The Department of Justice, and various regional directors of the Farm Security Administration having power to exert strong political and economic pressure on farmers.

Numerous calls to regional F. S. A. offices were made in most cases by C. B. Baldwin, assistant director of the Political Action Committee, who resigned his job as chairman of the F. S. A. in Washington to become actual manager of the P. A. C.'s campaign to elect President Roosevelt for a fourth term and Mr. WALLACE for a second term and to defeat a select list of aspirants for the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Sidney Hillman, P. A. C. chairman, is president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, C. I. O., and recently has been denounced by David Dubinsky and other right-wing union radicals, as leader of the Communist Party in New York, now known as the American Labor Party.

Baldwin has held various key jobs in Washington ever since 1933, when he caught on as Assistant Secretary of Agriculture under Wallace. He became director of the Farm Security Administration in October 1940. The phone calls indicate a strong continuing interest and influence in the F. S. A., while he is on leave serving with the political leader of the New York Communist faction of the union movement.

The slips showed 28 calls from the New York headquarters of the C. I. O.'s Political Action Committee direct to the White House, including one from Hillman to Mrs. Roosevelt, and another from Hillman to David Niles, formerly Nyhus, of Boston, one of the President's selfless assistants with a passion for anonymity and for left-wing politics. Hillman also called Vice President Wallace. Baldwin is recorded as having made three calls to Wallace's office.

The Hillman-Baldwin-Communist group of the C. I. O. has defeated for renomination both MARTIN DIES, of Texas, and JOE STARNES, of Alabama. STARNES is a member of the Dies committee.

Records show, according to the Dies committee, "hundreds" of calls from the P. A. C.'s New York headquarters to various Government officials, particularly in the Department of Justice, and in the Department of Agriculture, which controls the Farm Security Administration and the fortunes of many farmers through its local agents scattered everywhere.

Let's Get Tough

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS D. WINTER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker, ever since our Nation went to war, I have felt the citizens of the United States should have a national battle cry, which would unify all of the people solidly behind the supreme effort of quickly defeating the Axis Powers, and then help place our national economic and social house in order.

I shall not take time to enumerate the different famous battle calls which caused Americans to act as one to quickly accomplish a difficult national task in a time of a great national crisis. History books are replete with them.

Just recently I came across a sentiment which to my mind, and I am sure to the minds of millions of my fellow citizens once they hear it, could properly express what we Americans must do in order to get this war over quickly and restore and keep restored a constructive peace.

This sentiment came to me in the shape of a published song, whose title would make a wonderful battle cry for our armed forces and for every citizen of these United States who appreciates the blessings of his citizenship and wants them preserved.

The name of this song is "Let's Get Tough," and, to my great surprise, it was written by a young mother of two small children as a protest against the horrors of war and as a mother's appeal to get it over quickly. When the American mothers admonish us to "get tough" it is time to act.

I do not personally know the author or publisher. I do not have any direct or indirect interest in this song, whose title should be the battle cry of our forces abroad, and at home, and all of our American citizens—especially we Members of Congress.

The author's name is Mrs. Claude Hamilton, Jr., of 130 East End Avenue, New York City, N. Y. The publisher is the Shelby Music Publishing Co. of Detroit, Mich. I hope every American service band master and radio program director will make this song a part of their musical portfolio.

The words of this song are very inspiring—but the idea conveyed by the title "Let's Get Tough" is a good and timely one. We citizens of these United States, yes, especially we Members of the National Congress, have been too easy-going in connection with many national and international problems. We do not approach them from a "Let's Get Tough" attitude, which is absolutely necessary these days in dealing with a murderous foe abroad and their friends and agents here in this country where we have nursed them along with every civic blessing.

So, I appeal to my colleagues to think it over. "For our boys are fighting and sacrificing, immortalizing history."

I hope my colleagues and their constituents will approach this job of finishing up this war and establishing a truly constructive peace from a "Let's Get Tough" viewpoint.

I am sure if every American says "Let's Get Tough," many of our vexatious, economic, social, and world-wide problems would be minimized or would vanish.

Hon. Thomas E. Scanlon, of Pennsylvania, Warns Congress To Keep Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, price control is mandatory if we are to hold the line against inflation. One of the leaders in Congress in the battle against inflationary threats and rising prices is my colleague from Pennsylvania the Honorable THOMAS E. SCANLON. As part of my remarks I am happy to include the column of Robert Taylor, Washington correspondent of the Pittsburgh Press, commending Congressman SCANLON for his valiant battle for price control. I include also the editorial which appeared in the Sunday, June 18, issue of the Pittsburgh Press entitled "Me, Too":

MUST KEEP PRICE CONTROL, SCANLON WARNS CONGRESS—PITTSBURGHER CITES GALLUP POLL RESULTS, SHOWS MAJORITY OF VOTERS FEAR INFLATION

(By Robert Taylor)

WASHINGTON, June 17.—Representative THOMAS E. SCANLON, Democrat, Pittsburgh, said today that any Congressman or any party that "votes against price control and for inflation" will be accountable to the voters who are almost solidly united for price control.

Mr. SCANLON is chairman of the unofficial congressional committee for the protection of the consumer, which is advocating reenactment of the emergency price control law, which expires June 30, with no amendments.

The committee is opposing a series of amendments inserted in the pending bill to extend price control, on the ground that they would break price control and hamper efforts of the Office of Price Administration to control prices and enforce ceilings.

"The American people are almost solidly united for price control, as the recent Gallup poll showed," he said. "And they are going to be a lot more important when the votes are counted next fall than the swarm of lobbyists who have been infesting the Halls of Congress during recent weeks seeking added profits for industries already better off than they ever were before."

TEXTILE MILLS PROFITING

Mr. SCANLON said textile mills, beneficiaries of the Bankhead amendment, are making almost 900 percent more profits than they made before the war, and that other plans for amending the O. P. A. bill would increase profits either by raising ceilings or weakening enforcement.

Price rises, he said, would increase living costs, leading to demands for wage increases and strikes which would upset war production. Wage increases would pyramid on price increases to boost the spiral of inflation.

LAST WAR'S INFLATION

"In the last war we paid a sorry price for inflation," he said. "Fixed incomes shrank to 40 cents on the dollar. War costs were increased by 70 percent. And the collapse which followed inflation was tragic beyond belief. Business profits were turned to losses. Business failures rose 40 percent above the pre-war period. Unemployment rose 500,500 and the pay of those who kept their jobs shrank."

The destructive effects of inflation, he added, are potentially greater now because our national income is more than three times what it was in 1918 and the total cost of the last war, including the inflationary part, would pay for only 4½ months of this war.

HOLD LIVING COSTS

Against this kind of pressure, O. P. A. has been able to hold living costs without gain for the past 12 months, he added.

"I, for one, will not, after such an outstanding success and in view of the power of inflationary pressure, vote to take any step that will turn the price line upward again," he said.

ME, TOO

From every corner of the congressional halls, pressure groups are seeking to gain exemption for their own products from the Government's wartime price-control program.
